PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE SIXTY-SIXTH CONGRESS
FIRST SESSION.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, September 13, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. William Couden, late chaplain of the Second Division, American forces in Germany, offered the following prayer:

Dear Lord, we thank Thee for Thy accessibility and for the privilege of prayer. We are creatures "bound by gold chains to the feet of God." Thou hast made us to commune with Thee; and the chief joy as well as the deepest mystery of our lives is, that if we draw nigh to Thee Thou wilt draw nigh to us.

At the close of another week we pray that Thou wilt keep us healthfully mindful of the great realities that touch us all: our responsibility in this life; the certainty of death; the changelessness of the record of a finished life, wherein lies our judgment; the horrible results of sin; and the eternal hope and glory of Thy love for every soul, revealed to us in Jesus Christ. God be with us till we meet again. If temptation assail anyone here, help him to conquer it. If sorrow come to any, help him to bear it. If opportunity for good open before any, help him to accept it. If death overtake any, raise him to Thy bosom with sin forgiven and grace triumphant through faith in our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE RECORD.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to correct the record on page 5257 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of September 11, 1919. Page 187 of the stenographer's typewritten transcript from his notes of the proceedings of debate of that day shows that the following language was used by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] on the floor of the House, to wit——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman rise to correct the RECORD?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I am giving the language now:

Frequently I have conceded points of order against an amendment which was afterwards defeated.

On the proper page of the RECORD mentioned by me—5257—these words do not appear, but were stricken out by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] before the record reached the printer. Also on page——

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think that is a correction of the RECORD.

Mr. BLANTON. I am asking that the RECORD be corrected.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman make his statement.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. BLANTON. Just about three minutes.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to proceed for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to this language not appearing in the printed RECORD, but under the rule invoked by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] at the time the language was used, I think that before striking out by him of a whole sentence the consent of the House should have been granted. I have no objection to the House granting the consent, or if the sentence as written down in typewriting by the stenographer does not convey the meaning that the gentleman wanted to convey I have no objection to his changing it so as to convey the meaning he intended, but to strike the whole sentence out, under the rule invoked by him, should not be done without first obtaining the consent of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman has that right.

Mr. BLANTON. On the same page the word "fact" was stricken out and the word "offense" inserted in lieu thereof. As to this change made by the gentleman, I have no objection to it; but in view of the fact that it changed the entire meaning of the sentence, I think the gentleman should have obtained permission, at least, from the House to make the change.

There are numerous other changes made in the record by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], on pages 186, 187, 188, 189, 191, and 192 of the typewritten transcript of the stenographer's notes, but inasmuch as they are all changes in phraseology and in grammatical construction I have no objection to them at all. I have no objection to his having left this entire sentence out, which I mentioned, on page 187 of the stenographic notes, but under the rule invoked I think the gentleman should have had the consent of the House. I am willing to be one to grant unanimous consent to him if it is necessary. For the purpose of keeping the record straight I merely desire to call the attention of the House to this transaction.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not think it is necessary to have the consent of the House.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, it is not altogether pleasant to have to notice the statement to which the House has just listened. Out of regard for orderly procedure, and out of respect for the House in not taking up its time on immaterial matters, I shall not undertake to speak my frank opinion of the proceeding. I have not had the opportunity to have the notes of my own remarks. The gentleman had them all day yesterday. I understand that yesterday he was sitting over here all day long with the notes of my remarks writing, writing, writing, and some gentleman told me that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] contended that I had made changes in the record. After the House adjourned yesterday he was talking to the Speaker. I approached the Speaker and stated to him, "I understand, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Texas complains of some changes that I have made. I am willing to have him point out now what changes he claims—he has the notes of my remarks—and leave the matter to the Speaker, and if the Speaker says that I have made a single material change I for one will abide by the decision of the Speaker." The gentleman declined to do it. I reached and got the transcript of my remarks, and—I will not say childishly, but the gentleman appealed to the Speaker, claiming that having sent to the Printing Office and obtained them he was entitled to the transcript of the stenographic notes of my own speech. On reflection I thought that was right, and the Speaker said he would let him keep them. I then challenged the gentleman to point out, in the presence of certain Members of the House, wherein I violated the rule. The gentleman could not do it. Here are the facts. The correction that he calls attention to, if you notice the reading of it, was a statement of less than one line, and on its face it showed that the stenographer, in the haste, did not get all the statement.

What was the statement? The House will remember the other day I said I had no desire but to protect the rules, and as an illustration I said that a day or two before that I had conceded that a point of order was not well taken against an amendment which I had opposed and which was defeated. Well, the stenographer did not get all of that statement. It is immaterial personally to me, and I should not have referred to it. So instead of correcting it or going to the stenographer and getting the notes I struck out that little statement left suspended in the air, which was an immaterial thing. It was my speech. I did not insert anything that was insulting to any Member, as the gentleman did the other day. When I struck that out of the record I obeyed the rule which said you might strike out anything that was obviously an error or to correct the grammar. But the gentleman complains of another interlineation; and yet, gentlemen, the interlineation I made was made out of a spirit of fairness to the gentleman, because where the stenographer was quoting me in quoting either I overlooked it or the stenographer failed to get the completed statement of his defense, and that was that he contended that the RECORD showed that the objectionable remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] were still left in the RECORD. The stenographer's notes did not show the complete statement, and out of fairness to the gentleman I interlined the full contention, so that he who reads the RECORD could get the full contention of the gentleman. [Applause.] Is that dishonorable? Is that worthy of taking up the time of this House in trying to make it appear—what? Gentlemen, you understand why the gentleman brings it up. He wants to try to contend that somebody else amends the record.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. I will.

Mr. RUCKER. I was present on that occasion when the gentleman made that statement, and I have a very distinct recollection that the gentleman said in his speech what he has stated here.

Mr. WINGO. Certainly. Another objection—and the change was not made by me; it was corrected by the stenographer, stating the truth; it was a change of two words, a change from "fact" to "offense." The House remembers distinctly I charged an offense, and the stenographer made that change and corrected an obvious error. He spent a whole day reading through my remarks trying to get captious objections, and yet he presents it to the House this morning, and admits it is not objectionable.

The Speaker rules it is not objectionable. I do not want to annoy the House, but I went to the gentleman yesterday, in the presence of the Speaker, and said: "I will leave it to the Speaker of the House; I do not know what you are complaining about; you have been going around talking to somebody; if you have objections, point them out to the Speaker and by his decision I will abide." I think that was the course of an honorable man. The gentleman did not accept that. The gentleman kept my remarks all day trying to find if there was some objection——

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask for two minutes, and I shall not further bother the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I repeat, so possibly it may soak into the gentleman, the rule in reference to extensions and interlineations. A gentleman has a right to correct obvious errors or to change phraseology so as more clearly to express a thought, but he has no right to put in stuff that is disorderly and which is a reflection upon the membership of the House as a whole or upon any individual Member of the House; and the gentleman, because the House—all but three Members—voted to condemn his falsification of the record now seeks to evade the force of that by calling attention of the House to a little captious immaterial change that the gentleman who, on the part of the House, called attention to. I know that the only criticism of my action the other day was that some Members wanted me to indulge in the same kind of intemperate language and I declined to do it; and I challenge any gentleman to show where I have indulged in intemperate language, and I challenge any man to show where I have made a correction which is not immaterial. Another correction is where the stenographer's notes stated I said the gentleman from "Texas" when I was speaking of the "gentleman from Ohio" [Mr. GARD], and I changed the word "Texas" to the word "Ohio." And yet those are some of the "numerous changes" he alleges. But, gentlemen, I ask the House to read page 5238, bottom of the second column—read the limitations under which I permitted the gentleman the other day to extend his remarks on the promise that he made to this House that he would confine his extensions to official communications, facts, and figures, to give information to the House on the subject which he was discussing, the Department of Labor, and then go and read the 8 or 10 pages of telegrams, newspaper articles, and letters eulogistic of him, and in some instances contemptible references and reflections upon the colleagues of his own State of Texas, and I leave it to the House to say whether or not the gentleman has yet learned his lesson. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

WAR-RISK INSURANCE ACT.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8778) to amend and modify the war-risk insurance act.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8778) to amend and modify the war-risk insurance act, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 8778, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8778) to amend and modify the war-risk insurance act.

The CHAIRMAN. When the committee rose yesterday section 12 had been read and was under consideration and open for amendment. The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DOMINICK] had sent to the desk an amendment, which the Clerk will now report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DOMINICK moves to amend, on page 11, line 3, by adding the following proviso:

"Provided, That when any person entitled to make application for insurance has clearly and unequivocally expressed to an officer of the Army or Navy, or to any other person authorized to receive applications for such insurance on behalf of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, his intention to apply for a definite amount of insurance, but is prevented by circumstances beyond his control from carrying out such intention, insurance shall be deemed to be in force in the same manner as if he had made valid application therefor."

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Chairman, I think I can best explain the intent of the amendment which I have just offered by referring to a concrete case in my district. I understand, from information from the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, that there are about 150 similar cases that have arisen in the Army and Navy forces. In this case a young soldier was called to the company tent by his captain, along with other members of his company, in order to make application for war-risk insurance. It so happened when the turn of this young soldier came the application blanks were exhausted. This was about the latter part of November, 1917. His captain asked him what amount of insurance he wanted. He told him that he wanted $10,000. The captain made notes and memoranda of his statements, and said that as soon as a sufficient supply, or, at least, an additional supply, of blanks was received he would have an opportunity to complete his application. A day or so after that the organization to which this young soldier belonged was quarantined in another portion of the camp on account of the prevalence of a pneumonia epidemic in the main camp at Camp Sevier. They were under quarantine until Christmas Eve.

During that time this young soldier, who was a cook in this company, had no opportunity to complete his application for $10,000 of insurance which he wanted. At the termination of the quarantine he was granted a short furlough in order that he might visit his home. He returned from the visit, and two days after he returned he was stricken with pneumonia, and on the 13th of January, 1918, he died, without ever having an opportunity to complete his application.

As the law stood at that time his mother received the benefit of the automatic insurance, but under all the rules of justice, under all the rules of right, she should be entitled to what this young soldier wanted, namely, $10,000 of insurance, which he had been deprived of, and she has been deprived of, through no fault of the soldier. I know, Mr. Chairman, and I believe that under practically every jurisdiction in this country any lawyer can take the state of facts as they occur in this case and go before any court and recover that additional $5,000 insurance. I believe that these people can go into the district courts of the United States, which is permitted under the original war-risk insurance act, and bring their action and recover this amount. But, Mr. Chairman, is it right, is it just, to force people who are beneficiaries, who are clearly entitled to this amount, to go to the trouble and the expense of wearying along with a case of this kind through the district courts of the United States?

Now, it might be urged by the committee that this is just a special bill that I am urging and trying to get through under the guise of a general law. I am only citing this specific instance to explain what my amendment really means and what would be its effect.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOMINICK. I will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What would be the gentleman's idea of the burden and the character of proof that would be necessary to substantiate the claim under his amendment?

Mr. DOMINICK. The burden of proof in a case of this kind would, of course, be upon the beneficiary.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have five minutes more, and then I will conclude and will have nothing more to say on this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOMINICK. As I say, the burden of proof in a case of this kind would clearly be upon the beneficiary, because it is not in the same class as a forfeiture would be. In the case of a forfeiture, as I understand the law, so far as an insurance policy is concerned, the defense must be set up by the insurer and must be set affirmatively under the decisions of my State courts.

Now, Mr. Chairman, further in regard to this case and in regard to this amendment, I desire to read a letter that I received from Mr. W. R. Vance, under date of May 6, 1919, who was at that time general counsel for the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. It is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE,
Washington, May 16, 1919.

Hon. FRED H. DOMINICK,
Newberry, S. C.

MY DEAR MR. DOMINICK: Last February, when discussing with you the claim made by one of your constituents on account of the insurance of Doc Floyd Carter, I stated that I would send you a draft of a proposed amendment of section 401 of the war-risk insurance act intended to meet the cases of hardship similar to that of Doc Floyd Carter. The pressure of other business that could not be postponed, together with the known impossibility of securing congressional action so near the end of the session, prevented me from sending you the proposed draft. In view of the approaching session of the Congress I am now inclosing herewith a tentative form of an amendatory bill, which, in my opinion, would relieve most of the cases of hardship arising out of the inability of soldiers to make application for insurance because of circumstances beyond their control. It is obvious that the administration of such a provision as that suggested would involve many difficulties in regard to the evidence to be required to establish the existence of the intention therein described, but I am of opinion that the provision could be administered. If you desire to introduce this or a similar bill I shall be glad to secure for you from the records of the bureau as accurate a statement as possible as to the number of cases that would be affected by such amendment and the probable cost to the Government of its adoption by the Congress. Without having specific data before me I would, on general knowledge of the situation, state that the number of cases affected would be 150 and the cost to the Federal Treasury $1,500,000. You, of course, understand that this proposed amendment has not received the approval of the Treasury Department, and that it is sent to you solely on my own personal account. I may add that it is being considered as one of the proposals for amendatory legislation to be made by the department to the Congress.

If I can serve you further in this matter or in any other respect please command me.

Yours, very sincerely,

W. R. VANCE, General Counsel.

Now, Mr. Chairman, according to that letter of Mr. Vance, who was then general counsel, there are about 150 cases in this same condition, cases where it is shown by competent testimony and competent proof that the soldier desired a certain amount of insurance which was more than the automatic insurance, and which he was deprived of, and which he did not receive, and through no fault of his own. In this case that I have mentioned it was a case of the application blanks giving out, and in that connection I might add, Mr. Chairman, that I do not know of anything in the law that requires any special form of application to be made.

Mr. MAYS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOMINICK. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. MAYS. In what way did this young soldier evidence his intention of taking out $10,000 of insurance?

Mr. DOMINICK. He evidenced that intention by telling the captain, when he had been informed that the application blanks were exhausted, that he wanted $10,000 of insurance. The captain of that company made memoranda of his statement, the amount of insurance, the name of the beneficiary, and all those memoranda are on file now in the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, together with the captain's affidavit and the affidavit of the sergeant of his company.

Mr. MAYS. Have they the affidavit now?

Mr. DOMINICK. They have the affidavit now, and also of the top sergeant and also of the cook sergeant.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I ask the extension of the gentleman's time for one minute to enable him to answer a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Carolina may have one more minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Is this submitted in the form suggested by Dr. Vance?

Mr. DOMINICK. Yes; in the exact form, and I have introduced a bill to that effect, and my amendment is as incorporated in that bill.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose this amendment. In administering the war-risk insurance act it must be done in an orderly and proper manner. Under the original act a man had an opportunity of applying for insurance for a period of 120 days, and if during that period he did not apply for insurance and died or was disabled, then, under the original act and under this act, he would be entitled to automatic insurance. Now, let us see what the gentleman's contention is in regard to the proposed amendment. He states that the young man died during the period of 120 days, and that his dependents at the present time are drawing automatic insurance. What is the amount paid to dependents entitled to automatic insurance? Twenty-five dollars per month for 240 months. Now, he is contending that because this young man made some statement in regard to applying for insurance he ought to be entitled to the full $10,000 insurance.

It seems to me that in enacting this legislation proposed by the gentleman we would be going too far when you take into consideration the fact that it leaves the whole question dependent upon uncertain statements as to whether a man has expressed a desire for insurance or not.

Understand, gentlemen, that to-day this young man's dependents are getting automatic insurance. This matter was presented to the committee by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DOMINICK], and at that time Mr. DOMINICK stated—

In this latter case that would not afford any relief on account of the fact that he died within the time that permitted the payment of the automatic insurance. He died in January, 1919, and his mother is receiving the automatic insurance now on account of the fact that he died in January.

Mr. DEWALT. Your idea is that she ought to have the $57.50?

Mr. DOMINICK. Yes; the entire amount that he intended to take out and did not get, through no fault of his own.

I say to you that we are enacting general legislation and not specific legislation. It appears that the gentleman is coming in here to take care of a special case.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. We are not in the business of taking care of special cases, but we are here to enact general legislation.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. DOMINICK. I want to ask the gentleman if he does not think a provision in the law applying to 150 cases, as stated by Mr. Vance, general counsel, is not somewhat general and not special legislation?

Mr. SWEET. Let me say to the gentleman that his whole case is based on statements and uncertainties, and that we can not recognize those statements made not by the soldier himself but by somebody else in connection with the matter, and not in the regular course of applying for insurance.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the gentleman from Iowa contend that when a soldier signifies his intention of taking out $10,000 insurance, and there were no blanks available, and it was the fault of the Government that he did not at that time make the application that he would have made and thus have insurance, and afterwards dies, the Government should not make good the policy he desired to take and was prevented from taking by reason of the fact that the proper blanks were not available at the time? Is that the gentleman's position?

Mr. SWEET. He was unfortunate in that respect. But let me say this, that we have provided here general legislation that will give men of that kind automatic insurance; we are giving them $5,000 insurance, and we are giving them insurance that they never paid $1 of premium for.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Under the provisions of this proposed amendment, in the event some soldier had expressed his intention to an officer to take out $2,000 insurance, he would be compelled, notwithstanding the fact that the act would give him $5,000 insurance automatically, to take the $2,000 instead of the $5,000?

Mr. SWEET. Yes; under the contention of the gentleman who proposes this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Iowa may have one more minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. So that the effect of this amendment probably would be to deprive such soldiers of the amount of insurance that they would otherwise get?

Mr. SWEET. Yes. That is true.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say just one word, and that is all. This is another attempt to emasculate this law by making it apply to particular cases because somebody happened to hear about a case that appealed to his sympathy. You gentlemen now are responsible for what happens to the law as it is written. If you want to go on, as you did in some instances yesterday, and put amendments on this law, you are welcome to the credit that you will get for it. But as sure as we are here to-day, if we expect this law to have the respect of the people of this country, which it has had in the past and which it should have in the future, the Members of this House should not be swept off their feet in a moment by adopting every ill-considered and ill-advised amendment that is offered here.

That is all I have to say. I am interested in this legislation. I have been interested in it since its inception. I want to preserve it so that it will mean something in the future as it has meant something in the past, and that there will be nothing added to it that will make it disregarded and disrespected in the years that are to come.

I want to say further to the gentlemen of this House what we say here in reference to amendments in the formative stage of this law will be read hereafter as a precedent. We begin now at this early date, when this law is only in its infancy, when every man who went into the Army had the same opportunity, when some denied themselves in order to take out the insurance and protect themselves and their loved ones. Then you are going to do them the great and serious injustice of causing them to pay premiums and carry their policies and give the insurance to other people who did not want it because they had no dependents or because they did not want to deprive themselves as the other men did. You start this kind of a thing now and within a few years you will regret it.

Mr. DOMINICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I do.

Mr. DOMINICK. I would like to ask the gentleman if he thinks the soldier had equal opportunity——

Mr. RAYBURN. I think every soldier who went into the Army had 120 days in which to take out insurance; that he had the opportunity; it was his own fault if he did not take out the insurance, and it was his fault that he did not want it.

Mr. DOMINICK. Do you think that the soldier had an equal opportunity with his fellow soldier who came last in his company, when the application blanks had been exhausted, and he told his captain what insurance he wanted, told him who he wished to name as his beneficiary, and before he had opportunity to have presented to him the formal blanks that soldier died—do you think he had an equal opportunity with his fellow soldiers?

Mr. RAYBURN. He will be covered by the automatic insurance of $5,000, a gift from the Government, in addition to the compensation that will come to his dependents, if he has any.

Mr. DOMINICK. But his fellow soldier, who wanted $10,000 insurance and had an opportunity to apply regularly for it, received his policy, and his beneficiaries will get the $10,000; but this boy and 149 other cases who did not have an opportunity to sign application blanks get only $5,000.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; and this will open every avenue on earth to fraud and misrepresentation, because anybody could find somebody somewhere who would make an affidavit that the man had intended to take out insurance. The fact remains that he did not take it out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. DOMINICK].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. DOMINICK) there were—ayes 14, noes 53.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WILLIAMS: On page 11, in line 3, after the word "service," add:

"Provided, That any person in the active service on or after the 6th day of April, 1917, and before the 11th day of November, 1918, who while in such active service made application for insurance after the expiration of more than 120 days after October 10, 1917, or more than 120 days after entrance into or employment in the active service, and whose application was accepted and a policy issued thereon and from whom premiums were collected, and who becomes or has become totally and permanently disabled, or dies or has died, shall be deemed to have made a legal application for such insurance, and the policy issued upon such application shall be valid."

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Chairman, I recognize the force of the argument advanced by the committee that in a general bill revising this act it is impossible to provide for every particular case which Members may have in mind.

I think the amendment I have offered is worthy of the consideration of the committee, and should be incorporated in this bill. It simply provides that where a soldier in the active service who, after the lapse of 120 days in which he could legally make application for insurance under the law and rules of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, did in fact make application, believing that he was within his legal rights, and his application was accepted and a policy issued on such application and premiums deducted from his salary or paid by him, and afterwards he was killed in battle or died from wounds received in battle, that the policy shall be deemed valid, notwithstanding the fact that the application may have been made more than 120 days after the publication of this law or after his enlistment.

I do not know how many cases of this kind will be before the Bureau of War Risk Insurance—a very few, I imagine—but I know of one case, the one I mentioned yesterday. I have talked with the general counsel for the bureau about this case. The bureau would like to pay this policy if they could, but they feel that under the law they can not. As I stated yesterday, the facts were these: A young man from southern Illinois enlisted in the Regular Army in January, 1917, before our entrance into the war in April. He felt that war was imminent and he wanted to get into the Army where he could get into action. He was the son of a minister, a highly respected citizen of my district, but, like most ministers, a man in very straitened financial circumstances. The boy was accepted and went into the Artillery. He went over to France with Gen. Pershing with the first consignment of American troops. All through the summer and fall of 1917 and the winter of 1917–18 he was in such engagements as the Army had there, but he did not make application for his insurance within the time provided in this act.

In April, 1918, his conduct as a soldier had been such that he was admitted to a training camp in France, went through the training, and was commissioned as a second lieutenant of Artillery in July. Evidently at that time, when he was discharged as a private and received his commission as a lieutenant, he was advised that he was eligible and had a right to make application for insurance, and he immediately did. He filed his application in the regular way, on the regular blanks, and the application was accepted and the policy issued. He made his father the beneficiary in a policy of $10,000. The premiums were deducted from the young man's pay. Afterwards, just before the armistice, he was shot down on the field of battle. He gave his life for his country. The Bureau of War Risk Insurance notified his father that he had a policy of $10,000, sent him the proper blank on which to make application, and the proper blanks on which to make the proofs; but on consideration of the matter, when it was being adjudicated, it was found that this young man had not made application within the 120 days after the passage of the war-risk insurance act, and much as the bureau desires to pay the policy, they have felt that legally they can not do it. Here was a young man who had a policy that had been issued by his Government and the premiums had been deducted from his salary. His application was made in good faith. He died upon the field of battle. Yet as this bill now stands a policy of that kind is invalid, and the insurance can not be paid.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask for five minutes more, Mr. Chairman. I do not often take much time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that his time be extended five minutes. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. BEE. How does the gentleman propose to amend the bill?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The amendment has been read, but I will read it again. I undertake to say, as a legal proposition, that any old-line insurance company in the United States would be legally bound and required to pay a policy issued as this was.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Was the certificate of insurance actually issued by the bureau?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It was actually issued by the bureau.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Undoubtedly they are legally liable.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I undertake to say as a legal proposition—and I appeal to the lawyers of the House who have studied those propositions—that if this policy had been issued by the New York Life, or any old-line insurance company, it could be collected in any court in any State in this country, and for this reason: There was no fraud in the application. The facts were known. The application was accepted. The policy was issued, and premiums were paid on it, and I say that the Government of the United States, since that young man lost his life while carrying this policy, even though it may have been issued under what is now held to be a technically illegal application, should pay the insurance.

Here is the amendment; it does not open any floodgate for fraud:

On page 11, in line 3, after the word "service," add:
"Provided, That any person in the active service on or after the 6th day of April, 1917, and before the 11th day of November, 1918, who while in such active service made application for insurance after the expiration of more than 120 days after October 10, 1917, or more than 120 days after entrance into or employment in the active service, and whose application was accepted and a policy issued thereon and from whom premiums were collected, and who becomes or has become totally and permanently disabled or dies or has died, shall be deemed to have made a legal application for such insurance and the policy issued upon such application shall be valid."

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I will.

Mr. HASTINGS. Was the boy's policy issued before he was killed?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not sure about that, but I think it was. I will state that the only reason the policy has not been paid by the War Risk Insurance Bureau is that the application was filed after the lapse of 120 days.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am very much in sympathy with the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. IGOE. If the gentleman will yield, I want to call attention to a similar case where the policy was actually issued, but the formal application was made after the 120 days and the bureau held that it could not be paid.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, that policy ought to be paid. I have great respect for the committee, I have great respect for the ability and for the sincerity of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], who pleads with us so earnestly not to amend the bill, but the revision we are now making of this act will probably be final, for doubtless there will be no further revision for many years. Do you think the Congress of the United States would refuse, if a private bill of this kind was introduced, to pass it? I do not believe it would. I do not believe the great American people for whom these boys died would want the Congress of the United States to take that position. Why not do it now and validate the policies issued in good faith, where the premium was paid by the boys who lost their lives?

Mr. LANHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. LANHAM. Does the gentleman know how many cases of this kind exist and whether the bureau has made a practice of issuing insurance policies under these conditions?

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman will understand that this was done in France. I have had the matter up with the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and I have received the most courteous and considerate treatment from the officials of that great bureau. I have no criticism to make of them. I have taken the position that when the young man was discharged as a private his first service was terminated; that when he was commissioned it was a second contract of service, and his 120 days dated from that time, and they might properly pay the policy. The bureau is considering that point, but by adopting this amendment you can settle it for all time and not place the United States in the position of being the only insurance concern in the world that refuses to pay a policy where they have received the money of the insured, especially when the insured died on the field of battle fighting under the flag. [Applause.]

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Chairman, the Members will no doubt recall that a few days ago in a short speech which I made on the floor of the House I referred to an insurance case which I had in mind at the time. It does not come under this amendment, but is now covered by the provision of the bill then under discussion; but in the course of the remarks which I then submitted I said I believed that this great Government ought to pay every policy which had been issued by the Government upon the application of any soldier where the premiums had been paid and where he had sacrificed his life for his country. [Applause.]

The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WILLIAMS], it seems to me, covers that point, because in his amendment now pending and being considered it says that where the application has been accepted and the policy issued thereon, and premiums were collected and where the soldier became totally and permanently disabled or dies, or has died, that that policy shall be deemed to have been made upon legal application for such insurance and the policy issued on such application shall be valid. Let us carefully read the amendment. Now please listen; this is it:

Provided, That any person in the active service on or after the 6th day of April, 1917, and before the 11th day of November, 1918, who while in such active service made application for insurance after the expiration of more than 120 days after October 15, 1917, or more than 120 days after entrance into or employment in the active service, and whose application was accepted and a policy issued thereon, and from whom premiums were collected, and who becomes or had become totally and permanently disabled, or dies or has died, shall be deemed to have made legal application for such insurance and the policy issued on such application shall be valid.

If this amendment is adopted, when a soldier made his application and it was accepted and the policy of insurance was issued and the Government collected the premiums on that policy of insurance out of the soldier's pay and then that soldier becomes totally and permanently disabled, or dies, his insurance will be paid, and certainly where the policy has been issued and put in force by the Government and he has paid the money to secure the policy and to keep it in force and effect the Government should, upon his disability or death, pay that insurance. If he becomes totally disabled, he is entitled to the insurance under the provisions of the policy, and if he dies or is killed in the service his beneficiary is entitled to the insurance, and the Government should promptly pay it. For under those conditions he has complied with every requirement of the Government, he has complied with every requirement of the insurance policy. When he becomes disabled or suffers death, when he is killed on the field of battle, certainly this great Government can not afford under those circumstances to refuse to pay the policy of insurance. In all justice, in all right, in all law, in all equity and good conscience, when the soldier has complied with the contract which was made between him and the Government and has paid the premiums according to its terms, and becomes disabled or dies or is killed, the Government should keep its solemn obligation and pay the insurance. To do so is common honesty, and we must be at least honest with these brave boys and their beneficiaries. [Applause.]

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield?

Mr. CANDLER. Always, with pleasure, to my good friend.

Mr. HASTINGS. I heartily agree with what the gentleman from Mississippi says, but he wants to supplement the statement and say in the absence of any fraud, which there does not seem to be in this case.

Mr. CANDLER. Why, certainly. I am discussing cases which are honest, bona fide, and free from fraud or imposition upon the Government. Honest contracts, entered into in good faith between the soldier and his Government, in whose service he is engaged.

I have done all I could for these boys, who have so nobly and grandly and successfully served our country and brought victory to our flag in the past, and done my best for their loved ones, and I expect to continue to do so. I want every dollar of their insurance paid in accordance with their expressed wishes, for they should not only have that done, but should also have the eternal gratitude of all the people of this Republic for their patriotic service, their unselfish sacrifice and devotion to every duty which devolved upon them. This amendment should be adopted. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no further amendment to the text, the Clerk will report the McCulloch-Dowell amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MCCULLOCH and Mr. DOWELL: Page 12, line 11, after the word "regulation," add the following as a new section:
"SEC. 12½. The term insurance in force on the life of every commissioned officer and enlisted man or member of the Army or Navy Nurse Corps (female) on the date he leaves the active military or naval service shall be continued in force for two years after the end of the calendar month in which he is separated from the active service, without the payment of premium by the insured: Provided, however, That in the case of persons who are or have been so separated from the service and who have paid their premiums after being so separated the period of two years herein provided shall begin to run on the 1st day of the calendar month succeeding the passage of this act or on the 1st day of the calendar month succeeding the month for which the premium was last paid, whichever date is the earlier: Provided further, That every person who converts or has converted his term insurance before the expiration of the two-year period herein provided shall, during such period or remainder thereof, be entitled to a monthly credit on his premium for converted insurance equivalent to what the monthly premium on his term insurance would have been during the said two-year period if he had not converted it and if this amendatory act had not been passed."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, it is on the ground that the amendment is not germane and, if adopted, it would change the scope, intent, and purpose of the original act and also the amendments to that act that are presented in this bill. I make this point of order under clause 7 of Rule XVI, which reads as follows:

No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

Since the adoption of this rule, as far as I am able to learn, all amendments of this character have been ruled out of order, and I am quite sure that all Chairmen of Committees of the Whole and the eminent Speakers of the House have universally ruled that when we had a subject before the House to sell anything an amendment to lease or give it away was not in order, or if you had a proposition to lease an amendment to sell or give away was not in order, and, likewise, if the proposition was to give away you could not introduce an amendment to lease or sell.

Let us look at the exact condition that confronts us in this situation. The original war-risk insurance act was for the intent and purpose of selling life insurance to the sailors, soldiers, and marines of the late war. It was the intent that the Government should enter into a contract relation with each one of these individuals; that the Government would furnish to the soldiers insurance in time of war on the same basis that they could have obtained the same in time of peace. There was nothing mandatory about this law. It was purely a business matter that was entered into voluntarily on the part of the soldiers in connection with the Government whereby they purchased life insurance. That was the real intent and purpose of the whole act, while the amendment, if admitted, proposes to give it to them for a period of two years. I have examined the precedents on this subject quite carefully and find they all carry out my contention that this amendment is not in order, but I shall call the attention of the Chair to only two of them, which, in my opinion, are exactly on all fours with the proposition that is presented to us at this time and in which cases it was ruled by the Chairman that the amendments were out of order.

The first precedent to which I desire to call the attention of the Chair is found in Hinds' Precedents, volume 5, section 5877:

To a bill relating to the sale of the public lands an amendment proposing to give them to settlers was held not to be germane. On January 20, 1859, the House was considering the bill (H. R. 807) to amend the acts granting rights of preemption to settlers on the public lands of the United States, when Mr. Francis P. Blair, jr., of Missouri, proposed to submit an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the said bill, the general object of said amendment being—"To donate a homestead of 160 acres of public land, upon condition of occupancy and cultivation, to every citizen of the United States who is the head of a family."

Mr. Williamson R. W. Cobb, of Alabama, made the point of order that the amendment, not being germane to the bill, was out of order. The Speaker (Mr. James L. Orr, of South Carolina) said:

"The title of the bill reported from the Committee on the Public Lands describes its character; it is a bill to amend the acts granting rights of preemption to settlers on the public lands of the United States. The amendment of the gentleman from Missouri is the homestead bill, and proposes to give every man who is the head of a family a quarter section of land. The Chair does not perceive the slightest similarity between the regular sale of the public lands and the giving them away as a gratuity."

That is exactly the same condition that confronts us here. We have a proposition before us to sell insurance to soldiers, and an amendment proposes a gratuity in shape of giving to the soldiers the premiums on their policies for two years. The Speaker goes on further to state:

The policy is a very different one where the sale is regulated by law from that where the lands are given away. It would be as competent for the gentleman to amend the original bill reported from the Committee on the Public Lands by proposing to give all the public lands for school purposes in the several States, or to make any other like disposition of them which the fancy or caprice of any Member may dictate. It is on that ground that the Chair rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. Chairman, I would also call attention further in the same volume of Hinds' Precedents, Volume V, to section 5881:

The distribution of seed grain to a class of destitute farmers was held not to be germane to the regular congressional seed distribution for the improvement of agriculture. On February 25, 1891, the House was in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union considering the Agricultural appropriation bill, and the paragraph appropriating for the annual distribution of seeds, trees, shrubs, vines, etc., among the constituents of Members of Congress had been reached.

Mr. Edward P. Allen, of Michigan, offered an amendment providing for the distribution of seed grain to such farmers in the State of North Dakota, South Dakota, and Nebraska, and the Territory of Oklahoma as had had their crops destroyed by the elements in the year 1890, and who should be found to be too impoverished and destitute to supply themselves with seed grain for use in the year 1891.

Mr. Judson C. Clements, of Georgia, made a point of order against the paragraph.

The Chairman sustained the point of order, and it was sustained on the same grounds as the other precedent referred to.

Mr. Chairman, those precedents are almost exactly on all fours with the proposition we have before us at this time. The main intent and purpose of this whole act is to sell insurance to the soldiers on a contract, and if the amendment of the gentlemen from Ohio and Iowa [Mr. MCCULLOCH and Mr. DOWELL] is accepted and is ruled in order, to give the insurance for two years, it certainly would be in order to give it for four years, and if it be in order to give it for four years it would be in order to give it for eight years, and likewise for the entire term of insurance. I am sure that no man could stand on the floor of this House and sustain the claim that it was the intention or purpose of this act that we should ever give this insurance to the soldiers.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I maintain that on that ground the amendment is not germane, that it changes the scope, intent, and purpose of the bill, and that it can not be considered in order.

Mr. EMERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. EMERSON. The gentleman has made quite a study of the rules and I would like to ask this question: Would we have the right to suspend payment under this bill of the premium for one month?

Mr. SNELL. No, sir.

Mr. EMERSON. Does the gentleman distinguish between the suspension of a payment for 20 months, for instance, or two years, or one month, and indefinitely?

Mr. SNELL. There is not a line in any one of these acts, either the original or one now under consideration, that considers giving insurance to the soldiers one year, one month, or one day.

Mr. EMERSON. The gentleman does not think even for one month?

Mr. SNELL. No, sir; not one month or one hour. This is a contract of sale and not a gift of any kind, and can not be so considered.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Iowa on the point of order.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, the war-risk insurance law as originally adopted has at least three distinct parts. One provides for allotment and allowance. Another provides compensation, and still a third provides insurance for all soldiers, sailors, and marines in the World War.

The bill before the committee refers to the insurance part of the war-risk insurance law. It is an amendment to this law. For this insurance, however, or for the insurance policy, the law provides for a contribution or payment of premiums by the person who takes the insurance.

I now call attention to the rule that the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] has cited. This rule is as follows:

No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

In other words, it is improper to submit an amendment here which relates to any subject other than is contained in the bill under consideration.

Now I want to cite, if I may, though I assume the Chair is perfectly familiar with it, a concise construction of this rule by Speaker Carlisle where a question of order was raised relative to the germaneness of an amendment. I want to read just a clause of this ruling, and then I want to call attention specifically to the question involved in this amendment.

After citing the rule of the House that I have just read, and which rule has been in existence for many years, Speaker Carlisle said—I quote from volume 5, Hinds' Precedents, on page 423:

When, therefore, it is objected that a proposed amendment is not in order because it is not germane, the meaning of the objection is simply that it (the proposed amendment) is a motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration. This is the test of admissibility prescribed by the express language of the rule; and if the Chair, upon an examination of the bill under consideration and the proposed amendment, shall be of the opinion that they do not relate to the same subject he is bound to sustain the objection and exclude the amendment, subject, of course, to the revisory power of the Committee of the Whole on appeal.

Now, I submit that article 4 of the war-risk insurance law, and to which this bill is an amendment, contains provisions for the taking out and continuing this insurance, including the payment to the beneficiaries at the death of the insured. In fact, it contains all the law relative to the taking out, carrying, continuing, and payment of this insurance.

Now, I desire to call attention to the case cited by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] and I want to call attention to his statements relative to the purposes of this legislation, and which I claim incorrect. If the Chair will bear with me, I wish to say that the purpose of this legislation is not the sale of insurance. The purpose of this legislation is to furnish insurance to the soldiers, sailors, and marines in the Great World War and for the protection of their beneficiaries. This never was intended by the Government as a sale proposition. It is exclusively for their protection, or it never would have been enacted into law. And I submit the gentleman from New York has entirely mistaken the purpose of this legislation.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question right there?

Mr. DOWELL. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. If it was not a question of sale, what was it? Does not the original act provide what they shall pay for the insurance?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes; they made contracts.

Mr. SNELL. Was it not a definite contract between the individual and the Government?

Mr. DOWELL. They made a contract; yes, sir.

Mr. SNELL. A definite contract?

Mr. DOWELL. A definite contract; yes, sir.

Mr. SNELL. Has there been any insurance issued except what was paid for?

Mr. DOWELL. There has.

Mr. SNELL. What is it?

Mr. DOWELL. This bill has a provision in it in the section just read and passed by the committee, which provides that within the 120 days after entrance into the active service he "shall be deemed to have applied for and to have been granted insurance," when he may not in truth and in fact have carried a dollar of insurance. There was no contract and there was no contribution by the soldier. That is in the section we have just read. Yet the gentleman from New York insists that this amendment is not in order, because it fails to require each payment of premium.

I submit to the Chair, in view of the provisions of the section we have just passed, and which provisions are that within the 120 days he shall be deemed to have applied for and to have been granted the insurance, that this amendment is clearly in order.

Now, it seems to me that when we take into consideration the purpose of this legislation that it is for the benefit of the soldier who entered the service in the Great World War, and that it is the purpose of the Government to protect him and his dependents and beneficiaries, this amendment is clearly within the construction placed upon the rule by Speaker Carlisle, and that it relates to the same subject as the provisions of this bill, to wit, the insurance of soldiers, sailors, and marines. Every question in the war-risk insurance law is raised in the bill under consideration, and every phase of this insurance from the time it is taken until it has been paid to the beneficiaries is referred to in the bill. And my position is that under this bill, which covers practically all of the war-risk insurance law, we have the right to make an amendment which provides for the continuing of this insurance, as well as the distribution of the insurance policy.

I am earnest in my belief that the point of order should be overruled.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the question before the committee is a most important one. There is possibly no more important question in connection with the consideration of legislation than that of the germaneness of amendments. On a proper interpretation of the rule as to what classes of amendments are germane the entire regularity of our proceedings in legislation depends. If on a bill on a general subject of legislation any amendment can be offered, no matter how important and far-reaching, that ostensibly or on an over-liberal interpretation of the rule has to do either with the subject matter or the persons affected by the legislation, we will soon arrive at a condition in the House under which the labors of committees are put at naught and under which an orderly consideration of matters before the House can not be secured.

If the House may be surprised at any moment in the consideration of legislation with matters that are not logically and fairly within the purview and the domain of the question before the House, if the House may be suddenly called upon to consider matters that have had no consideration in committee or, having been considered in committee, have been laid aside as not germane to the matter before the House, we can not hope to legislate wisely or intelligently. Members should be informed as to what is to come before the House by reading bills that are to be considered. They should not be required to be prepared to pass upon questions not directly connected with the subject under consideration. If committees are to know what their rights are and the extent of their jurisdiction in considering legislation, there must be an adherence to a fair construction of the rule of germaneness.

What is the subject matter of this legislation? The subject matter of the legislation which this particular amendment is assumed to affect is insurance. What is insurance? Insurance is a system under which, on the meeting of certain obligations on the part of the insured, he or his beneficiaries are at a given time to receive certain benefits. No one asked to define insurance would ever assume to say that it was a plan under which one was to be given a bonus, under which one was to receive a gratuity, under which one was to receive considerable benefits without any corresponding obligations. That would not be insurance at all. And we are considering insurance; insurance for soldiers.

Now, it is true, as has been suggested by the gentleman from Iowa, that there are certain provisions in this bill under which there are modifications of the terms of the insurance. We provide in the bill and in the section that has just been read conditions under which certain individuals there named, and none other, are presumed to have paid the premiums on their insurance. An amendment to that provision to add others might or might not be germane. It would not be germane if it involved an entirely different class of persons under entirely dissimilar conditions. We in that case are laying down certain rules with regard to certain men in active service during the war and who by reason of that service lost their lives. It would not have been germane in connection with that to have added other classes of beneficiaries or to have provided in the future for the gift by the Federal Government of the sums of the premiums provided for. The rulings along these lines have been very clear and very definite.

We have for many years had a free distribution of seeds, and it would seem if one took a liberal view of these matters that on a bill providing for the free distribution of seeds we might properly provide for a distribution of seeds to certain classes of people in excess of the ordinary distribution. But it has been held that such an amendment as that is not germane. When we are providing for free homesteads, as we have in the past, if we were construing liberally the question of germaneness we might properly provide for a provision of commutation, which is in a way a modification or a liberalizing of the homestead obligation. But it has been held that that may not be done in connection with legislation of that character. And so on through a long line of decisions where the line of demarcation was very much more obscure than it is in the case before us. Here it is clear-cut between a proposition of insurance providing for certain premiums and obligations, upon meeting which in due course and in certain contingencies there are to be certain benefits, and an amendment providing for what amounts to a gift, a pension, a bonus, a gratuity.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment.

And following that thought for a moment, why those rulings? Because, unless you do have this rule of germaneness and apply it, amendments may be made on the floor that have no logical reference to the matter before the House.

I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not true that the War Risk Insurance Department is now reinstating those who have dropped the insurance or who have sought to retain their premiums without the payment of back premiums that were not paid at the proper time under the present law as it now exists?

Mr. MONDELL. What the service may do as a matter of administration and of ruling, I submit that my friend from Iowa will not insist has anything to do with or any relation to the question of the germaneness of a legislative amendment. We hear from time to time of departmental and administrative interpretations that either go beyond or fail sadly and signally to go to the extent of the provisions of legislation, but I assume that these matters of administration can not be held to in any wise affect the rule with regard to the germaneness of amendments. The departments may do curious things under the law. But our rule is not affected by their acts. Our rule was wisely adopted for the protection of the Congress in order that the Members might know that, a certain measure being brought before the House, they would not be called upon to pass upon matters far removed from and only remotely related, if related at all, to the matter under consideration.

Frequently these amendments are very appealing to us. Very frequently if they were presented to committees at the proper time and in the proper way, and presented to the House in the proper order of legislative procedure, they would appeal to the judgment of the House. But that is not the question. The question is, Shall the House of Representatives conduct its business in an orderly way? Shall we know, when legislative propositions appear before us, the limits of the amendments that can be proposed to them? Shall we be forewarned and forearmed with regard to the problems that we must meet, or shall we have unexpectedly thrust before us in a variety of amendments far-reaching questions of tremendous consequence, and of vast importance, that have never occurred to Members as being related to the matter before the House, that have never been considered as appertaining to the legislation; questions that require for their proper settlement, not the brief and hurried consideration of the Committee of the Whole but the calm and careful consideration of standing committees and of the membership of the House, forewarned and informed as to what is to be brought before them?

This amendment, Mr. Chairman, is so far afield; it is so foreign to the matter before us that it clearly comes within the condemnation of the rule, and the importance of the question involved emphasizes the necessity of adhering to proper construction of the rule.

Mr. TOWNER rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I admit the importance of the question under consideration, but I am utterly unable to follow the logic of the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] and that of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]. Gentlemen think here that this amendment is utterly at variance with the proposition under consideration under the terms of the bill. What is this proposition for consideration under the terms of the bill? The insurance of the soldiers; the insurance of the soldiers is the subject under consideration, and the provisions of the rule referring to germaneness declare—

No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

Certainly, the subject under consideration and the provisions of the amendment are identical, namely, the insurance of the soldiers of the late war. And, now, what is the effect of this amendment? I ask your careful consideration of this proposition, because on it is based the fallacy of the argument the gentleman has made. This is not a proposition for the taking out of insurance. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] cites this case: He says that a proposition embraced in a bill for the sale of public lands will not admit of a proposition for the giving away of public lands, and, by analogy, this bill being a proposition to sell insurance to soldiers, therefore you can not give insurance to soldiers. Without involving myself in the rightfulness of that proposition, which I do not admit, the gentleman's analogy is not perfect; in fact, there is nothing in it as applied to the proposition under consideration.

This is not a proposition to take out insurance. If the proposition before the House was the granting of insurance to soldiers upon the payment of premiums, then an amendment stating that it should be granted to them for nothing would not be germane, and that would be the analogy that the gentleman presents. But this is not a proposition for taking out insurance. It is a proposition for the prevention of the forfeiture of the policy by reason of nonpayment of the premiums. The provision of the bill is that if these premiums are not paid the insurance lapses.

Now, to say that you can not provide in the law to prevent lapse for any period, 30 days or 60 days or 90 days or a year or 2 years, is to say that you can not control, that you can not affect, the question of the lapsing of a policy at all; and that is the only question involved in this amendment.

The amendment provides, Mr. Chairman, that the insurance shall not lapse after having been taken out, after the premiums have been partly paid; shall not lapse until two years after the final payment, or after the end of the war, or after the return of the troops from France.

Now, Mr. Chairman, are we going to say that this not within the consideration of Congress, to say that when they shall declare that this premium already taken out, already paid for, shall not lapse? It is a proposition that everyone knows is a meritorious and righteous proposition. Two million of these soldiers have returned home from France after 18 months' absence, in some cases, from our country, and with 3,000 miles separating them from their homes and their business. These soldiers, many of them, Mr. Chairman, were unable to communicate during practically the entire time with their families, were unable to know what their business was, were unable in any way to acquaint themselves with the conditions at home. Now, when they come back here many of them have lost their positions, many of them are seeking employment, and many of them are without a dollar to take care of themselves; many of them are still left without any money to pay premiums; many of them are forgetting that this insurance was ever granted to them because of their anxiety and their misfortune.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Of course the gentleman is not discussing the point of order at all.

Mr. TOWNER. The gentleman is. The difficulty with the gentleman from Wyoming is that his anxiety to defeat this amendment prevents him from really seeing what it means.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the gentleman may say that; but, Mr. Chairman, in view of the gentleman's view of my position, I insist that the gentleman shall discuss the point of order.

Mr. TOWNER. I am discussing the point of order, as the gentleman will see. I am saying that this is connected directly with the question of insurance, and the reason for this amendment to prevent the lapsing of this forfeiture clause is not far to seek, and that is a proper subject for the consideration of the Chair.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question? The gentleman speaks of these young men who are in France and away from their business. If they have taken out a policy of insurance, is not the money deducted from their salary, and it continues on without any affirmative action on their part to keep it alive?

Mr. TOWNER, No; it is not, I will say to the gentleman. The difficulty is that most of the soldiers are not now in the service and the money can not be deducted from their salaries, for they receive no salaries.

Mr. BEE. After they have had the insurance issued to them, does not the War Department deduct from their salaries every month without affirmative action by them?

Mr. TOWNER. I am sure I do not know.

Mr. BRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. BRIGGS. Does not this bill deal with the gift of insurance as well as the sale of insurance under the limit of 120 days?

Mr. TOWNER. I will come to that. This, Mr. Chairman, is not a question of bargain and sale. It is not a question that is to be governed by rules of contract. Forfeitures are always opposed, even in the law, and certainly they ought not to be granted an undue extension under these conditions by an act of Congress.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Is the gentleman of the opinion that if this amendment were so framed as to exempt soldiers from the payment of insurance for 40 years, instead of 2 years, it would be germane?

Mr. TOWNER. I do not know whether it would or not. I have not considered that proposition.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Can the gentleman tell us where the line of demarcation would be?

Mr. TOWNER. That is always an argumentum ad absurdum, as is known to the gentleman. But certainly we have the right to consider a proposition to prevent the forfeiture of the policy when the time is limited and reasonable. As to whether the court would hold, if it were a question of legal interpretation, that it would not be in effect a proposition for the prevention of forfeiture, I do not know; but I do know this, that it is perfectly proper to consider under this act, which provides for an immediate 30 day or 60 day or 90 day extension, a proposition to extend it under the circumstances of this case, as is provided in this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, let us see. Gentlemen seem to think that under no circumstances would it be possible, as they say, to give something for nothing. Why, that is what we do by the very terms of the amendment offered. Any person in the active service before the expiration of 120 days, who has become totally and permanently disabled or dies without having applied for insurance, shall be deemed to have applied for and to have been granted insurance. Here we give insurance to these men, even when they have never applied for it. Under the amendment that was adopted here the other day we give insurance to these men even when the application has been refused. Talk about the terms of the contract applying in such cases as this. Ah, no, Mr. Chairman, this is something far more than a contract of insurance. Instead of giving this insurance to the soldiers, we have thought best to exact from them, not an adequate premium, not a premium such as insurance companies charge, but a small or nominal premium, in order that we may maintain the interest of the soldier in his own affairs. It is not payment for insurance that we have asked for. It is in effect a gratuity all the way through; and to apply the rule that gentlemen seek to apply in this case would not be justified by the precedents, would not be justified by the rules, would be contrary to the very object and purpose of this legislation.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. This is similar to the question I asked before. Would it be germane to provide that those soldiers, sailors, and marines who had taken out insurance should not hereafter be required to pay premiums?

Mr. TOWNER. That is not a proposition that I could answer; I do not know.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Is it not clear that that would not be germane?

Mr. TOWNER. I could not answer that question, and I would not admit it. I am trying to show—and I hope the gentleman will understand the distinction I am trying to make—that this proposition is not a question regarding the taking out of insurance. It is not a question of that sort at all. It is modifying the provisions of the existing law regarding forfeitures, and saying that the period shall be extended so that the contract of insurance shall not be forfeited for two years.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, in view of the rather gratuitous suggestion of my friend from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] that I was anxious to defeat this amendment, I simply want to say that I addressed myself entirely to the question of the germaneness of the amendment, as it is proper that one should do under these circumstances. I shall continue to do so. But in view of what the gentleman has said, I think it is entirely proper to say that I have a perfectly open mind on the question as to what it might be proper to do in modifying the obligations of insurance when the matter is presented to us at the proper time and in the proper way. It is not so presented to us now under the rules of the House, and I object to the consideration of it at a time and under circumstances when it is not and can not under the rules be properly considered.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I yield to the gentleman from Washington.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does the amendment propose to give insurance to men outside of the service whose insurance has lapsed, and does it propose to let men in the service lapse their premiums and still keep up insurance?

Mr. MONDELL. The amendment is quite a long one——

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. In other words, can a man who is in the service now lapse his insurance?

Mr. MONDELL. It is a proposition relieving, for the period of two years, a large class of persons from the payment of premiums.

Mr. SNELL. After you have taken away all the embellishments from this amendment, is it not the cold fact that it gives insurance for two years?

Mr. MONDELL. That is what it amounts to.

Mr. SNELL. That is all there is to it.

Mr. MONDELL. It is a pure gratuity.

Mr. BAER. That is what we want.

Mr. MONDELL. Some one says "that is what we want." I am not quarreling with that desire. I am objecting to the consideration of that particular matter in this bill at a point where it is not germane.

Now, just one word more on the final argument made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER], coming back to the provisions now in the bill. The rule of germaneness has been repeatedly drawn between different classes of beneficiaries; and even assuming for the sake of argument that what now remains in the bill by the striking out of certain provisions would have been germane if it had been offered in the form of an amendment, the fact still remains that under the rulings that have been referred to, scores of rulings that have been made at one time and another, you can not extend a class of beneficiaries. Even assuming that certain benefits are proposed, you can not under the rule extend benefits under entirely dissimilar conditions or to an entirely different class. That is clearly settled by the two cases that I just referred to and the cases referred to by the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. Fortunately the Chair is not called upon to decide the merits of the proposed legislation. As Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union it is his duty to construe the rules according to the best practice and precedents of the House.

As we all know, there is a tendency in this House and in the body at the other end of this Capitol to attach all sorts of legislation to bills in the form of what are called riders. This has been carried to such an extent that sometimes matters entirely unrelated and incongruous are combined in the same bill, to the detriment of the law as to clearness of meaning and to the despair of persons trying to find the law after it is enacted.

Rule XVI, paragraph 7, provides that—

> No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.

What is the subject under consideration? The subject under consideration is a bill amending the war-risk insurance act in several respects. Section 400 of article 4 of the war-risk insurance act provides—

> That in order to give to every commissioned officer and enlisted man, etc., when employed in active service under the War Department or Navy Department, greater protection for themselves and their dependents than is provided in article 3, the United States, upon application to the bureau and without medical examination, shall grant insurance against the death or total permanent disability of any such person in any multiple of $500, and not less than $1,000 or more than $10,000, upon the payment of the premiums as hereinafter provided.

The words "as hereinafter provided" evidently refer to sections 401, 402, 403, 404, and 405.

Section 401 prescribes the time for making applications. It also makes provision for persons in service disabled or dying without applying for insurance, allowance if disabled, allowance in case of death, and limitation of payments to 240 installments.

Section 402 provides the form of policy, viz:

> That the director, subject to the general direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall promptly determine upon and publish the full and exact terms and conditions of such contract of insurance.

Section 402 also provides that the insurance shall be nonassignable for alternative policies, the basis of premiums, and the beneficiaries.

Section 403 provides—

> That the United States shall bear the expenses of administration and the excess mortality and disability cost resulting from the hazards of war. The premium rates shall be the net rates based upon the American Experience Table of Mortality, and interest at 3½ per cent per annum.

Section 404 provides for term insurance during the war, for conversion after the termination of war, and for conversion rights.

Section 405 provides for disagreements, attorney fees, and so forth.

The subject under consideration is not "insurance," nor even "war-risk insurance," but the "granting of insurance by the United States upon the payment of premiums." In short, article 4 provides for insurance upon the payment of premiums. There is nothing in the law which would indicate that it was the intention of Congress to give insurance or to fix premium rates or payments, except by means of the American Experience Table of Mortality.

The joint amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MCCULLOCH] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] proposes to amend the bill by adding a new section as follows:

> The term insurance in force on the life of every commissioned officer and enlisted man or member of the Army or Navy Nurse Corps (female) on the date he leaves the active military or naval service shall continue in force for two years after the end of the calendar month in which he is separated from the active service, without the payment of premium by the insured: Provided, however, That in the case of the persons who are or have been so separated from the service and who have paid their premiums after being so separated the period of two years herein provided shall begin to run on the first day of the calendar month succeeding the passage of this act or on the first day of the calendar month succeeding the month for which the premium was last paid, whichever date was the earlier: Provided further, That every person who converts or has converted his term insurance before the expiration of the two-year period herein provided shall, during such period or the remainder thereof, be entitled to a commutation credit on his term or converted insurance equivalent to what the monthly premium on his term insurance would have been during the said two-year period if he had not converted it and if this amendatory act had not been passed.

What is the subject of the proposed amendment? "The term insurance in force shall be continued in force for two years without the payment of premiums." The object of this amendment, when stripped of all verbiage and reduced to its last analysis, is to give to the insured two years' free insurance.

In other words, the present law, as well as the bill under consideration, provides for insurance upon the payment of premiums, while the McCullough-Dowell amendment provides for insurance without the payment of premiums. Surely such a radical change of the policy of the Government presents a different subject within the inhibition of the rule.

In Hinds' Precedents (v. 5877) is cited a case in point:

> To a bill relating to the sale of the public lands an amendment proposing to give them to settlers was held not to be germane.

Clearly the two propositions are related, but "two subjects are not necessarily germane because they are related."

The following have been held not to be germane (Hinds' Precedents, v. 5882):

> To a proposition relating to the terms of Senators, an amendment changing the manner of their election; to a general tariff bill, an amendment providing for the creation of a tariff board.

Many other cases can be cited, some of which the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] has referred to and from which he has read extracts.

The Chair is not altogether able to follow the logic of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER] in his contention that the proposition of the amendment is not the granting of free insurance, but is to prevent the lapsing or forfeiture of policies. If the gentleman will refer to the act, section 401, he will find this provision:

> Any person in the active service on or after the 6th day of April, 1917, who while in such service and before the expiration of 120 days from and after such publication he becomes or has become totally and permanently disabled, or dies or has died, without having applied for insurance, he shall be deemed to have applied for and to have been granted insurance, payable to such person during his life in monthly installments.

And so forth.

Mr. DOWELL. May I submit an inquiry to the Chairman?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will allow the gentleman to interrupt him.

Mr. DOWELL. Under that law, under this amendment, does it not continue in force the insurance when we presume it was applied for until the death of the person who was presumed to have taken out the insurance?

The CHAIRMAN. A contract is implied by the presumption that the man has done that which he ought to have done, viz: applied for the insurance, and the law proceeds to make for him the necessary contract, by providing that he "shall be deemed to have applied for and to have been granted insurance."

A case involving the same principle occurred during the present session.

On June 17, 1919, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] offered an amendment to the Senate amendment No. 21 on the deficiency appropriation bill. The Senate amendment directed the Secretary of the Treasury to complete the hospital at Broadview in Chicago, and also amended section 6 of the act approved March 3, 1919, creating an emergency fund of $1,500,000 for the United States Public Health Service. Mr. GOOD's amendment restricted the Secretary of the Treasury as to taking further action under a number of sections of the above act.

The Speaker sustained the point of order, setting out his reasons in a carefully prepared ruling. As stated at the outset, the duty of the Chair is to so interpret the rules as to preserve as far as possible the best parliamentary practice of the House. By so doing orderly procedure in the House is established and maintained to the great advantage of the public business. If the present occupant of the Chair would follow the long line of precedents clearly established, he must of necessity sustain the point of order. [Applause.]

The Chair sustains the point of order made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL].

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That the permitted class of beneficiaries for insurance as specified in section 402 of the war-risk insurance act is hereby enlarged so as to include, in addition to the persons therein enumerated, uncles, aunts, nephews, nieces, brothers-in-law, and sisters-in-law of the insured. This section shall be deemed to be in effect as of October 6, 1917: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to interfere with the payment of the monthly installments authorized to be made under the provisions of said war-risk insurance act, as originaly enacted and subsequently amended, up to and including the second calendar month after the passage of this act: Provided further, That all awards of insurance under the provisions of the said war-risk insurance act, as originally enacted and subsequently amended, shall be revised as of the first day of the third calendar month after the passage of this act, in accordance with the provisions of the said war-risk insurance act as hereby modified.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 12, line 16, after the word "insured," strike out the period, insert a comma, and add "and the fiancée of the insured, named as such in the application, where the agreement to marry was entered into prior to April 6, 1917, and where no father, mother, or child or dependent brother or sister survive the applicant."

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of the amendment is to take care of instances where the soldier, sailor, or marine took out insurance and was allowed to name in the application his fiancée as his beneficiary, where a policy was issued in which the fiancée so named was named as the beneficiary, and a number given, and where an assignment was made out by the soldier, sailor, or marine to pay the premium. I have in mind a particular instance of this kind, and have heard of others.

This, however, is to apply only where the agreement to marry was entered into prior to our entry into the war, in order to avoid any question of fraud that might arise because of undue influence on the part of certain women in securing engagements to marry soldiers. The situation is this: A man and women in the ordinary course of human events were engaged prior to April 6, 1917, to be married, and would have been married in pursuance of that agreement. The soldier entered the service and took out a policy of insurance and named his fiancée in his application as his beneficiary. A policy was issued with the fiancée as beneficiary, and he paid the premiums thereon, having no immediate blood relations to whom the money might be paid. In such case, I believe, in all justice, his will and intention in the circumstances ought to prevail, and this amendment will so authorize.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. SWEET. I would say to the gentleman that after looking over the amendment carefully the committee have no objection to it as worded.

Mr. HAWLEY. Then I have nothing further to say.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. If I understand the gentleman's amendment, if this soldier made out the application in favor of his fiancée, but, nevertheless, happened to have a father and mother or brothers and sisters, she would not get the money under the amendment?

Mr. HAWLEY. She can not be paid the money under the present law.

Mr. BLACK. I do not see any equity in that, in putting on such a limitation as that.

Mr. HAWLEY. I discussed the matter with the subcommittee, and it seemed advisable to give a father, mother, child, or dependent brother or sister a prior right.

Mr. BLACK. It occurs to me that would be a limitation that would work out a good deal of inequity.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think it is a very proper limitation for this reason. When you open up in this way the list of beneficiaries, if we do not place the limitation upon it there are going to be efforts at fraud in a great many cases; and where you place the limitation as it is, of father, mother, brother, and sister, and so forth, it reduces the opportunity for fraud. It seems to me that if we put in the fiancée at all, it is wise to insert the limitation.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that his amendment applies only to contracts of marriage entered into prior to April 6, 1917?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Take the case where a young man was drafted, for illustration, in May or June, 1918, who entered into a contract of marriage, say, the Christmas before, having in mind that he might or might not be called for Army service when inducted into the service. Suppose he made out his contract of insurance to the girl to whom he was engaged the same as the man whose engagement took place prior to April 6, 1917. Why should not the amendment apply to a case like that with the same force and effect as to a case where the contract of marriage existed prior to April 6, 1917?

Mr. HAWLEY. The objection to recognizing engagements entered into after April 6, 1917, was this, that when the boys were being drafted or knew they were going to be drafted, and were assembled in camps and cantonments, many scheming women, playing upon their affections, under unusual circumstances, induced them to enter into contracts of marriage. The cases I have provided for are only cases of engagements where the contract was made prior to our entry into the war, and no such conditions of fraud or temptation to fraud could occur. Later legislation could take care of other deserving instances.

Mr. RAMSEYER. But I understand, as the gentleman suggests, that these cases of scheming women were chiefly around camps where soldiers were about the time that the war-risk insurance act was passed, and did not take place among the boys who were still at home. If the gentleman's amendment is to be adopted in its present form, I think it is improper and unjust to limit it the way in which the gentleman has limited it, and thus exclude all fiancées who became engaged to soldiers after our declaration of war.

Mr. LITTLE. The purpose back of the limitation in respect to date has some wisdom about it, but I am very dissatisfied with that rule as established. Doubtless there are scheming women who take advantage of such situations and get the boys into situations where they would have the better of the result, but gentlemen ought not to forget that there is no love affair more sacred or more honorable than the love affair of a boy who becomes engaged to be married to a girl just before he goes to war and perhaps to death; and when you undertake to stigmatize all of those engagements you do a very great wrong to many, many thousands of young men and women in this country. I know a Member of this Congress who became engaged to be married to a young lady the evening before he left for the Philippine Islands years ago, and I happen to know that there is no event in his life—nothing that he ever did—that has given him as much absolute satisfaction, and of which he is as proud, as he is of that, and on his behalf and that of his comrades I want to request this committee to remove that stigma in some way from these young women who will be affected by this amendment. "The maid that binds her warrior's sash" has been the theme of song and story for 6,000 years. You pay her every tribute on earth until it gets to the point where you can do something for her, and then you put it in your law that she is a disgrace to the country. I earnestly trust that this committee will arrange such a wording of this part of the statute, or some part of the gentleman's amendment, that we do not undertake to say that it is a disgrace to be engaged to be married the day you go off to war,

If you are going to say to every girl in the country, "Do not become engaged to a soldier the day before he goes to war, perhaps to die for his country, because it is a disgrace"; if you are going to say to these soldiers, "The girl to whom you have bound yourself through life, to whom you have wanted to propose for perhaps a month, and only do so on the spur of the courage of your last moments, is not a proper subject for poetry and song but is a scheming creature who seeks to aggrandize herself at your expense and that of the Government," then there is something wrong about your amendment, and this wise committee ought to have sense enough to fix this up so that it would not carry that imputation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I want to ask some one connected with the committee how it was possible legally for a man taking out his insurance as a soldier to name his fiancée.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have a particular case in point where the soldier did name his fiancée as the beneficiary.

I have the number of the certificate. The certificate was issued. The insurance, I grant, was payable to a certain class of beneficiaries.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes. Now, this man had no blood relations?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; but this would take care of certain cases where the officers handling the insurance told the men to write in something foreign to the law and——

Mr. HAWLEY. And the bureau passed it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. But in many cases, let me say to the gentleman, when the soldier undertook to write an insurance premium or application that would be in the nature of a will, willing it to his estate, which the law did not contemplate, or willing it to his fiancée, the officers of this camp in charge of insurance matters turned those applications back and required the soldiers to write them in accordance with the form of the law, so the gentleman's amendment would reach some who made out applications not within the intent of the law and deny many others whose applications were turned back by the officer.

Mr. HAWLEY. But the gentleman would not deny justice to some where justice is due?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Certainly not. I know cases in my own district identical with the gentleman's, and it does seem to me that if it had been known or even suspected that men could name their fiancées there would have been hundreds of thousands instead of the few that got by. I yield back whatever time might be remaining.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. All the world loves a lover, and one is taking chances of appearing in an ungracious attitude by opposing an amendment of the sort suggested by the gentleman from Oregon, which it is claimed would afford a balm to the sweet souls of certain ladies who were alleged to have been the fiancées of soldiers. The American soldier has all the romance of the race and of his period of life. I had a curious experience when I made an earnest effort to keep a soldier from being court-martialed because of the fact that he had named in an application for an allowance as his wife a fair daughter of the Sunny South, who, when the allowance was sent her, modestly suggested that she did not bear the relation of wife to the soldier, but only that of a good friend.

I felt that this little slip on the part of the soldier in reporting a relationship that did not exist might lead him into serious trouble, and I begged the War Department to overlook his departure from the exact truth as the thoughtless act of a lovelorn and impulsive youth and not court-martial him, whereupon I was assured that if they were to court-martial all of the romantic young gentlemen who had made that particular slip we would have had a very considerable number of our gallant forces undergoing courts-martial proceedings. The young lady in the case I have referred to was honest, and therefore no harm was done, and all was forgiven and forgotten. Now, there may be cases coming under the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Oregon that are meritorious, but I submit that we are going a little far afield to adopt amendments of this sort.

No doubt there are and will be discovered a few meritorious cases which do not fall within the general rules adopted and the general provisions which are made. These cases should be provided for, but it would be a great mistake to attempt to so broaden the general provisions of the law as to include every one of the cases which have come to the attention of Members as having some merit. In so doing by a general broad provision one may or may not include a particular case a Member has in mind, but we are quite certain to include many other cases with little or no merit in such a provision. The committee has been liberal in the drafting of this bill, and properly so, for we owe much to these soldiers and to their families, but we are not showing proper regard either to the interests of the taxpayers of the country or to the distinction and recognition due those who are worthy and deserving if we include cases in which there is no obligation on the part of the country.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oregon.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON), there were—ayes 13, noes 21.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, in view of some amendments which have been adopted, I wish to offer an amendment to the latter part of the section. Page 13, line 4, strike out the words "hereby modified" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "as modified by this amendatory act."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SWEET: Page 13, line 4, strike out the words "hereby modified" and insert in lieu thereof the words "as modified by this amendatory act."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a pro forma amendment to strike out the section. Mr. Chairman, I want to submit an observation upon one feature of this section 31, which is also applicable to section 4. Under the law as it now stands insurance may be made payable only to a very restricted number of relatives. For illustration, under the law as it now stands a soldier can not take insurance payable to his uncle. If a soldier should name his uncle as beneficiary, the insurance would not be paid to the uncle but would be paid to such person, in the event of the soldier's death, as under the laws of the State of the soldier's residence would have inherited his personal property had the soldier died intestate. That is the law as it now stands. This section 13 amends that law so as to include uncles and other relatives as eligible beneficiaries.

Now, the important feature of this amendment proposed by this section is the fact that it is made retroactive to October 6, 1917, and this is the aspect to which I desire to call attention. With the law as here amended the uncle, for instance, to whom insurance was made payable will be substituted in the payment of benefits for the person who may now be drawing the benefits under the provision of law referred to. Under the Constitution of the United States as contained in the fifth amendment thereto "property" may not be taken without due process of law. The courts have held property to include "choses in action," "rights to receive payments," "claims," "vested interests," and various other things of that kind. Undoubtedly "property" as used in the Constitution would include the right of a beneficiary to the proceeds of insurance vested in that beneficiary by the death of the insured. For instance, under the soldiers' insurance law, upon the death of a soldier, a property—an interest in his insurance—is vested in his beneficiaries, which can not be taken away by the Congress, because it is property and the Constitution protects it.

Now, then, let us take the case in which a soldier has made his insurance payable to his uncle. The uncle not being within the limited class of eligible beneficiaries the law writes into that contract of insurance the name of the soldier's heir under the law of the State, we will say the parents of the soldier, the father, and that insurance becomes payable to the father at once upon the death of the soldier. The property interest in that insurance is vested in the father and it can not be taken away from him by an act of Congress.

Now, then, what is the result of this? This provision of the law is retroactive. If it is operative according to its terms, it would take away from one beneficiary, who has under the law a vested interest in the insurance, whatever right he has and confer it on one of these beneficiaries named by this amendment. In the case stated, by way of illustration, it will deprive the father who has become entitled to the insurance by operation of law of the payments of same and will give all future payments to the uncle named by the soldier as beneficiary. Of course, that will be to carry out the soldier's purpose, and the question has interest only from the legal standpoint. I am discussing it from that standpoint only. But this change in beneficiary is just what can not be worked by an act of Congress; the Constitution forbids it; it takes the father's "property," his vested interest in the insurance.

In the case stated, as an illustration, this change in the law will change the beneficiary of the insurance. As the law now stands the case is just as though the soldier had designated his father as his beneficiary. This is the legal effect of his having named another person, his uncle, who was outside of the limit, and to pass this amendment of it it will on its face have the effect to take away the interest the father has in this insurance and give it to the uncle. Now, that can not be done under the Constitution of the United States. What will probably be done? This act gives the right to recover to uncles and other heretofore excluded classes of beneficiaries, and I very much fear that under section 4 and section 13 we will find a double liability arising, in which both the father, who is entitled to recover under the insurance certificate according to the law as it existed at the time his interest vested, and the uncle, who is now made a possible beneficiary under this section, will both have a right of action against the United States and entitled to recover this insurance. A double liability will exist, double payment must be made, two parties will each collect the insurance in full, the Government will have to pay $20,000 to discharge a $10,000 insurance.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the section and amendments thereto do now close.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves that all debate on the section and amendments thereto be now closed.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. TINKHAM. I desire to offer an amendment to section 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can offer his amendment after the debate is closed, if he wishes to do so.

Mr. TINKHAM. Will the honorable Representative from Iowa give me five minutes in which to offer an amendment?

Mr. SWEET. I will modify the motion, then, to five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman modifies his motion, to the effect that the debate close in five minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman may offer an important amendment, and I think the gentleman from Iowa should say 10 minutes, so that he can reply if he wishes to do so.

Mr. SWEET. Then, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Texas, I ask that the debate close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa that all debate close in 10 minutes.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, we do not know what the amendment is. Would not the gentleman withhold his request until the gentleman from Massachusetts has presented the amendment?

Mr. SWEET. I withdraw the motion for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa withdraws his motion for the present. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Chairman, is there not an amendment pending to strike out the section?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I desire to strike out the section on page 11, from line 12, through line 4, on page 13, and offer as an amendment the substitute section now in the hands of the Clerk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That section 402 of the war-risk insurance act is hereby amended by striking out in lines 4, 5, and 6 the words, "The insurance shall be payable only to a spouse, child, grandchild, parent, brother, or sister, and also during the total and permanent disability to the injured person, or to any or all of them," and inserting in lieu thereof the following words, "The insurance shall be payable to any person whom the insured desires to name, and that it may also be assigned by the insured, and also shall be payable during total and permanent disability to the injured person or to any person whom the insured has named or to whom any assignment has been made." This amendment shall be deemed to be in effect as of October 6, 1917: Provided, That nothing herein shall be construed to interfere with the payment of the monthly installments authorized to be made under the provisions of said war-risk insurance act, as originally enacted and subsequently amended, up to and including the second calendar month after the passage of this act: Provided further, That all awards of insurance under the provisions of the said war-risk insurance act, as originally enacted and subsequently amended, shall be revised as of the first day of the third calendar month after the passage of this act, in accordance with the provisions of the said war-risk insurance act as modified by this amendatory act.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa reserves a point of order, and the gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the committee should adopt this amendment. The amendment removes the restrictions in relation to beneficiaries and makes it a broad and liberal policy of insurance. The committee has declared time and time again that it desired to make this policy of insurance as broad and liberal and generous as the Government possibly could make it. Instead of doing that, as the bill now stands and as amended by this committee, it is restricted very much more than private companies restrict their policies. The amendment allows the insured to say who without restriction shall be a beneficiary.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. TINKHAM. In one moment. It also allows the insured to assign the policy. These are two valuable rights given under a private policy, and which I believe public interest dictates should be incorporated as a part of the theory and application of this Government insurance.

I yield to the honorable Representative from Minnesota.

Mr. ANDERSON. Is it the gentleman's idea that by this amendment we should waive the usual requirement that the beneficiary shall have an insurable interest?

Mr. TINKHAM. It is not.

Mr. ANDERSON. That is what the amendment does.

Mr. TINKHAM. That amendment might be added to my amendment, except that would open a question of judicial interpretation by the Supreme Court as to what was or was not an insurable interest.

In many cases ordinary insurance policies are assigned. They are assignable and have been assigned by many Members of this Congress, no doubt, to help them when they have been in possible financial stress. Why should the soldier not have that right? It is a valuable right; it is a right that naturally goes with insurance. Why should a Government, and why should a committee which says it wants to be generous, eliminate that fundamental right, that important right, that valuable right, from this character of insurance. It does not seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that this committee is living up to its protestations of liberality, nor does it seem to me that it is living up to what are true and sound matters of public policy, namely, the giving of a policy of insurance, underwritten by the Government, which is as broad as that given by private companies. I hope that the amendment will be adopted. And I would like a statement from some member of the committee as to just what are the sound common-sense objections to this amendment, not super-reasons and not reasons which are too fine spun. Why should not a man in a Government insurance policy have at least as liberal rights and liberal treatment as under the policies of private companies?

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I will.

Mr. RAYBURN. The reason why the committee refused to put an amendment like that in the law was that we wanted to protect the soldier and those really dependent upon him, and, as we wrote into the law to begin with, in order to give every commissioned officer and enlisted man and every member of the Army Nurse Corps, female, when employed in the active service under the War Department and Navy Department, greater protection for themselves and their dependents.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] is recognized.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman from Massachusetts have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAYBURN. The reason why we did not bring this in was so that a man could not assign this policy to anybody, and so that the beneficiary could not assign it to anybody, and dissipate it in that way.

We wanted this to be a continuing protection to the soldier while he lives and a continuing protection for his dependents after he dies. That is the reason why we did not throw the beneficiary class wide open, because we wanted it to apply to him and to those dependent on him. That is why we did not make it assignable in all instances.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the honorable Representative from Texas this question, whether now, after the end of the Great War, the reason for that public policy has not been largely eliminated?

Mr. RAYBURN. I will admit that that is so.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana makes a point of order against the amendment. What is the gentleman's point of order?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The point of order is this: This amendment is merely a copy of a bill that the gentleman introduced, and is not in proper form as an amendment here. I have just the bill as marked; I do not know just exactly how it was presented; but so far as the amendment is concerned it says in substance, "The war-risk insurance act provision is hereby amended by striking out certain words or lines."

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. TINKHAM. The amendment having been debated, a point of order can not be raised against it.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order was reserved, as the Chair understands. That being so, it is in order to debate it.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The amendment evidently is not in intelligible form.

The CHAIRMAN. That does not make it out of order. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I think it is subject to a point of order because this act itself does not set out section 402 of the original act. It does not amend it in terms or set out section 402, and if this amendment is inserted as provided here it would be absolutely unintelligible. It contains the provision that section 402 of the war-risk insurance act is hereby amended by striking out in lines 4, 5, and 6 certain language and inserting in lieu thereof the following words: "The insurance shall be assignable to anybody that the insured desires to name," and so forth.

Now, in order that that should be in proper form before the House and not subject to a point of order, it would have to set out section 402 as it would read as amended.

Mr. ANDERSON. The bill itself does not do that.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The bill itself does not refer to section 402 except to enlarge the beneficiaries. It is further subject to the point of order for the reason that the amendments already adopted by this House fix the beneficiaries, and this proposes to strike out and undo what the committee has already done. It is subject to an additional point of order because in the last proviso there it seems to require a revision of the law. I confess I do not know just what the purport of it is, but if it requires a revision of the law it certainly is not germane to this section.

The CHAIRMAN. This amendment was submitted hurriedly by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] and evidently is not in the most approved form. A bill heretofore introduced by the gentleman has been hastily transformed into an amendment, and as offered may not be entirely clear, but so far as the Chair is able to determine from a hasty perusal of a somewhat lengthy bill, whatever meaning it may have, it is surely germane to the bill and to the section under consideration. Therefore the Chair overrules the point of order made by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS]. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this amendment be closed.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Will you let me have five minutes to speak on this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves that all debate close——

Mr. SWEET. In five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. In five minutes. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I hope that this amendment will be adopted by the committee.

All my life I have had a habit of endeavoring to convey my meaning as felicitously as I could by way of story and illustration, and I am going to tell you a story that I think is peculiarly applicable to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM], which, as I said before, I sincerely trust will be adopted by this committee and by the House of Representatives finally.

Years ago one of the most distinguished gentlemen in the State of Louisiana and one of the most prominent civilians in the legal history of this country, and who was going down by some cruel stroke of fortune into poverty, spent his declining days in reading history and telling stories, and he told me a story that he said had almost annihilated all of the sentiment that had come to him from his great mother, whom he loved with an affection that was almost indescribable. He told me that Jean Jacques Rousseau, when he was at the height of his literary fame, received a letter from a Russian nobleman, in which "Jean Jacques" was told that his philosophical writings had so commended themselves to this gentleman, who was born to a fortune and had acquired still greater fortune, that he had made a will that day and left to Rousseau a million rubles. And Jean Jacques Rousseau, in the estimation of his confreres and of the then literary world, proved that he was a great philosopher by writing back to the nobleman, "If you love me on account of my writings in behalf of the world, as you evidently do in making that will, destroy the will instantly and give me an annuity, and then I will wish that you may live forever, whereas if that will should remain in existence I will pray almost hourly that you die in order that I may come into fortune. Do not place me between my duty and that which is despicable in human nature, but which constantly asserts itself, self-interest."

And I thought, too, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, that that was illustrative of human nature generally. It was some years afterwards, when I joined one of the finest organizations that ever was brought into existence in this country, that I learned that that was not so, and that Jean Jacques Rousseau did not correctly portray the splendid things that men and women can do in this world. The organization I refer to was founded upon the beautiful story of Damon and Pythias, whose history and romantic friendship shines through the mist of centuries—a story that has exalted millions of men in this country; and I learned to understand what ought to be obvious to every man, that the most powerful affection that can appeal to human nature does not always reside within the cry and appeal of the blood. Men love women that are not related to them by blood, and men love each other and will go down into the shadow of the grave without any tie by blood of mother or father. Brothers, as a rule, associate only under the paternal and maternal roof. The finest friendships may be formed as a result of the romance and adventure that, thank God, comes into the life of each of us like Tennyson's Rain, and by making it alternate sunshine and shadow relieves it from the terrible drabness and monotony of sameness.

This amendment, as I understand it, provides when there is neither mother nor father living, nor fraternal or sisterly ties, the assured may have a larger class from which to select the beneficiary. In other words, after requiring a recognition of natural affections the amendment permits the soldier boy a larger field in which sentiment might find a true and lofty expression. If he knew that it was splendid to offer his life for his country, its ideals, and its flag, why not concede him the right to gratify the holy and sublime sentiment of love and friendship which broadens the vision, tempers the heart, and makes golden the hearthstone where we with loved ones dwell. They may select their friends in a world of strife, and from those soldiers that were on the battle line with them, and I want to give our boys the opportunity the gentleman accords them through his amendment of picking out some splendid friend who has been willing at all times to open his arms to the unfortunate when days of misfortune have come, and not restrict a man to people who may be related to him by ties of blood, and who feel that what they do for him is prompted by what the world calls duty. I want him to look out into the great, broad field of sentiment and pick out the beneficiary that he determines upon. For that reason I hope that the amendment will be adopted. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. TINKHAM. I further doubt the vote. Division, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. FOCHT. "I further doubt the vote." That is a Massachusetts expression for calling the cows in off the common. [Laughter.]

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 6, noes 38.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DOWELL. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. FOCHT. I make a similar request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Pennsylvania ask unanimous consent to extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That if no person within the permitted class of beneficiaries survive the insured, then there shall be paid to the estate of the insured an amount equal to the commuted value of the monthly installments of yearly renewable term insurance granted under the provisions of article 4 of the war-risk insurance act, payable and applicable, calculated on the basis of interest at the rate of 3½ per cent per annum.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Chairman, I will vote for this bill, and congratulate the committee upon the production of such a good measure. But when we pass this bill we have not discharged our obligations to the soldiers, sailors, and marines, and their dependents. We owe protection to every man who entered this war, whether he took out insurance or not. We took these men from their homes, from their positions, and sent them miles from home, and we should not quibble now for a minute on technicalities.

We must care for every man who was injured in this war, and we must care for his dependents, irrespective of this law, and I am rather inclined to the opinion that the Government should not require the soldier, sailor, or marine to be put to any expense at any time.

If we do not relieve these men from the payment of this premium, some future Congress is going to do it.

We owe a great debt to those men who won this war, and this country is going to do justice to each and every man.

We will need the service of these men, perhaps, in the future, and it is possible we may need their services sooner than we expect.

We need a good, strong public sentiment in this country in favor of law and order, and we need an organization to stand back of that desire to proceed in an orderly way, and I know of no better way of doing it than by treating the men who preserved it justly.

We must not only treat the soldiers, sailors, and marines who were injured and their dependents justly, but we must do something for all the soldiers, sailors, and marines who won this war.

We should pass a bonus bill giving them all one year's pay, we should assist them in buying homes, we should assist them in buying farms in the communities where they desire to live, we should assist and encourage them in every way, and if we do not do it some future Congress will do it.

I want to ask the Members of this House if they intend to pass this bonus bill or do they intend waiting until the President tells them to pass it.

You are going to fight Bolshevism in this country some day, and you are much nearer to Bolshevism than you think you are. In fact I think it has already arrived in Boston and may spread over the entire country. Bolshevism should be crushed in its infancy, and the only men who can crush it are the men who fought and crushed autocracy abroad.

Let us stand by the men on whom we must rely to preserve liberty at home. Let us stand by the men we must rely upon to crush Bolshevism. Let us stand by the men who are to be the backbone of this Republic for years to come. [Applause.]

Mr. SWEET. I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa moves that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 15. That if any person to whom such yearly renewable term insurance has been awarded dies, or his rights are otherwise terminated after the death of the insured, but before all of the 240 monthly installments have been paid, then the monthly installments payable and applicable shall be payable to such person or persons within the permitted class of beneficiaries as would, under the laws of the State of residence of the insured, be entitled to his personal property in case of intestacy; and if the permitted class of beneficiaries be exhausted before all of the 240 monthly installments have been paid, then there shall be paid to the estate of the last surviving person within the permitted class an amount equal to the commuted value of the remaining monthly installments calculated on the basis of interest at the rate of 3½ per cent per annum.

Mr. HERNANDEZ. Mr. Chairman, Palmer Ketner, jr., Post of the American Legion, at Gallup, N. Mex., have adopted the following resolutions, which express my sentiments in regard to this bill and in regard to the bonus. I ask to have the resolutions read in my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the resolutions be read in his time. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

PALMER KETNER, JR., POST OF THE AMERICAN LEGION,
Gallup, N. Mex., September 8, 1919.

To the United States Senators and Congressman of the State of New Mexico:

Whereas there has been introduced in Congress a bill known as the Sweet bill, H. R. 8778, which amends the war-risk insurance act; and
Whereas this bill, if enacted, will be of inestimable benefit to those persons who should be protected by our Government; and
Whereas the same privileges should be extended to persons holding term insurance, as is proposed by the Sweet bill, to be extended to persons holding converted insurance: Therefore be it

Resolved by this Palmer Ketner, Jr., Post of the American Legion, of Gallup, N. Mex., That the Senators and Congressman of the State of New Mexico be urged to lend their influence and use their vote to secure the passage of the Sweet bill, H. R. 8778; and be it further

Resolved, That our Senators and Congressman be urged to promote and support an amendment to the Sweet bill, H. R. 8778, which will permit lump-sum payments for term insurance as well as for converted insurance and to place term insurance exactly on the same basis, as to payments, as converted insurance; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Senator A. A. JONES, Senator A. B. FALL, and Congressman B. C. HERNANDEZ.

By order of the post:

J. W. CHAPMAN,
Committee Chairman.

PALMER KETNER, JR., POST OF THE AMERICAN LEGION,
Gallup, N. Mex., September 8, 1919.

To the United States Senators and Congressman of the State of New Mexico:

Whereas there has been introduced in Congress certain bills having for their purpose the payment of additional bonuses to discharged soldiers; and
Whereas the men who entered the service of the United States of America during the Great War did so for the sole purpose of protecting and securing American liberties to posterity; and
Whereas we have been fully paid by a sense of having accomplished our purpose and performed our duty well and need no reward; and
Whereas the payment of such additional bonuses would unduly increase the expenditures of our Government and would increase the burden of those whom we fought to protect: Therefore, be it

Resolved by this Palmer Ketner, Jr., Post of the American Legion, of Gallup, N. Mex., That the Senators and Congressman of the State of New Mexico be urged to use their influence to defeat all bills having for their purpose the payment of any additional cash bonuses to discharged soldiers: And be is further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Senator A. A. JONES, Senator A. B. FALL, and Congressman B. C. HERNANDEZ.

By order of the post:

J. W. CHAPMAN,
Committee Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will continue the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. That if no beneficiary within the permitted class be designated by the insured as beneficiary for converted insurance, granted under the provisions of article 4 of the war-risk insurance act, either in his lifetime or by his last will and testament, or if the designated beneficiary does not survive the insured, then there shall be paid to the estate of the insured an amount equal to the commuted value of the monthly installments payable and applicable, calculated on the basis of interest at the rate of 3½ per cent per annum; or if the designated beneficiary survives the insured and dies before receiving all of the installments of converted insurance payable and applicable, then there shall be paid to the estate of such beneficiary an amount equal to the commuted value of the monthly installments so payable and applicable, calculated on the basis of interest at 3½ per cent per annum.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do so for the purpose of making a statement that I think ought to be made regarding this bill.

I hope the members of the committee who have presented this splendid bill to the House will not feel that the amendments that have been offered are intended as criticisms of the bill. The whole bill from beginning to end, in all its 19 sections, is for the purpose of liberalizing the war-risk insurance act, doing away with red tape, and making the act more beneficial to the soldiers whom we all respect and admire and love so much.

I also desire to call attention to the fact that whatever amendments have been offered have been offered for the purpose of liberalizing the bill. We all recognize that it is impossible for the committee to meet all of the varying conditions and circumstances, and when amendments have been suggested here because of individual cases it must not be considered that gentlemen offering them have had any particular purpose to benefit themselves or their friends. It has been only that the bill might be enlarged and liberalized to meet the conditions that might arise so as to prevent the beneficial effects of this bill from being taken away from any soldier who served his country in the late war.

I desire to say that the words spoken yesterday regarding the leaders on the respective sides of this House, commendatory of the industry, ability, and patriotism which they have exhibited in drawing and perfecting and bringing this bill before the House, are well merited, and that these gentlemen deserve great credit for what they have done. I join in those expressions. I desire particularly to say that I know of the unswerving attention and the great and continuous activity, at the sacrifice of almost all his other duties for weeks and months, displayed by my colleague from Iowa [Mr. SWEET]. His work merits the thanks of the entire Congress. I think we are all under obligations also to the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] for the active part he has taken in the advancement of this legislation. All the Members of the House, I am sure, join with me in expressing appreciation and thanks for the work of the entire committee. This is a splendid bill. It will meet with the approval not only of the soldiers who have been benefited by it but of the country, whose people feel that no appropriation of money can under the circumstances pay the debt that they owe to the glorious manhood that so willingly and triumphantly served the country in defense of its principles and of its safety in the late war. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That the Bureau of War Risk Insurance may make provision in the contract for converted insurance for optional settlements, to be selected by the insured, whereby such insurance may be made payable either in one sum or in installments for 36 months or more. The bureau may also include in said contract a provision authorizing the beneficiary to elect to receive payment of the insurance in installments for 36 months or more, but only if the insured has not exercised the right of election as hereinbefore provided; and even though the insured may have exercised his right of election, the said contract may authorize the beneficiary to elect to receive such insurance in installments spread over a greater period of time than that selected by the insured.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arizona offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HAYDEN: Page 15, line 8, after the end of the section, insert:

"Provided, That the Bureau of War Risk Insurance may make provision by regulations for optional settlements, to be selected by the insured, whereby the yearly renewable term insurance granted under the provisions of article 4 of the war-risk insurance act may be made payable either in one sum or in installments for 36 months or more."

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I am offering this amendment at the request of my constituents. At a meeting of the Arizona State Convention of the American Legion held in Tucson last July this resolution was adopted:

Be it further resolved, That it is the sense of this convention that the war-risk insurance act be amended to provide that the insured under the act may be allowed to elect whether his insurance upon maturity shall be paid as an annuity or in one payment. * * *

I have also received a number of letters from ex-service men in my State urging that such action be taken by Congress. I shall quote a typical statement from a discharged soldier who did his full duty in France and in whose good judgment I have every confidence:

I notice that an overwhelming majority of the veterans are dropping their war-risk insurance, and to be frank, I am seriously considering the same thing myself unless I see some possibility of the war-risk act being amended so that the paying of the principle will be made in full instead of by installments. Do you think there is any prospect of such a thing happening.

That this sentiment is not confined to the State of Arizona is demonstrated by the resolutions presented a few moments ago by the gentleman from New Mexico and by an editorial which appeared in the American Legion Weekly of September 5, 1919, which reads as follows:

These provisions are embodied in the Sweet bill, H. R. 8288, amending the war-risk insurance act, and the American Legion regards this bill favorably with the one reservation that it be amended so as to permit lump-sum payments for term insurance as well as for converted insurance, and so as to place term insurance on exactly the same basis as converted insurance, so far as payments are concerned. This will enable the man who can not convert his insurance at this moment when he is lean from long service to have that opportunity later. Otherwise, only the service man in sound financial condition benefits by the act.

These changes manifestly are necessary in the interests of equity, justice, and the continuance of war-risk insurance. When the changes have been effected, thus adjusting war-risk insurance to a peace-time basis and the wishes of the insured, the present apathy and even antipathy of former service men to war-risk insurance will disappear. Let us hope that Congress will act in this instance without unnecessary equivocation or delay.

Mr. Chairman, the idea behind all of these suggestions is that the returned soldiers resent the opinion which some Members of Congress seem to entertain that they need a guardian to care for their welfare, even though that guardian be a benevolent and paternal Government. Many of them may have been mere boys when they were called to the colors, but hard experience, than which there is no better teacher, has made them men. They are the veterans of the greatest war in all history, and to say that such men do not know what is for their own best interest is an insult to their intelligence. One who was fit to fight for his country ought to be at least credited with sense enough to know how to attend to his own personal business.

Now that the fighting is over and these soldiers, sailors, and marines are again engaged in the peaceful pursuits of civil life there can be no sound reason why the insured should not be permitted to designate whether his insurance, either term or a converted policy, should be paid in one lump sum or in installments. You will note that the amendment provides that the War Risk Bureau shall provide by regulations for optional settlements. It will, of course, be impossible for the Government to pay as much money to the beneficiary in one lump sum as would be the case if the payments were scattered through 36 months or more. The regulations of the War Risk Bureau can provide for a method of settlement so that the insured will know just what can be done in any particular instance and may have his choice.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAYDEN. With pleasure.

Mr. McCULLOCH. The gentleman's amendment provides for a lump sum or payment for 36 months.

Mr. HAYDEN. Yes. I have followed the text of section 17 of the pending bill, which relates to converted insurance, so as to make the same provision applicable to term insurance. I have used the identical language in order to do what the American Legion asked to be done, which is to place term insurance on exactly the same basis as converted insurance, so far as payments to beneficiaries are concerned.

Mr. McCULLOCH. I understand the director of the bureau recommended an amendment providing for 36 payments, or 36 installments, at the option of the insured. Is that correct?

Mr. HAYDEN. The gentleman from Ohio has no doubt read the hearings on this bill on page 118 of which appears a statement made by the Director of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, in which he offered a suggestion that was not adopted by the committee. The director recommended that yearly renewable term insurance be made payable at the option of the insured in installments for 36 months or more. The director did not say anything about payment in one sum. But the returned soldiers who pay for the insurance have asked for the further option that it be paid in one lump sum, and I am convinced that they should have that privilege.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, this question was fully gone into by the subcommittee, and I might say that the Director of the War Risk Insurance Bureau is the only one in the Government of that bureau, from the Secretary of the Treasury down, who indorsed this amendment.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Did not Mr. Shouse in the department give his personal opinion that that action should be taken? I think the gentleman will find that on page 118 of the hearings.

Mr. RAYBURN. I did not so understand it; but I know that the Secretary of the Treasury refused to give it his indorsement. If we do not do something to encourage the conversion of policies it will be but a few years before there will be no war-risk insurance. Of course, when a man is 20 or 25 years of age, the yearly term insurance is the cheapest and most desirable insurance in a way that he can have, but it is the experience of everybody in the insurance business that if you allow it to run along for a term of years it becomes the most expensive in the world. Therefore we thought it was best not to adopt the amendment suggested by the director of the bureau, because we are liberalizing the converted policy, making it payable in a lump sum, or in 36 months, or for a longer period if the beneficiary so elects. I believe that the best thing we can do for the soldier is to make the law as comprehensive as we possibly can so that he may convert the insurance and get the cheapest rate, and run a while, and while he is young it will be much cheaper if he carries it for some years. It was the judgment of the whole committee, with possibly one exception, that this amendment should not be adopted.

Now, as to the articles in the American Legion. That is, of course, a paper supposed to represent the soldier, but I doubt if very many of the soldiers of the country are advised or consulted before the articles on the editorial page are written.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Does not the gentleman believe that if the amendment is adopted, and we provide that it be paid in a lump sum, it will save a lot of lapses of these policies, it will be more inviting insurance, and soldiers will be more likely to continue the insurance?

Mr. RAYBURN. The term insurance lasts 5 years after the formal declaration of peace. If the soldier does not feel like converting the insurance now, he can do it 5 years after the declaration of peace. If he is not able to carry it at all, the Treasury Department has made a ruling in which they give him 18 months, although the policy lapses, in which he may be reinstated. It seems to me that that would take care of the situation. It would not be wise to lengthen the term of 5 years in which the term insurance should run, for the reason that in 10 or 15 years the premiums would become so high that the man would necessarily drop it, and then if he attempted to convert it the terms would be two or three times as high as when he was 21 or 25 years of age.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McCULLOCH as a substitute for the Hayden amendment: Page 15, line 8, add the following as a new section:

"That the Bureau of War Risk Insurance shall make provision by regulations for the payment at the maturity, by death of the insured, of the yearly renewable term insurance granted under article 4 of the war-risk insurance act, at the option of the insured, in installments for 36 months or more.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, this substitute is practically the same as the amendment or suggestion that was made by the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and which was indorsed by the assistant director. I did not know that he indorsed the lump-sum payment idea, but I do know from my examination of the hearings that the director indorsed the 36-payment proposition, and that it was indorsed by the assistant director. The statement was also made that the Treasury Department, while not approving it, did see much of merit in the proposal, and that while that department could not give it its approval it was not opposed to it.

If the substitute is not agreed to I shall vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Arizona, as I think this insurance should be made more attractive.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The substitute was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Arizona.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HAYDEN) there were—ayes 23, noes 47.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. That all premiums paid on account of insurance converted under the provisions of article 4 of the war-risk insurance act shall be deposited and covered into the Treasury to the credit of the United States Government life insurance fund and shall be available for the payment of losses, dividends, refunds, and other benefits provided for under such insurance. Payments from this fund shall be made upon and in accordance with awards by the director.

The Bureau of War Risk Insurance is hereby authorized to set aside out of the fund so collected such reserve funds as may be required, under accepted actuarial principles, to meet all liabilities under such insurance; and the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to invest and reinvest the said United States Government life insurance fund, or any part thereof, in interest-bearing obligations of the United States and to sell the obligations for the purposes of the said fund.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, to propound one or two questions to the committee or to some one who will answer. There has been a good deal of delay in answering the queries of various soldiers in respect to the method of procedure to have their insurance converted. Letters come to me asking why they can not get definite information from the bureau. I have not felt called upon to make criticisms of the bureau, because it is inevitable that there would be under an institution or bureau like this handling so much work some delays. I recognize that.

I have a letter here from one of the leading citizens of Pennsylvania, a gentleman holding a high position in that State, in which he says:

My son made an allotment of $15 a month to me, and a check came regularly. The last one received, April 12, was for the month of March, 1919.

I ought to say, knowing this man as I do, that this allotment would be kept by him for the education of the son when he returns. It was not for any support of the father, of course.

Since then no check has been received. I have written several times, and they send stereotyped letters which have nothing to do with the case. They wrote the son addressing him—

I shall not proceed further with what is exactly in the letter at that point, for I do not want to give the name of the man, because it is the name of the father himself. They had written to the father as if writing to the son, a stereotyped letter, thinking they were replying to the son's letter. The letter continues:

With such carelessness, inefficiency, etc., I do not know what to do. The boy is entering college, needs his money. He has written repeatedly also to change his insurance, and has sent his check for the premium, but has heard nothing from the premium department about his insurance. Can you help us on both of these matters?

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. SWEET. What is the date of that letter?

Mr. FESS. It is written September 12, 1919—yesterday.

Mr. SWEET. And what is the date of the occurrence?

Mr. FESS. March, 1919, is the date of the last check. As I remarked before, I have no desire to call attention to these things with any spirit of criticism.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FESS. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. As I understand the law, unless the father is getting a Government allowance supplementing that allotment, the War Risk Insurance Bureau does not handle it at all. The Quartermaster Department of the War Department handles it. The War Risk Insurance Bureau handles no allotments except where supplemented by Government allowance.

Mr. FESS. That quite evidently would explain why he does not hear from the director, but the letter should be referred, and at least the matter should be put in process of adjustment.

I want to be specific. I think this legislation is conceived through one of the most beautiful motives that has ever directed legislation. It is an attempt to make it impossible for a soldier of this war to be looked upon as the soldiers of preceding wars—as a person to be put in a position of begging the Government to do something for him. I think it is a magnificent conception of what the Nation owes to the men who fought for the Nation's life, even at the expense of their own. I think these general amendments now proposed by your bill are but another expression of increased generosity on the part of the Government, and the Government is certainly doing well.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for a half minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. The one remark I wanted to make would be that this expression of gratitude of the Government should not be marred unnecessarily by a bad administration of a good law, and I hope that these errors will rapidly be corrected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 19. That the amount of the monthly installments of allotment and family allowance, compensation, or yearly renewable term insurance which has become payable under the provisions of the war-risk insurance act but which has not been paid prior to the death of the person entitled to receive the same may be payable to the personal representatives of the deceased person.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McCULLOCH: Page 16, line 7, after the word "person," add the following as a new section:

"That the rate fixed and in force upon the 1st day of August, 1919, on the war-risk insurance policy taken out by any commissioned officer, enlisted man, or other person shall remain in force and not be changed or increased unless the insured shall convert his insurance into some other form of policy as provided by regulations authorized under section 404 of the act approved September 2, 1914."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to argue it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That this is not germane to the section. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of order.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McCULLOCH: Page 16, line 7, after the word "person," add the following as a new section:

"That when any officer or enlisted man or person insured under the provisions of this act shall have reached the age of 64 years, or as soon thereafter as he shall have paid the premiums for 15 years, shall not be required to make further payments on his policy but his insurance shall remain in full force and effect.

"All laws inconsistent with this section are hereby so modified as to conform to the provisions hereof."

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. Mr. Chairman, the bill has been completed now and perfected by amendments and I think no further amendments ought to be adopted. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the same request, to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. RAYBURN. One moment. Will the gentleman withhold that? Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 10, subsection (10), and suggest an amendment to the gentleman from Iowa which I really think ought to be adopted and go in there.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to return to page 10, subsection (10), for the purpose of offering an amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. RAYBURN. It is a corrective amendment only.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is this: As the section reads it says "that section 302 of this act as amended shall be deemed to be in effect as of October 6, 1917." I really think that that is practically meaningless, because there is no section 302 of this act. This is section 11. If we change that so as to read "that section 302 of the war-risk insurance act as amended," that would cover it.

Mr. SWEET. I accept the amendment.

Mr. RAYBURN. Now, I offer the amendment. In line 17, page 10, strike out the word "this" and insert in lieu thereof "the war-risk insurance."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 10, line 17, after the word "of," strike out the word "this" and insert in lieu thereof "the war-risk insurance."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 107, noes 0.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 8778 had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them in gross.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time, was read the third time.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I think we ought to have a quorum, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present on the passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and forty-six gentlemen are present; not a quorum. Under the rule, the Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify Members, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 240, answered "present" 1, not voting 189, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

On motion of Mr. SWEET, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, my colleague Mr. FISHER, of Tennessee, was called away about an hour and a half ago on an important public matter, and I ask unanimous consent that he be excused on that account.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In that connection I want to say that he was heartily in favor of this bill, and if he had been present he would have voted "yea."

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend in the RECORD the remarks I made this morning on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on this bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky makes the same request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Members of the House be granted five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the Members of the House be granted five legislative days in which to extend their remarks on this bill.

Mr. GARNER. They must be their own remarks; that is, nothing can be put in the RECORD except gentlemen's remarks, with that limitation.

The SPEAKER. That is made part of the request. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 1018. An act authorizing the Sioux Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims;

S. 2961. An act authorizing the county of Accomac, Va., to construct bridges to connect Chincoteague Island and the mainland; and

S. 633. An act extending the provisions for the regulation of steam vessels to vessels owned or operated by the United States Shipping Board, and for other purposes.

SENATE BILLS REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bills of the following titles were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 633. An act extending the provisions for the regulation of steam vessels to vessels owned or operated by the United States Shipping Board, and for other purposes; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

S. 2961. An act authorizing the county of Accomac, Va., to construct certain bridges to connect Chincoteague Island and the mainland; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. 1018. An act authorizing the Sioux Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. BELL, indefinitely, on account of sickness; and

To Mr. MAPES, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 3 o'clock and 51 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Monday, September 15, 1919, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting part of a communication from the Governor of the Panama Canal recommending that the rate of interest on deposit money orders in the Canal Zone be increased from 2 per cent to 3 per cent (H. Doc. No. 248), was taken from the Speaker's table, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. WISE, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 95) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the city of Atlanta, Ga., tents and cots for the use of United Confederate Veterans in their convention from October 7 to 10, 1919, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 316), which said joint resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MAPES, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 8067) to establish standard weights and measures for the District of Columbia, to define the duties of the superintendent of weights, measures, and markets of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 317), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. TILSON: A bill (H. R. 9248) authorizing the Secretary of War to donate to the town of Branford, Conn., one German cannon or fieldpiece, to be placed according to the wishes of the citizens of said place; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HICKS: A bill (H. R. 9249) to provide adequate subsistence for the warrant officers and enlisted men of the Coast Guard; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. TIMBERLAKE: A bill (H. R. 9250) to amend section 2 of the act approved September 8, 1916, relating to pensions; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. BLANTON: A bill (H. R. 9251) amending section 6, chapter 389, Thirty-seventh Statutes, enacted August 24, 1912, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

By Mr. JONES of Texas: A bill (H. R. 9252) to provide for service of process in cases removed from a State or other court to a United States court; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. VOLSTEAD: A bill (H. R. 9253) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for the performance of the duties of the office of President in case of the removal, death, resignation, or inability both of the President and Vice President," approved January 19, 1886; to the Committee on Election of President, Vice President, and Representatives in Congress.

By Mr. BROOKS of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 9254) providing for a survey of Wabash River, Ill. and Ind., in the vicinity of Hutsonville, Ill.; to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. CANNON: A bill (H. R. 9255) to pay John E. Bolden for services rendered the United States Army from April 4, 1865, to and including July 15, 1865; to the Committee on War Claims.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9256) granting an increase of pension to William M. Bishop; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. EMERSON: A bill (H. R. 9257) for the relief of the Van Dorn Iron Works Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. ESCH: A bill (H. R. 9258) granting a pension to Anna H. D. Heiberg; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HUTCHINSON: A bill (H. R. 9259) granting a pension to Mary Furfey; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. IGOE: A bill (H. R. 9260) granting a pension to James Duffy; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. IRELAND: A bill (H. R. 9261) granting an increase of pension to Maria L. Gill; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 9262) granting an increase of pension to George S. Hawkins; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. JEFFERIS: A bill (H. R. 9263) authorizing the Treasurer of the United States to pay to Henry Iske, La Platte, Nebr., the sum of $2,110.64, for cattle unlawfully condemned; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. LUFKIN: A bill (H. R. 9264) granting a pension to Sarah K. Marshall; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MONTAGUE: A bill (H. R. 9265) granting a pension to Carl Olson; to the Committee on Pensions.

SENATE.

MONDAY, September 15, 1919.

Rev. John Paul Tyler, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Lord of all the earth, God of our fathers, command upon us, we beseech Thee, this day Thy divine grace and wisdom, that in all that may be done or said Thy righteousness may prevail. We pray for Thy blessing upon our native land, upon the men of our Army and Navy and all the other branches of our service. We pray for every home in this land. We pray for the President of our United States. Give unto him and unto us and unto the rulers of the kingdoms of this world such grace and wisdom, we pray, that Thy kingdom may come and Thy will be done in our earth.

Our Father, who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread, and forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us. Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil, for Thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory, forever. Amen.

The Vice President being absent, the President pro tempore [Mr. CUMMINS] took the chair.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of Friday last when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I present an editorial from the New York American of September 13, 1919, which I should like to have printed in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The editorial referred to is as follows:

[From the New York American, Saturday, Sept. 13, 1919.]

SENATORS, IF THIS APPEAL DOES NOT MOVE YOU, THEN WE GIVE UP.

"The minority report upon the treaty closes with this tribute to the proposed league:

"'The league of nations is the only plan proposed to redeem the world from war, pestilence, and famine.'

"It seems to us that this eulogy falls short of the possibilities.

"True, it is indeed a wondrous achievement to abolish not only fighting but also sickness and hunger, but we are sure that Messrs. HITCHCOCK, POMERENE, et al. have overlooked many other contributions to the gayety of nations offered by the immortal document in question.

"There is practically no end of the happy uses to which the constitution of the league of nations can be put.

"Properly toasted and shredded, there is no reason why it should not be universally used as a breakfast cereal, and boiled in milk it would be an invaluable food for infants.

"Printed on sheets of convenient size and covered with molasses and glue, it would make an unparalleled fly paper; carefully diluted with flour paste and insect powder, it would create havoc with cockroaches; dipped at intervals in kerosene and thrust into cracks and bedsteads, it would infallibly check the ravages of bedbugs; and, used as seamless underwear, it would baffle the most determined and bloodthirsty cooties.

"We are amazed that a ruthless, ignorant, heartless, and pigmy-minded senatorial majority can even think of mangling such a remarkable document and so breaking the heart of humanity, hopefully looking forward to a flyless, cockroachless, bedbugless, louseless world.

"We make bold to ask Senator LODGE and his associates quite sternly if they have even stopped to consider what disappointment they are planning to bring to the expectant heart of the world by their reprehensible profly, procockroach, probedbug, procootie sentiments.

"Can it be that representatives of these nefarious enemies of mankind have seduced certain Senators by attractive offers of immunity from bites, stings, and scratches in order to gain senatorial assistance in their pernicious plots and propaganda?

"Nor have we begun even to catalogue the virtues and possible achievements of this wonderful panacea.

"Taken exactly as directed by the doctor himself, it will cure irritability of the temper, inflammation of the vocabulary, overappetite for profits, high cost of living, shortage of coal, frost on the corn, worms in the cotton, sore frontiers, national jealousies, wrinkles, red noses, racial incompatibility, difference in languages, pips in poultry, Irish agitation, German music, desire for food, fatty excess of plumbers' bills, strikes, excessive perspiration of taxpayers, religious disputes, ingrowing toenails, warts, secret diplomacy, autocracy, jazz playing, law suits, broken umbrellas, the drink appetite, tendency of eggs to decay, fatty degeneration of the dollar bill, plant lice, telephone irritations, exaggerated growth of tips, interruption of presidential monologues, deficiencies of dividends, odors arising from garbage, cutaneous eruptions of colonies, Japanese imperial itch, third-term bees in the bonnet, bats in belfries, and millions of other afflictions that beset mankind.

"And shall pigmy minds, who do not and can not understand the heights and depths of this immortal document, tie rude amendments to its beautiful tail and break the palpitating heart of the world?

"Forbid it, Heaven!

"And if not Heaven, then Heaven's viceroy!

"Is this a time to waste the hours in talk about American welfare, American independence, American policies, American sovereignty, or any such trivial matters, when the kingdom of the Hejaz is waiting outside the door, wondering when its vote is to be counted?

"Is this a time to be considering American affairs and American welfare, when the Island of Yap is still in doubt whom it belongs to, and the palpitating heart of the world is hanging in the fateful decision?

"Is this a time to be wasted on discussions of American interests when distant Siberia is still pathetically demanding to know among whom it is which or what, as the case may be?

"Here in a brief document of a great deal less than a million burning words is the salvation of the world, neatly bound and labeled, and only awaiting the arrival of belated copy from Paris to be absolutely perfect; and there are pigmy minds in the Senate who actually want to amend this inspired volume! Minds that actually talk about the American Constitution in the very presence of this immortal document, which does away not only with the American Constitution but with any necessity of having an American Constitution.

"Senators, can nothing deter you from your fell purpose?

"Can neither the running together of large crowds to see the special excursion train, nor the anxious heart of the world, nor even the reported outbreak of an epidemic of roup among the defenseless hens of Podunk X-Roads, Paw-Paw County, State of Indiana, move your hearts of iron, your bosoms of flint?

"Senators, think of devastated Europe, of those wasted and unhappy lands where large numbers of the people have not yet been able to resume their labors because they have not had time to spend all the money they made, as reported by their newspapers and officials!

"Think of the instability of things abroad and the price of eggs at home!

"Reflect upon what it cost to write this immortal document, to say nothing of the transportation expenses!

"Shall we deliberately waste a million and a half dollars, cash in advance, including the cost of a perfectly good glass roof for the presidential ship, a large and competent staff of musicians from the Hotel Biltmore, and fancy cooks from Washington?

"Will you break the heart of the world by losing all that money in these hard times, with calf's liver and bacon $1.25 a sample?

"War—pestilence—famine.

"The three furies that have wasted the world for 5,000 years.

"Look at them, Senators, look at them!

"And now they can be banished forever, choked to death with a bottle of ink, wiped out with a blotting pad, if you but withhold your interrupting hands.

"Senators, in beautiful and moving metaphor the President has told us that this treaty, if unamended, makes us all eagles.

"Senators, don't you want to be eagle birds?

"Don't you want your fellow citizens to be eagle birds?

"And when we have all become eagle birds, do you want us to have to fly about among the neighbors with amendments and reservations tied to our beautiful tails?

"Is that the fate you design for your constituents?

"Are you so determined to break the heart of the world that if you can not break it with grief you will break it with laughter?

"Doggone your pigmy minds, do you want to make the world choke itself to death laughing at us eagle birds?"

RAILROAD PASSES.

Mr. SHERMAN. I also present an article from the Manufacturers' Record, of Baltimore, Md., of September 11, 1919, relating to the free transportation issued to the McAdoo family, which I should like to have printed without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so ordered, without objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Manufacturers' Record, Baltimore, Sept. 11, 1919.]

"THE BLUNDER OF MR. M'ADOO AND RAILROAD MANAGERS FOR ANNUAL FAMILY PASSES.

"The recent report to Congress of the fact that Secretary McAdoo, no longer in any way connected with the railroad service, has annual passes for himself, his wife, his son, and his daughter, will prove to the country a revelation of sad lack of wisdom on the part of Mr. McAdoo and the Railroad Administration alike. The pass to Mr. McAdoo, according to the report to Congress, was issued on the basis of 'special counsel for the State of New York.' If this was a satisfactory basis on which to issue a pass to Mr. McAdoo, every other special counsel for every other State and city would have an equal right to have a pass. But surely Mr. McAdoo can not claim that his wife and his son and his daughter are special counsels to the State of New York.

"Mr. McAdoo is not alone in this culpability. The railroad officials, of whom there are a large number, who secured annual railroad and Pullman passes for members of their families, have done a very unwise and stupid thing. It is possible that their annual passes may be within the strict legal requirements, and yet a moment's thought would have convinced these men that the issuing of annual railroad and Pullman passes to members of their families would be certain to create a more hostile feeling to all the railroad management of the country. There is no reason whatever why the wife, or the daughter, or the son, or 'the sisters and the cousins and the aunts' of railroad people should travel on passes, any more than it is right that anyone else who desires a pass should have it. Railroad officials and employees secure full pay for all their services. They can not travel on passes as an act of charity, and there is no other possible basis on which they have a justification to use passes, other than that to a certain extent the law permits passes to be issued to railroad employees and their families.

"The law itself, however, is unwise. It is an unfair discrimination against the public generally, but for the presidents of the railroads to use annual railroad and Pullman passes for 'their sisters, cousins, and aunts' displays a lack of judgment in this day of turmoil and unrest simply incomprehensible. It is bad enough that these railroad managers have displayed so little judgment and common sense, but that Secretary McAdoo, as an attorney in private practice, should have used his influence to continue to receive annual passes for himself and wife and son and daughter is amazing beyond degree. The lack of ethics is beyond description."

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, in view of the matter which the Senator from Illinois has just had inserted in the RECORD respecting free transportation for Mr. McAdoo and dependent members of his family I ask unanimous consent to make a very brief statement.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the Senator from Arkansas will proceed.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] has just had inserted in the RECORD a statement from some paper published in Baltimore, which I have not had an opportunity of reading, but my attention has been called to statements published in other papers. In my opinion Mr. McAdoo is not subject to fair criticism for having received and used for himself and the dependent members of his family transportation on the railroads from the Federal Administration of Railroads.

He accepted the appointment from the Federal administration of railroads as special counsel in the State of New York for the Railroad Administration. He declined to receive any compensation therefor.

As is well known, Mr. President, Mr. McAdoo served as Director General of Railroads without receiving any compensation in addition to the compensation which was paid him as Secretary of the Treasury. His acceptance of a railroad pass from the Federal Administration of Railroads ought not to subject him to criticism, in view of the fact that he is now serving as special attorney in the State of New York for the Railroad Administration.

In my opinion it is unfair and unworthy of either Senators or great newspapers to make the attack upon Mr. McAdoo which is implied in the articles that have been called to my attention.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, with the consent of the Senate, for just a moment, may I ask whether the State railroad officials of Illinois, for instance, would be justified in carrying like transportation? Outside of New York City there are more steam railway offices in the city of Chicago than any other point in the Western Hemisphere. There are necessarily a number of State officials there who are engaged in like duties with the late Director General of Railroads. If the same rule would apply in other States, there would be a very considerable addition to the free transportation list in the United States.

Mr. ROBINSON and Mr. KELLOGG addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON. Let the Senator from Minnesota proceed, if he wishes to discuss this subject.

Mr. KELLOGG. I was going to say a word.

Mr. ROBINSON. I prefer that the Senator should proceed.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I know nothing about the issue of transportation to Mr. McAdoo, but it would naturally occur to one as to whether he performed any service for the Railroad Administration in the State of New York. I do know that when the railroads of this country were losing to the Government several hundred millions a year and when the policy of the law for years had been against the issuance of transportation except to railroad officials, I think something like 5,000 passes have been issued, good on every railroad system in this country. I doubt if there has been a time in years when so many people have been traveling on railroad passes and Pullman passes as in a time when no one should have a pass. Congress ought to prohibit the issuance of passes at all. That in the Railroad Administration the Government should start out with such an issuance of passes is incomprehensible to me, when the railroads are losing so much money to the Government.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not care to enter into a discussion at this time of the policy involved in the statement just made by the Senator from Minnesota, but he has, impliedly at least, criticized the Federal Administration of Railroads because it has issued too many passes. He has said that it has issued more than 5,000 passes good on railroads throughout the country when it should have issued none.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], in the statement which followed the remarks I made a moment ago, impliedly criticized the Federal Administration of Railroads because it would not issue more passes than have been issued, and referred to the fact that railroad passes had been denied certain State officials. I do not think that the subject matter of passes generally is germane to the purpose for which I rose, namely, to state that in my opinion the criticism of Mr. McAdoo for receiving railroad passes from the Federal Administration of Railroads is not justified and is unworthy of members of this body and of the newspapers which are indulging in it, in view of the fact that he is serving as special counsel for the railroad administration in the State of New York.

As to the services which he is performing—and I make this statement in reply to an innuendo contained in the remarks of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]—his services are largely advisory, according to the information which has reached me, but they are far in excess, from the standpoint of any lawyer, of the value of the railroad passes which he has received and is using.

Mr. REED. The Senator, I think, stated that the former Secretary of the Treasury is now acting as special counsel. Does the Senator understand that he is serving without compensation?

Mr. ROBINSON. Absolutely without compensation. Mr. McAdoo not only declined to receive any additional compensation for his services as director general during the period of the war when his services were of such great value, but he has also declined to receive any compensation as special counsel, unless the passes that have been issued to him be considered as a sort of compensation.

Mr. REED. That is what I thought.

Mr. ROBINSON. But the point I make, and which I wish to emphasize, is that it is small business on the part of United States Senators and small business on the part of partisan newspapers to make an attack on Mr. McAdoo under the circumstances, and I think the Senator from Missouri agrees with me.

Mr. REED. I wanted to have the point made plain that the Senator has made plain in respect to the services of Mr. McAdoo as counsel without compensation.

Mr. ROBINSON. I thank the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask for the regular order.

WOMAN SUFFRAGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire ratifying the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women, which was ordered to be filed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 95) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the city of Atlanta, Ga., tents, cots, horses, and saddle equipments for the use of United Confederate Veterans in their convention from October 7 to 10, 1919, with an amendment, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I present resolutions adopted by the South Dakota Branch of the League to Enforce Peace, urging the ratification of the treaty with Germany, including the covenant for a league of nations, without amendment or reservation. I ask that the resolutions be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the South Dakota Branch of the League to Enforce Peace that the prompt approval by the Senate of the United States, without amendment and without any such reservations as would require the resubmission of the treaty of the allied and associated nations with Germany, including the covenant for a league of nations, to the nations which have joined therein, is, in our opinion, essential to the peace of the world, the establishment of the rule of reason and justice in the relations of nations to each other, and the immediate and future welfare of this Nation, and, indeed, of civilization itself. We therefore urge the Senate to speedily ratify the treaty, including the covenant, without amendment and without any reservation which would substantially affect the text or substance of the same.

Resolved further, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to Senator STERLING, Senator JOHNSON, and the President.

WILLIS C. COOK,
E. W. FISKE,
FRANK H. JOHNSON,
H. K. WARREN,
U. S. G. CHERRY,
State Executive Committee.

By direction of the South Dakota Branch of League to Enforce Peace.

Mr. PHIPPS. I send to the desk resolutions adopted by the Larimer County Stock Growers' Association of Colorado, favoring the enactment of legislation providing price protection for the stock growers of the country. I move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of the Central Labor Union of Chanute, Kans., praying for an increase in salaries of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. NEWBERRY presented petitions of sundry citizens of Jackson, Eaton Rapids, Kalamazoo, Grand Rapids, and Traverse City, all in the State of Michigan, praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a memorial of the Indiana-Michigan Division of the Brotherhood of Railroad Station Agents, of Kalamazoo, Mich., remonstrating against the adoption of the so-called Plumb plan for operation and control of railroads, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. KNOX presented memorials of sundry citizens of Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, Altoona, Erie, East Mauch Chunk, and Duquesne, all in the State of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the establishment of a department of education, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of the Teachers' Institute of Altoona, Pa., and a petition of sundry citizens of Perryopolis, Pa., praying for the establishment of a department of education, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a petition of sundry postal clerks of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of the executive committee of the Gear Manufacturers' Association, of Philadelphia, Pa., remonstrating against the adoption of the so-called Plumb plan for operation and control of railroads, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a memorial of sundry priests of the diocese of Pittsburgh, Pa., remonstrating against the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. PAGE presented a petition of Venerable Lodge, No. 414, Order Sons of Italy, of Rutland, Vt., praying for the annexation of Fiume to Italy, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MOSES presented a petition of Local Grange No. 13, Patrons of Husbandry, of Nashua, N. Y., and a petition of Local Grange No. 154, Patrons of Husbandry, of Fitzwilliam, N. H., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON presented the memorial of H. H. Chamberlain, of Minneapolis, Minn., relative to the sugar situation, which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also presented a memorial from the Blount Shoe Co., of Marshall, Minn., relative to an investigation of the shoe industry, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, as in open executive session and as a member of the Committee on Foreign Relations, I wish to submit an individual report upon the treaty with Germany. I am unable to agree with my Republican associates, either in their sentiments toward the league of nations or in the conclusions reached by them in reference to proposed amendments or reservations. I find it equally difficult for me to work in harness with the Democratic Party on any subject. Therefore, I have felt it incumbent upon me to make a wholly independent report, expressing my views upon the treaty, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD, and also printed under the rules heretofore adopted with reference to such reports.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The views of a minority, submitted by Mr. McCUMBER, are as follows:

[Senate Report No. 176, part 3, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session.]

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

"Mr. McCUMBER, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, submitted the following views of a minority:

"It has always been understood that the purpose of a report from any Senate committee was to briefly explain the object of a bill or treaty reported and the reasons for any amendments thereto. And this has been the general rule adopted by all committees in reporting any matter to the Senate. The majority of the Committee on Foreign Relations have deviated from this rule in reporting this treaty. The great purposes of the covenant upon which 27 nations, the great and small of the world, studied and labored for six months in an attempt to formulate a plan that would tend to insure good fellowship among the nations of the world and prevent another such catastrophe as we have just passed through have not been even alluded to. Not one word is said, not a single allusion made, concerning either the great purpose of the league of nations or the methods by which those purposes are to be accomplished.

"Irony and sarcasm have been substituted for argument, and positions taken by the press or individuals outside the Senate seem to command more attention than the treaty itself. It is regrettable that the animosity which centers almost wholly against the league of nations provisions should have been engendered against a subject so important to the world's welfare. It is regrettable that the consideration of a matter so foreign to any kind of partisanship should be influenced in the country as well as on the floor of this Senate by hostility toward or subserviency to the President of the United States. No matter how just may be any antagonism against President Wilson, the aspirations and hopes of a wounded and bleeding world ought not to be denied because, under our Constitution, the treaty must first be formulated by him.

"The purpose of this treaty is, first, to settle the score of this unprovoked war, this murder of practically a score of millions of the best people of the world, that the ambitions of an autocratic sovereign, with his Junker following, might be satisfied at the expense of the liberty of the other nations of Europe; second, to secure an agreement among all of the great nations of the world, a compact with and between them all, to combine their councils to prevent another such tragedy and to henceforth assure the settlement of international disputes by arbitration or other peaceful method.

"As the United States, though somewhat belated, performed an important part in bringing the war to a successful close, and as the United States must be one of the signatory powers to the treaty of peace, one can scarcely understand this studied effort on the part of a majority of the committee to eliminate the United States as a factor in determining any question relating to the final settlement of this conflict. Neither can one understand why a country whose whole history has been devoted to the advocacy of the peaceful settlement of international disputes is suddenly to have its policy reversed and to become, in effect, an opponent of the only means that has ever been attempted to assure world peace, namely, an agreement, not between two nations or between two groups of nations that they will settle their difficulties by arbitration, but an agreement among all nations that they shall not resort to war without first submitting their controversies, either for arbitration or discussion, to a council of all; that no nation shall begin a war of aggression against another without such submission, and that if such recalcitrant nation does attempt a war of aggression and wrong the other nations to the compact will prevent the consummation of such felonious policy.

"There has been written into this compact a great underlying principle which is the very soul of the agreement, that the same code of morality which governs people in their relations to each other in every highly organized state of the world shall govern nations in their relations to each other; that no nation shall rob another nation of its territory or its independence; that no nation shall have the right to murder the people of another nation for the selfish purpose of extending its own domains.

"No statesman, no philosopher, has ever yet given a single reason why nations, which are but collections of individuals, should not be governed in their international relations by the same code of ethics that governs the peoples of communities or States in their internal relations.

"For the first time in the history of the world this great advance step is attempted. The whole issue is whether nations can so eliminate their selfish desires, so restrain their national avarice, as to accord equal justice to all people. As in the community every individual assumes to assist in the enforcement of law, in the protection of the life, liberty, and property of every other citizen, so in this international code of ethics each nation assumes to do its part in guarding the international rights of every other nation. As in every State a forum has been provided for the settlement of individual disputes, and no individual is allowed the right to disregard the law of his community, so in this international court a forum is provided for the settlement of international disputes, and each nation is forbidden to determine when it may commit an act of aggression against another nation until it has at least brought its case into this forum for consideration and settlement if possible.

"The instrument is not as complete and as binding as the constitution of a State or nation. It still leaves to each nation the right of withdrawal, and depends to a great extent upon the moral sentiment of each nation to comply with its own obligation or the enforcement of such obligation upon a recalcitrant member. It is a mighty step in the right direction. Every sentiment of justice and morality is on its side. Some of its provisions are yet crude and uncertain of application. But the whole purpose is most noble and worthy. And as in our American Constitution we were compelled, in order to form a more perfect union, to depend upon the right of amendment, so in this great world constitution experience will undoubtedly necessitate many changes in order to make a more perfect instrument that will work for the benefit of humanity. All of these noble and lofty purposes have been ignored in the majority report or treated with sarcastic disdain or jingoistic contempt.

"Most of the amendments proposed are those which eliminate the United States from any part in the conclusion and the settlement of this Great War, in which we took a most noble and conspicuous part. They not only seek to isolate the United States as a world power from the rest of the civilized nations of the world, but to compel this country to abandon its allies and fail in its duties to consummate the purposes for which the war was fought.

"The necessity and duty of the United States to assist in the remapping of continental Europe and western Asia, the creation of a new Poland and Czechoslovakia, the revision of the boundaries of Italy and Greece, and the expulsion of the Turk from Europe have been urged on the floor of the Senate in eloquent words by some of those who joined in this majority report. If it was our duty to assist in bringing about this result, how inconsistent our attitude in now saying that it is not our duty to extend to these countries which we brought into being the hand of protection until they can stand without our assistance. The purpose of the proposed committee amendment is to relieve ourselves of any further duty in protecting these children born of the exigencies of this war, and to compel those who suffered most in this awful conflict, who are staggering to-day under wounds that are almost fatal, to perform that duty without any assistance from us. To my mind such attitude is most selfish, immoral, and dishonorable.

"It is asserted in the majority report:

"'In regard to amendments generally it should be stated at the outset that nothing is more groundless than the sedulously cultivated and constantly expressed fear that textual amendments would require a summoning of the peace conference, and thereby cause great delay. There will be no necessity of summoning the peace conference, because it is in session now in Paris, with delegates fully representing all the signatory nations, as it has been for six months, and it seems likely to be in session for six months more.'

"No one, so far as I know, has asserted that delegates of this peace conference are not still in Paris. They are there for the purpose of carrying out certain provisions that are in the treaty itself. It required six months of arduous labor to bring the minds of all the signatory nations to a point where they could sign this treaty. It was important that every provision in the treaty should satisfy every signatory member. The treaty has been consummated. The hundreds of experts and advisers who assisted in making the treaty have returned to their homes. Only the skeleton form of the conference remains.

"What is claimed by the opponents of these amendments is that they would require a reconsideration of the whole treaty because they present a new and different treaty. And, realizing the difficulties which had to be overcome in order to secure the assent of these 27 nations, we can not fail to recognize the added difficulties and uncertainties that would arise in a resubmission of the whole question to the peace conference.

"Let us take the first amendment. It is proposed to increase the vote of the United States more than sixfold. The committee report says:

"'But if Great Britain has six votes in the league assembly, no reason has occurred to the committee and no argument had been made to show why the United States should not have an equal number.'

"If the United States is to have its votes increased sixfold, certainly France and Italy will insist upon like additional representation and voting power. And undoubtedly every other member will ask the same. The unit of representation provided in the league is that of the nation, without reference to size or importance. Any other basis would have been impossible.

"The situation growing out of this great world conflict is unique. Every nation that declared it was at war with Germany is made a party to this treaty, though such nation never furnished a soldier or a gun or a single dollar to maintain the war. Hedjaz, with a population scarcely as large as the city of Washington, has the vote of a nation. Panama, with a population scarcely larger, has a vote. Hunduras and Uruguay, each with a population approximating half a million, have the same power as Great Britain or France or the United States in the assembly. None of them did anything to carry on the war. Canada, on the other hand, with a population of nearly eight and a half million people, and which fought valiantly through all the long years of the war, losing hundreds of thousands of soldiers, imposing a mighty burden upon her people for centuries to come, asks that she be given a vote in the assembly, not in the council, carrying the same power that you give to black Liberia, or Haiti, or Hedjaz. Australia and New Zealand, who suffered likewise, and whose sons achieved great victories in defense of the great world principle which was at stake, ask that there be some forum in which they may have a separate vote equal to that of these nations which did absolutely nothing to maintain this war. While they may be said to be parts of the British Empire, they are, nevertheless, self-governing and independent domains. The tie is one of friendly good will and interest rather than of dependency. To all intents and purposes these countries are independent, self-governing nations. They were given a voice only in the assembly distinct from that of Great Britain. They ought to have been given this voice in that forum. That forum decides nothing in dispute among nations unless the nations themselves are willing to have the cause transferred from the council. The United States is in no danger from any one of them, because, first, she must assent to the transfer of a dispute to the assembly, and she will not do so unless she feels that her rights will be equally protected in the assembly; second, in every dispute affecting the Western Hemisphere these self-governing domains of Great Britain have always showed a disposition to side with the dominant country in this hemisphere—the United States. On the other hand, the European countries could complain with far greater reason that the United States will so dominate every nation in the Western Hemisphere as to have a voting power that would overrule the influence or power of the older nations than that the British Empire would have a voting power that would overrule the purposes and interests of this country. These nations in the Western Hemisphere which declared war against Germany did so to please the United States rather than for any effect their action might have on the results of the war. France or Italy or Great Britain could with as much reason say that the United States in every contest with a European nation will control Cuba and Panama and practically every Central and South American State. But these countries know as we know that all disputes between great nations will be settled in the council and not in the assembly.

"But there is a third reason why the attempt to increase our voting strength is unnecessary and improper.

"It is the British Empire that is represented in the council where every dispute will be settled; and no self-governing dominion or part of that Empire has separate representation in the council. And even if we should agree, which we need never do, to transfer any dispute with Great Britain, or with any of her self-governing colonies or dependencies, to the assembly, it would be the British Empire and not the separate parts which would be a party to the dispute. In other words, a dispute with the dominant member is a dispute with each part of the Empire, and a dispute with any part is a dispute with the whole, so that even if the dispute between the United States and Great Britain or any part of the British Empire were transferred to the assembly, the votes of that Empire and each member would be excluded the same as our own. This is the construction given by the President, and, I think, is the only logical construction. But lest there might be any misunderstanding, the construction which we claim can be declared by an appropriate reservation in form such as reservation No. 6 attached hereto.

"Neither can there be any objection to a reservation which in proper language declares that in withdrawing from the league the United States must be the sole judge whether all its obligations have been fulfilled.

"The only objection to reservation No. 1 is the manner in which it is expressed. As worded, it would indicate to the world that this country assumed the right to withdraw whether its obligations were fulfilled or not. If, as stated in the majority report, the United States has never broken an international obligation, why use language that would indicate a right to do so? It would be far better and far more appropriate to declare that the United States would be the sole judge as to whether her obligations under the treaty had been fulfilled at the time of her withdrawal than to indicate a right to disregard her obligations.

"The second reservation recommended by a majority of the committee is objectionable for several reasons. First, it is an amendment pure and simple, and an amendment of the most important article in the league of nations. Its purpose is to take the United States as a power for the peace of the world out of the league entirely. Our disinterestedness, our freedom from the ordinary jealousies that affect the European mind, our power, and our resources place us in the front rank of influence in this council of nations. We are the keystone of the arch upon which must rest the superstructure of a successful league of nations. So situated we ought not only to be willing but eager to help a distracted world which so needs the moral assistance of our membership and the potential assistance of our known power. Second, it places this country in a false and wrong position, an attitude of encouraging powerful countries to inflict or impose any wrong upon weaker nations, by our declared policy of nonintervention. The better policy and the right policy is to let the world understand that in all probability the United States will not stand idly by and allow a great wrong to be perpetrated by one country against another. Third, that policy of nonintervention is asserted in a dictatorial and offensive way. It is not couched in the language which should govern friendly nations in answering proposals one to another.

"Under my construction, and I think under the construction of the greater number of those who have studied this league of nations provision, the question of interference and extent of interference, if any, must finally be decided by the Congress when the occasion arises, and no obligation rests upon the United States to interfere in any way unless its Congress shall so decide at such time. This committee reservation should be modified so as to place this country in a proper attitude toward the world, to let the world know that the United States is against international crime, and that she can be counted upon to throw the weight of her great moral influence in favor of right and justice, leaving to the Congress to determine whether and to what extent it will intervene when the occasion arises. A substitute reservation (No. 2 annexed) will be offered to place our country on the moral side of these great questions, but leaving the matter wholly in the hands of the Congress.

"In considering the Shantung amendment the majority report reads:

"'The majority of the committee were not willing to have their votes recorded at any stage of the proceedings in favor of the consummation of what they consider a great wrong.'

"In this instance and, it seems to me, in many others the committee would prefer to express an idle sentiment rather than accomplish a result for the good of China. This declaration is not necessary, because there need be no conflict between a sentiment favorable to China and an act which will unquestionably relieve China from an embarrassing situation in which she has placed herself. If the committee amendment is adopted, Japan is thrown out of the league, or, more accurately, kicked out of it, by the United States. China is made to break her treaty with Japan. Japan outside the league is, of course, relieved, so far as the league is concerned, from any obligation to make good her treaty with China for a return of Shantung; and China is in no position to insist upon the fulfillment of a treaty which she, with the assistance or by the act of the United States, has abruptly and unceremoniously broken. We are met, therefore, in this Shantung proposition with a practical question. If China keeps her agreement and becomes a member of the league and Japan becomes a member of the league, then Japan must keep her counter agreement with China, and that counter agreement is to return the German concessions to China. This can be made clear by a brief statement of the facts.

"In 1898 Germany secured from China a 99 years' lease on both sides of the entrance of Kiaochow Bay; a concession on both the northern and southern side of the entrance to the bay, wherein Germany could exercise administrative rights; certain islands in the bay and islands lying to the seaward; and the right to construct two lines of railway in Shantung.

"When the war broke out and Japan took her place by the side of the Allies, the project allotted to her was the seizure of the German forts and all German rights in China. This she accomplished in a few months. China rendered her no assistance whatever in accomplishing this result. Shortly thereafter, and on May 25, 1915, Japan secured a treaty from China whereby China agreed that Japan should acquire the German leasehold and interest rights which Germany had theretofore held. Granted that China would have preferred to have had the Germans ousted without having the Japanese substituted for them. But China could not do it, and would not make the attempt. Japan could do it and did do it, and at no little cost in blood and treasure. Whatever Japan took she took from Germany and not from China, and long before China became even a paper ally. However, China received a very valuable advantage in her treaty with Japan over what she held under her treaty with Germany, because as a part of the treaty, and as a part of the consideration, Japan agreed as follows:

"'When, after the termination of the present war, the leased territory of Kiaochow Bay is completely left to the free disposal of Japan, the Japanese Government will restore the said leased territory to China under the following conditions:

"'1. The whole of Kiaochow Bay to be opened as a commercial port.

"'2. A concession under the exclusive jurisdiction of Japan to be established at a place designated by the Japanese Government.

"'3. If the foreign powers desire it, an international concession may be established.

"'4. As regards the disposal to be made of the public buildings and properties of Germany and the conditions and procedure relating thereto, the Japanese Government and the Chinese Government shall arrange the matter by mutual agreement before the restoration.'

"That the whole of Kiaochow Bay was to be opened as a commercial port is in no way injurious to China. It simply means that all nations of the world may carry on trade relations with China through that port as through other ports. It is the open-door policy.

"The concession mentioned under No. 2 is simply the right to have a place, the same as Great Britain, France, Italy, Belgium, and other countries have, where the Japanese may maintain a residence district under their control.

"The third is a like concession, where the nationals of any number of powers, if such nationals desire it, may reside.

"The fourth pertains only to buildings and properties belonging to the German Government of no important value and concerning which there could be little ground for dispute.

"There is nothing in these conditions to which any just complaint could be made, unless it be that the grant is to Japan and not to some other nation.

"Now, what great advantage does China secure by this treaty? She secures the right of immediate return of these German concessions to her at the close of this war, when the treaty shall become obligatory and the said concessions are left to the free disposal of Japan. That does not mean any time, 10 years hence, or 5 years, or 3 years, or even 1 year hence. It means that as soon as the treaty is signed Japan shall begin the process of returning the leased territory to China. If Japan should fail to do this, she will have been the first nation in the league to break her treaty agreement, both with China and with the league of nations, because, under the league of nations, she is 'held to a scrupulous respect for all her treaty obligations.' Her failure to comply with her treaty obligations would be a cause for war. On complaint of China the matter would have to go to the council of the league of nations. If, in defiance of the recommendation of that council, Japan still refused to comply with her treaty she would be ousted from the league of nations and the nations would be compelled to maintain the rights of China. But this is on the assumption that China herself comes before the league with clean hands and unbroken covenants. If, however, we compel her by this amendment to break her treaty, she can not insist upon Japan performing the conditions of a treaty which she herself has repudiated. Japan, being forced out of the league, will be under no obligation to conform to any of its provisions. To-day she holds the German rights, which in effect control the Shantung Peninsula, by both the right of conquest and a treaty with China. If we break China's treaty, we will be in no position to compel Japan to yield that right of conquest. Great Britain, France, and Italy, by reason of their treaty obligations, whereby they agreed that Japan might hold what she had taken from Germany, can bring to bear upon her no pressure. China will then be at the mercy of Japan. We will not go to war against Japan to settle a quarrel between Japan and China.

"Our true as well as practical course is to say to China, 'Keep your own record clear and your covenants unbroken.' Then the league of nations can properly say to Japan, 'You must keep your record clear and your covenant unbroken; and your covenant is to return the Shantung German leasehold to China immediately after your power to do so has come into existence by the adoption of this treaty.'

"By this process China will not only secure all the rights which she conceded to Germany, with these minor conditions which I have mentioned, but will also be assured hereafter against any further attempt on the part of any nation to obtain unconscionable rights over her or to dismember her empire.

"The declaration by the majority of the committee that the German rights were taken from one faithful ally and handed over to another ally is far from a correct statement of the case. The German rights were not taken from China. They were taken from Germany. Nor was China an ally of ours in any sense, either when Japan took the German rights from Germany or when she transferred those rights to Japan. In fact, she never became an ally except on paper, and that about two years later.

"There is but one proper way to proceed, and that is not to break agreements but to insist upon nations keeping their agreements. And that is China's salvation in this case.

"To the substance of some of the proposed reservations there can be no serious objection. But against the manner in which they are asserted I do most earnestly protest. They are couched in a defiant, discourteous, and overbearing manner, and seem intended to express a jingoistic spirit that ought to be eliminated from American statesmanship.

"I placed in the RECORD some days ago certain reservations which I think should be adopted in lieu of those which have been presented by the majority of the committee. These proposed reservations introduced by me into the RECORD cover subjects not referred to in the reservations adopted by the committee. I shall make them a part of this report.

"The reservations referred to read as follows:

"'1. That whenever the two years' notice of withdrawal from the league of nations shall have been given by the United States, as provided in article 1, the United States shall be the sole judge whether all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of withdrawal.

"'2. That the suggestions of the council of the league of nations as to the means of carrying the obligations of article 10 into effect are only advisory, and that any undertaking under the provisions of article 10 the execution of which may require the use of American military or naval forces or economic measure can under the Constitution be carried out only by the action of the Congress, and that the failure of the Congress to adopt the suggestions of the council of the league, or to provide such military or naval forces or economic measures, shall not constitute a violation of the treaty.

"'3. The United States reserves to itself the right to decide what questions are within its domestic jurisdiction and declares that all domestic and political questions relating to its internal affairs, including immigration, coastwise traffic, the tariff, commerce, and all other purely domestic questions are solely within the jurisdiction of the United States and are not by this covenant submitted in any way either to arbitration or to the consideration of the council or the assembly of the league of nations or to the decision or recommendation of any other power.

"'4. The United States does not bind itself to submit for arbitration or inquiry by the assembly or the council any question which in the judgment of the United States depends upon or involves its long-established policy commonly known as the Monroe doctrine, and it is preserved unaffected by any provision in the said treaty contained.

"'5. That in advising and consenting to the ratification of said treaty the United States understands that the German rights and interests, renounced by Germany in favor of Japan under the provisions of articles 156, 157, and 158 of said treaty, are to be returned by Japan to China at the termination of the present war by the adoption of this treaty, as provided in the exchanged notes between the Japanese and Chinese Governments of date May 25, 1915.

"'6. That the United States understands and construes the words "dispute between members" and the words "dispute between parties" in article 15 to mean that a dispute with a self-governing dominion, colony, or dependency represented in the assembly is a dispute with the dominant or principal member represented therein and that a dispute with such dominant or principal member is a dispute with all of its self-governing dominions, colonies, or dependencies, and that the exclusion of the parties to the dispute provided in the last paragraph of said article will cover not only the dominant or principal member, but also its dominions, colonies, and dependencies.'

"P. J. MCCUMBER."

REPORTS OF COMMITTEE ON CLAIMS.

Mr. GRONNA, from the Committee on Claims, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 209) for the relief of John T. Eaton (Rept. No. 186);

A bill (S. 642) for the relief of Mary C. Mayers (Rept. No. 187); and

A bill (S. 1194) for the relief of Elizabeth Marsh Watkins (Rept. No. 188).

ROOSEVELT MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION.

Mr. TOWNSEND. From the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads I submit a unanimous report on the bill (S. 2972) to extend the cancellation-stamp privilege to the Roosevelt Memorial Association. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, and it was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to permit the employment by the Roosevelt Memorial Association of a cancellation stamp bearing the following words: "Roosevelt Memorial Association, October 20–27."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EMPLOYMENT OF STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. SMOOT, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to which was referred Senate resolution 185, submitted by Mr. MCNARY on the 12th instant, reported it favorably without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands, or any subcommittee thereof, be, and hereby is, authorized during the Sixty-sixth Congress to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer, at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page, to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before said committee, the expenses thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. WADSWORTH:

A bill (S. 2999) to authorize the holding of terms of the United States District Court in Rensselaer County, New York (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. THOMAS:

A bill (S. 3000) granting a pension to Mary L. Pope; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. POMERENE:

A bill (S. 3001) granting a pension to Martha M. Childs; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SPENCER:

A bill (S. 3002) to amend section 1274, Revised Statutes of the United States, giving to officers retired from active service 75 per centum of the pay and allowances of the rank upon which they are retired; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 3003) granting a pension to Leon H. Coombs; and

A bill (S. 3004) granting an increase of pension to Thomas J. Lockhart; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 3005) for the relief of Ivy L. Merrill; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 108) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to issue patent to Alice Q. Lovell and W. S. Lovell; to the Committee on Public Lands.

FEDERAL TRANSPORTATION BOARD.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I send to the desk a bill providing for railroad reorganization, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The bill (S. 2998) to provide for the creation and organization of a Federal transportation board, to define its powers and duties, to authorize the organization of national railroad companies, to define their rights, duties, and liabilities, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I desire to make a brief statement at this time. The bill is introduced without any desire to embarrass the Committee on Interstate Commerce, of which I am a member. It is introduced simply in order that it may in some way, if possible, furnish additional thought to that committee in its deliberations on the subject.

This bill embodies the plan of railroad legislation worked out by the national transportation conference. This conference, which met at the invitation of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, was called together by that body "to consider the broader aspects of the transportation problem and the formulation of a basis for the control and operation of the transportation facilities of the United States after the conclusion of the present Government control."

In calling the conference together the National Chamber of Commerce recognized that many different interests throughout the Nation are affected by transportation, and that each interest should have a voice in determining what shall be done with the railroads after the present emergency has passed. Prominent men belonging to each important interest affected by transportation—commercial, industrial, agricultural, financial, labor, governmental, economic, civic, and social—were invited to attend the conference and to take part in its deliberations. About 50 men, representing these various interests, were present. The conclusions finally reached by the conference are the best expression that has been made of the views of the public as a whole concerning the question, "What shall be done with the railroads?"

I shall not impose upon the patience of the Senate by reading the list of men who constituted the conference, but, with the permission of the Senate, will print in the RECORD the names, together with a brief statement of the provisions of the bill and also the referendum of the chamber of commerce on the questions which were submitted to the various commercial bodies throughout the country, together with the vote that was taken upon those questions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, permission to do so is granted.

The names referred to are as follows:

"Among the prominent shippers and manufacturers were Frederick J. Koster, president of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce; W. W. Salmon, president of the General Railway Signal Co., of Rochester, N. Y.; and W. S. Dickey, president of the W. S. Dickey Clay Manufacturing Co., of Kansas City.

"Among the prominent agriculturalists who took an active part in the deliberations was the Hon. H. C. Stuart, former governor of Virginia, and chairman of the National Agricultural Advisory Committee.

"Among the bankers who helped to work out the plan of railroad legislation were Harry A. Wheeler, vice president of the Union Trust Co., of Chicago, and three times president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States; and Paul M. Warburg, formerly vice governor of the Federal Reserve Board.

"The labor leaders who participated in the deliberations of the conference included, among others, the executives of the railway brotherhoods, and Frank Morrison, secretary, and Henry Sterling, legislative representative, of the American Federation of Labor.

"An active part in the deliberations of the conference was taken by Daniel Willard, president of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad; S. T. Bledsoe, general counsel of the Atchison; and E. G. Buckland, president of the New Haven.

"The conference was twice addressed by Hon. Walker D. Hines, Director General of Railroads, and an active part in the discussions at the successive sessions of the conference was taken by Winthrop M. Daniels, member of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and by Charles E. Elmquist, president of the National Association of Railroad and Utilities Commissioners.

"Prominent university professors who have given special attention to transportation economics contributed their knowledge to the work of the conference. These professors of economics included Edwin R. A. Seligman, of Columbia University; Emory R. Johnson, of the University of Pennsylvania; W. Z. Ripley, of Harvard; John R. Commons, of the University of Wisconsin; and Henry W. Farnam, of Yale University. Of these men Prof. Johnson and Prof. Seligman were most active.

"The men who were present to represent the civic and social viewpoints rather than any particular business interests included, among others, R. G. Rhett, former president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States; Alexander W. Smith, ex-president of the Georgia Bar Association; and Charles P. Neill, who was Commissioner of Labor during the Roosevelt administration."

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, such was the personnel of the conference it would be hard to conceive of a more representative group of men. They are men of high standing who labored disinterestedly to perfect a plan of railroad legislation that would give due consideration to all the various interests affected by transportation.

The work of the conference was thorough, painstaking, and comprehensive. The conference as a whole met on five different occasions, each meeting lasting for two days. The first meeting was in December of 1918, the last was in June of this year. At these five different meetings 22 sessions were held, and between the meetings committees of the conference had numerous sessions. A majority of the members of the conference attended practically all of the sessions, and voted in favor of the program finally adopted.

As indicative of the freedom of discussion that prevailed in the conference, and of the open-mindedness and fairness of those who participated in the work, reference may be made to a statement made before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce by Mr. W. N. Doak, vice president of the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen. Mr. Doak said:

I want to make this statement in fairness and justice to the gentlemen of the conference—that they have made a most exhaustive study, and all of their deliberations have been conducted with the utmost frankness and freedom. They tried to assemble as many representative men as it was possible in this conference from the different walks of life, and every one has had an opportunity in their conferences to frankly and freely express his views, and I am quite sure that the committee can well afford to give consideration to their plan. I am convinced that there are no selfish or ulterior motives that prompted these gentlemen during their deliberations.

The plan of railroad legislation adopted by these gentlemen, working in the disinterested manner I have described, would, if adopted, provide for—

Briefly stated, the plan for railroad legislation recently submitted to Congress by the National Transportation Conference provides for—

1. Return of the railroads to private ownership and operation as soon as the necessary remedial legislation can be enacted.
2. Consolidation of existing railroads into strong competitive systems.
3. Requirement that all carriers engaged in interstate commerce subject themselves as corporations to Federal jurisdiction.
4. Exclusive Federal regulation of the capital expenditures and the security issues of all carriers engaged in interstate commerce.
5. Interstate Commerce Commission to retain its present powers and to be given additional powers over rates.
6. Creation of a Federal transportation board, to promote the development of a national system of rail, water, and highway transportation; to pass upon the public necessity for capital expenditures; to regulate security issues; to administer and enforce the measures that may be adopted for strengthening and stabilizing railroad credit; to determine the grouping or consolidation of railroads deemed to be in the public interest; and to carry out plans authorized by Congress for merging all railroads engaged in interstate commerce into strong competing systems.
7. Adjustment of the wages and working conditions of railroad employees by boards consisting of equal numbers of representatives of railroad employees and railroad officers, with the Federal Transportation Board as referee.
8. Adoption by Congress of a plan for the stabilization of railroad revenues and credit by means of (a) enactment of a statutory rule providing that the rate structure established by public authority shall be designed to yield a net return of six (6) per cent per annum upon the aggregate fair value of the property of the roads in each traffic section of the country, such fair value to be determined after due consideration of both physical value and earning power. (b) Use of the aggregate property investment accounts of the railroads as the fair value of the property for rate-making purposes pending the completion of the valuation now being made by the Interstate Commerce Commission. (c) Creation of two kinds of contingent funds—an individual railroad contingent fund established by each road to support its own credit, and a general railroad contingent fund maintained by contributions from all prosperous roads, managed by trustees appointed by the Federal Transportation Board and used to support the credit of all of the railroads of the country. Any excess in the general railroad contingent fund above $750,000,000 is to be used for the general development of the transportation system of the country.
9. Creation of a railroad reserve fund administered by the Federal Transportation Board to facilitate the prompt stabilization of railroad credit, and loan of $500,000,000 to this fund by Congress as soon as the railroads are returned to their owners; this loan to be used, if necessary, in making advances to the general railroad contingent fund, and to be repaid with interest from moneys contributed by the railroads to the general railroad contingent fund.
10. Determination and announcement by the Federal Transportation Board of the grouping or consolidation of railroads deemed to be in the public interest; and authorization for the board to require such consolidations if they shall not have been effected or well advanced within a period of five years after the board has declared them to be desirable.
11. Organization of the board of directors of each consolidated railroad system with 12 members of the board, 8 to be elected by the stockholders and 4 to be representatives of the employees and of the public interests.

This program of legislation has been put into appropriate legislative form in the bill which I have the honor to introduce. I believe this bill contains the soundest and most comprehensive plan of railroad legislation that has been presented to Congress. It is based upon the principle that the railroads in the United States should be privately owned and operated, subject to comprehensive regulation by the Federal Government; that the railroads should be so grouped as to eliminate the weak and struggling systems while maintaining effective competition among the strong systems that are perpetuated; these strong systems are in due time to be controlled by Federal corporations whose securities are to be regulated by the United States; the Interstate Commerce Commission is to regulate rates, both interstate and intrastate, in so far as the latter affect interstate commerce; a Federal transportation board is to be created to exercise the many administrative functions of regulation; wages and working conditions of employees are to be adjusted as at present by boards consisting of equal numbers of representatives of employees and railroad officials; the credit of the railroads is to be restored and maintained by the enactment of a statutory rule of rate making designed to yield the railroads as a whole a net return of not less than 6 per cent per annum upon the aggregate fair value of the railroads; and to make practicable the working of this statutory rule, each railroad company is to accumulate a company contingent fund to be drawn upon in lean years, and all railroads having earnings in excess of 6 per cent per annum upon the fair value of their property are to contribute a portion of the excess earnings to a general railroad contingent fund which may be drawn upon by the railroads as a whole when the rates fixed by public authority yield less than the 6 per cent per annuum upon the aggregate fair value of the railroad property.

To provide for the maintenance and prompt stabilization of railroad credit during the period of transition from Government to corporate operation of the railroads, Congress is to loan $500,000,000 to the Federal transportation board to be employed as necessary in accordance with the provision of the bill; and lastly the boards of directors of the future consolidated railroad systems are each to consist of 12 members, 8 of whom are to be elected by the stockholders and 4 of whom are to be representatives of the employees and of the public interests served by the several systems.

While the deliberations of the national transportation conference were in progress and before its final program had been adopted, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States held its annual meeting in St. Louis, beginning of the 30th of April, 1919. At this meeting the board of directors of the chamber received from and adopted a report of the railroad committee of the chamber of commerce. The members of this committee were participating in the deliberations of the national transportation conference and the report that they submitted to the board of directors of the chamber embodied most of the principles that were subsequently adopted by the transportation conference. The board of directors of the chamber submitted the report of the railroad committee to a referendum vote of the organization members of the chamber, including local chambers of commerce and other business associations. The favorable vote on this referendum by the chambers of commerce throughout the country is the best expression that could be obtained of the business sentiment of the country upon the program of railroad legislation that should be adopted by Congress.

The principles of railroad legislation approved by the business interests of the country, as expressed by the referendum vote taken by the national chamber, include:

(1) Corporate ownership and operation of railroads.
(2) Return of the roads to their owners as soon as the necessary legislation can be enacted.
(3) Consolidation of existing roads in strong, competing systems.
(4) Compulsory Federal incorporation.
(5) Federal regulation of capital expenditures and security issues.
(6) Federal regulation of intrastate rates affecting interstate commerce.
(7) Adoption of a statutory rule of rate making that will assure to the railroads revenue sufficient to enable them to furnish the public with adequate facilities and efficient and economical service.
(8) Creation of a Federal transportation board to promote the development of a national system of rail, water, and highway transportation.

The principles voted upon in this referendum were embodied in 10 specific propositions:

I. The committee recommends adherence to the policy of corporate ownership and operation, with comprehensive regulation, 1,458 votes in favor, 11 votes opposed.

II. The committee recommends return of roads to corporate operation as soon as remedial legislation can be enacted, 1,458 votes in favor, 13 votes opposed.

III. The committee recommends adherence to the period of Federal control as now fixed unless and until impossibility of remedial legislation in this period clearly appears, 1,339½ votes in favor, 114½ votes opposed.

IV. The committee recommends permission for consolidation in the public interest, with prior approval by Government authority, in a limited number of strong competing systems, 1,309½ votes in favor, 125½ votes opposed.

V. The committee recommends a requirement that railroad companies engaging in interstate commerce become Federal corporations, with rights of taxation and police regulation reserved for States, 1,224 votes in favor, 193 votes opposed.

VI. The committee recommends exclusive Federal regulation of capital expenditures and security issues of railroads engaged in interstate commerce, with provision for notice and hearing for State authorities, 1,334½ votes in favor, 90½ votes opposed.

VII. The committee recommends Federal regulation of intrastate rates affecting interstate commerce, 1,329½ votes in favor, 116½ votes opposed.

VIII. The committee recommends a statutory rule providing that rates in each traffic section shall yield an adequate return on a fair value of the property as determined by public authority, 1,223½ votes in favor, 209½ votes opposed.

IX. The committee recommends payment into a fund of a share of the excess earned by any railroad system under application of the above statutory rule over an equitable minimum return upon fair value of property, this fund to be used as Congress directs for strengthening general railroad credit and increasing general railroad efficiency, 863½ votes in favor, 542½ votes opposed.

X. The committee recommends a Federal transportation board to promote development of a national system of rail, water, and highway transportation and articulation of all transportation facilities, 1,197 votes in favor, 244 votes opposed.

In accordance with these votes, the chamber is committed to each of the propositions I to VIII, inclusive, and proposition X, since more than one-third of the voting strength of the chamber was recorded upon each, and more than two-thirds of the votes thus cast, representing more than 20 States, were in favor of each of the propositions I to VIII, inclusive, and proposition X. The chamber is not committed to proposition IX, since two-thirds of the votes cast were not in favor of that proposition.

These principles include most of the features of the plan of railroad legislation adopted by the national transportation conference. It is entirely accurate to say that the principles upon which the plan of railroad legislation is embodied in the bill which I have the honor to introduce have been approved by the business organizations of the country. This is a fact of great significance. A plan that was adopted after six months' deliberation by a group of between 40 and 50 men representing all the principal economic and social interests of the country has found favor with the business men of the country. I believe that a careful consideration of the plan by Congress will cause the plan to receive the support here which it has already attained from business men.

I also ask permission to present and have printed in the RECORD a digest of the bill just introduced by me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DIGEST OF BILL.

"To provide for the creation of a Federal transportation board, to define its powers and duties, to authorize the organization of Federal railroad companies, to define their rights, duties, and liabilities, and for other purposes."

The contents of the bill, section by section, are summarized below:

Sections 1 and 2 provide a short title and definitions.

Section 3 provides that the act shall not apply to Territories or possessions.

Section 4 creates a Federal transportation board composed of five members, appointed by the President with the consent of the Senate. Members of the board are provided with salaries of $12,000 a year and terms of 10 years. At least one member of the board must be a person experienced in the management of railroads.

Section 5 authorizes the transportation board to make its rules of procedure, elect its officers, appoint a secretary, and employ other assistants.

Sections 6 and 7 permit the board to examine the books and papers of railroad companies and to require by subpœna the attendance of witnesses and the production of documentary evidence. Testimony may also be taken by deposition.

Section 8 requires the board to report annually to Congress.

Section 9 provides that the board shall promote the development of a national system of rail, water, and highway transportation, properly articulated. The board is also required to inquire into the practices and operations of railroad companies.

Sections 10 and 11 provide that national railroad companies may be incorporated under this act for the purpose of carrying on the business of common carriers by railroad. These corporations may be organized under the supervision of the transportation board by any number of natural persons not less than five.

Sections 12 and 13 provide for the form and content of the organization certificate and the filing of the certificate, while section 14 gives the national railroad corporation general corporate powers and the power of eminent domain.

Sections 15 and 16 provide that the affairs of every national railroad company shall be managed by 12 directors, of whom two are elected by the employees, eight are elected outright by the stockholders, while the remaining two are selected by the stockholders from among persons nominated by the transportation board.

Sections 17, 18, and 19 provide that the capital stock of every national railroad company shall be divided into shares of $100 each. The transportation board may prescribe the amount which must be paid in on such stock in advance. The company may later change its articles of association so as to increase its authorized capital. Section 20 specifies the voting privileges connected with such stock.

Sections 21, 22, and 23 permit any existing railroad company to convert itself into a national railroad company if a majority of its stock assents and if the transportation board approves, notwithstanding any State constitution or laws. It is provided that such conversion shall not interrupt the business of such railroad company.

Section 24 forbids any person other than a national railroad company organized under this act to engage in the business of a common carrier by railroad in interstate commerce, from and after two years from the passage of the act, unless the transportation board grants an extension of time in the case of a particular carrier.

Section 25 provides that no railroad company may issue stock, bonds, or other securities without the approval of the transportation board.

Section 26 makes unlawful the charging or collecting of any rate which injuriously affects interstate commerce, thus extending the rule of the Shreveport case.

Section 27 requires the Interstate Commerce Commission to divide the United States into traffic sections for rate-making purposes. These sections may be based on geographical boundaries or groupings of railroads, or both.

Sections 28 and 29 provide for representatives of the railroads meeting in conferences, and constructing schedules of rates designed to produce revenue sufficient to yield earnings of not less than 6 per cent on the aggregate value of all the railroad property in each traffic section. The Interstate Commerce Commission then passes upon these schedules as a whole, after which they are initiated by the individual carriers affected, when they become subject to all the provisions of the interstate commerce act.

Section 30 supplements section 19a of the interstate commerce act respecting the valuation of railroads. Pending the completion of the commission's valuation, the aggregate property investment accounts of the railroads in each traffic section shall be deemed to represent the fair value of the railroad property in such section.

Section 31 provides that in any year when the earnings of any railroad exceed 6 per cent of the value of its property, one half of the excess shall be placed in a contingent fund to be maintained by each railroad company, and the other half shall be paid into a general railroad contingent fund. Provision is made for revising the permitted rate of return decennially.

Section 32 permits a railroad company to draw upon its own contingent fund when, and to the extent that, its net income falls below 6 per cent of the value of its property.

Section 33 requires any railroad company which has accumulated an adequate contingent fund to turn over two-thirds of its excess income into the general railroad contingent fund, the remaining one-third to be retained by the company.

Section 34 provides that the general railroad contingent fund, which is to be managed by five trustees, shall be used to recompense railroad companies which do not earn a 6 per cent return in any year. The money is to be distributed in proportion to the gross earnings of the railroads in each section.

Section 35 provides that the general railroad contingent fund shall be maintained at $750,000,000, any excess to be used for developing a national transportation system, or for reducing the capital or investment accounts of railroad companies. Such excess may also be covered into the Treasury of the United States, if Congress so directs.

Section 36 appropriates $500,000,000 for a railroad reserve fund to pay deficiencies which the general railroad contingent fund is unable to pay within 10 years after the passage of this act. Such sums so paid must be repaid with interest by the carriers.

Section 37 provides that the acts of Congress which prohibit monopolies and combinations shall be construed to prevent consolidations and mergers under this act.

Section 38 requires the transportation board and the railroads to prepare plans for grouping the railroads of the country into a "limited number of strong competitive systems, so arranged that each traffic center shall be served by more than one such system." Within five years after the board completes and approves such plans, the railroads are required to effect the mergers, consolidations, and reorganizations prescribed by the board.

Section 39 provides that the power of the States over railroad companies with respect to taxation and police regulation shall not be impaired by the incorporation or reincorporation of a railroad under this act.

Section 40 provides for labor boards, composed of equal numbers of representatives of railroad companies and employees to consider demands relating to wages, hours, or working conditions. Decisions of these boards are binding on the company and on the employees. In case of a deadlock, the transportation board acts as referee.

Section 41 appropriates $300,000,000 to be used as a revolving fund to enable the transportation board to make necessary loans to railroads which deserve financial assistance and which can not secure loans elsewhere.

Section 42 appropriates $500,000 to meet the expenses of administering the act.

Section 43 provides that the invalidity of any part of the act shall not affect the validity of the remainder.

Section 44 provides that the act shall become effective on the termination of Federal control of the railroads, except that those sections creating the transportation board and vesting it with certain powers and duties shall take effect on the passage of the act.

DEVELOPMENT OF WATER POWER.

Mr. KNOX submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 3184) to create a Federal power commission and to define its powers and duties, to provide for the improvement of navigation, for the development of water power, for the use of lands of the United States in relation thereto, to repeal section 18 of "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved August 8, 1917, and for other purposes, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have here a telegram from Mr. Houghton, president of the Leslie E. Keeley Liquor Cure Institute, which I would like to have read to the Senate, as it relates to certain provisions of the pending prohibition bill. I ask that it be read for the information of the Senate. I believe it to be of enough importance, in view of the pending legislation, to have it read.

There being no objection, the Secretary read as follows:

DWIGHT, ILL., September 14, 1919.

Hon. LAWRENCE Y. SHERMAN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

House bill 6810, according to published reports, will restrict administration of liquor in Keeley institutes treating liquor patients to a dangerous extent; we only give liquor to prevent shock and collapse and never as a beverage; most Keeley institutes are small and have no registered pharmacist; compounding and administering medicines and liquor is done by registered physicians; have bill amended to permit reputable establishments to administer liquor in suitable cases and in proper quantities. We have been in business over 40 years, and have branches throughout the United States. We have cured hundreds of thousands of men and women. This bill, unless amended, will hinder our work and not only seriously injure us but thousands of others who need our help. We urge you to use your influence to have this bill amended so that registered physicians in our institutes can administer to our patients the liquor their condition demands.

LESLIE E. KEELEY CO.,
J. R. HOUGHTON, President.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I send to the desk a brief telegram, which I ask may be read. The fact stated has already appeared in the newspapers, but I should like to have it also go into the RECORD.

There being no objection, the telegram was read, as follows:

COLUMBUS, OHIO, September 12, 1919.

Senator HENRY CABOT LODGE,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

National Encampment Grand Army just declared, by overwhelming majority, its absolute disapproval of league of nations.

THOMAS S. HOPKINS,
Past Department Commander,
Delegate from Washington, D. C.

Mr. LODGE. I also present and ask that it may be printed in the RECORD, without reading, an article which I cut from the New York Sun of yesterday in regard to the attitude of Switzerland in reference to the league of nations.

There being no objection, the article referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"SWISS ARE BEING FORCED INTO LEAGUE—CONSTANT WAR MENACE AND NO BENEFITS ARE SEEN BY REPUBLIC—LOOK TO UNITED STATES FOR RELIEF—COUNCIL OF LEADING MILITARY MEN WARNED AGAINST PERILS OF JOINING.

"ZURICH, August 21.

"Will the largest Republic save the oldest Republic? The people of Switzerland hope the American Senate, backed by the majority of the American people, will save them, not only Switzerland but all the other small nations that are being forced into the league of nations, so called, against their own will.

"The Swiss people, through their Government, protested against the covenant framed in Paris, but their objections were ruthlessly brushed aside. Switzerland was told she must join or economic ruin would follow. Reservations will not be permitted. She must join within two months after ratification by three of the principal powers or she will become a third-rate member of the league instead of a second-rate member.

"The Swiss people will have to vote on the question whether to join the league or not. Among the Swiss people there is not one in a hundred who really cares to see his country join the league; there is not one in a thousand who enthusiastically supports this kind of a league, and there is not one in ten thousand who does not regret the sacrifice of the independence of the oldest Republic of the world.

"The principal argument put forward by the 'advocates' of the league is this: 'It is true it is bad for Switzerland to join this league; it is humiliating; our independence and economic life are being jeopardized, but we might as well join, for should we stay out our fate will be worse. So let's go in and try to improve matters in the course of time. At any rate, we may get out again after giving two years' notice.'

"Now all eyes are turned toward America. All hearts are hoping, and all hearts are praying, that the American Senate in behalf of the American people will deliver them from the league, will smash the fetters that are to enchain a people that heretofore was the freest in Europe. And the same prayers are said in Holland, in Denmark, in Norway, and in Sweden. All these peoples are appealing to the American Nation, asking the strongest democracy to save the weaker ones.

"GOVERNMENT SURRENDERS.

"In Switzerland tremendous pressure has been exerted in order to bring about submission. When the covenant was first published there was practical unanimity in condemnation. The friends of a real league were shocked. The press was stunned. Members of the Government were dumbfounded. Then the screws were set. They were tightened from time to time. The Government finally succumbed. It now recommends joining the league in a lengthy message in which it concedes the injurious features of the covenant, but also appears to find a few extenuating circumstances. The legislature will have to decide next, and then the question will be submitted to the people as a whole.

"The Swiss Government is cowed. There is no doubt about it. It declared in favor of the league, but its sincerity is being doubted. Some people say the Government did not dare to oppose the scheme, but hope the people will kill it. Some pertinent questions are being asked in the newspapers, in mass meetings, and at political conventions. The people want to know whether their representatives were coerced by outside influences. Of course, the Government will not tell them.

"There is one thing as certain as death: If the American Senate smashes the league there will be bonfires on every mountain peak of the Alps and a magnificent majority of Swiss citizens will joyfully vote against joining the octopus. A huge load will be lifted from the body of the Swiss people, who again will be able to draw a free breath.

"Edward Schuerch, editor of the Berne Bund, one of the leading journals of the country, addressing a convention of his party, said: 'We can not save ourselves. We tried to, but we failed. I hope America will save us.'

"Schuerch was one of five Swiss journalists who, upon the invitation of the United States Government, visited America only a few months ago and is supposed to know a little about American sentiment, although a strict censorship prevents any real American news from reaching our country.

"Every Swiss newspaper is filled with discussion of the league. Says the Zurich Post:

"'If the covenant were defective in form only, if there were any possibility of improving it, we could waive our objections. But there is no such possibility. If Switzerland joins the league of nations she will have to sacrifice her traditional policy of neutrality, proven valuable for hundreds of years. And the league will not guarantee to us that economic security of which so many have been dreaming. We must not only give up our cherished neutrality, but also part of our sovereignty. Switzerland will be merely a vassal State. She will have no say as to whether she wants to go to war, but she will be told by others when she is to send out her youth to give battle.

"NEUTRALITY NOT PROTECTED.

"'We have been told that the league will not affect our neutrality in a military respect. Article 21 of the covenant and article 435 of the peace treaty have been pointed out to us. We are told these articles will protect our neutrality. But this statement will not stand the test of closer examination. Article 21 mentions the Monroe doctrine, but it does not mention Swiss neutrality. There is no doubt about the obligation of the United States to take part in a war of execution in spite of the so-called recognition of the Monroe doctrine. This proves that international agreements mentioned in that article do not release any member of the league from taking part in a war.

"'To believe that the league would lessen the peril of war is a delusion. It may have removed the danger so far as Germany and Austria, now without power and defense, are concerned. But it is not true of Serbo-Croatia and the other Balkan States. Who would guarantee that friendship between those two Latin sisters, France and Italy, will last much longer? The league imposed disarmament upon the defeated nations only, not upon the victors. Douglas Haig tells Britain even to reorganize her military system after the Prussian model.

"'The Paris league's principal organic defect is the omission of a court of arbitration. There should be an international tribunal of justice which would decide according to law. But there is no longer any international law, and the league's council will not decide according to justice, but according to the interests of the principal powers constituting the council. Wherever the interests of those principal powers are affected the other nations can not expect a fair decision.'

"The Zurich Gazette says:

"'The establishment of a league of nations was the last of the 14 points President Wilson announced as the objects of the war. The Entente nations reluctantly accepted point 14, because they wanted Wilson's cooperation in framing the peace terms according to their own wishes. Those wishes England, France, and Italy had agreed upon in secret conference long before Wilson arrived in Europe. In making these secret agreements the subscribers to the 14 points ruthlessly violated point 1, declaring for open covenants, to begin with. * * *

"SUPPORTERS SKEPTICAL.

"Even the advocates of the league admit they are filled with misgivings and doubts, but they insist that political aspects should be ignored. They base their reasons for joining the league upon economic grounds. They promise us a revision of the covenant. They tell us the Central Powers would soon be admitted to membership, thus eliminating the danger of Switzerland becoming the principal battle ground in the next war. They argue we might as well join the league, for if we should not join we would be compelled to do the very things the Entente wants us to do in case of necessity. We are assured that Germany could not very well find fault with us for joining the league, so long as Germany herself was only too glad to join if permitted. But are we really to base the future of our nation upon hopes so vague, upon fears and upon futile speculations?

"'The league of nations is a compromise arrived at by the big victors after severe strife. It is idle to think that Switzerland could induce these victors to change one iota of their cherished plan. Besides, any "improvements" would not amount to anything. Of course Germany would like to be admitted to membership in order to escape the yoke of slavery placed upon her shoulders. But for this very reason she will not be admitted. In consequence, the enmity between the league on the one hand and Germany and her friends on the other hand will increase and become more intense as the years pass by. Thus another war is inevitable. Switzerland being a member of the league will have to take part in this war. If not a member of the league she will probably have to fight just the same. But in that case at least we shall have saved our honor. Let us at least maintain our independence until we are forced to give it up. Let us not surrender it voluntarily. Let us uphold our honor.'

"NO WAR IMMUNITY.

"All the papers, whether in favor of the league or against it, admit that Switzerland will have to surrender her neutrality if she joins. Neutrality and membership in the league exclude one another. It has been agreed in Paris, in alleged conversations but not on paper, that Switzerland would not be called upon to take part in a war of execution in a military sense, but she would be required to participate in economic measures against the enemy. The Swiss people well know that you can not separate economic warfare from military warfare. In this respect the late World War has been an illuminating example. The Swiss people have enjoyed the results of economic warfare, and they are still enjoying some of the after effects. They know an enemy is bound to attack, militarily as well as otherwise, a country that was waging war, whether confined to economic war measures or not. For economic measures may decide the outcome of the war more forcibly than military operations. There are people who believe the late World War was decided by economic blockade more effectively than by guns and bayonets.

"The question as to how the league would affect Switzerland from a military point of view was submitted to the national council of defense, a body composed of the leading military officers of Switzerland. This council, by a majority vote, decided to warn against joining the league. It decided the question from a purely military standpoint. The recommendation signed by the council's majority has been kept secret by the Government, who decided to disregard it. The press and public are now demanding the document should be made public, as the people are entitled to know all about the dangers confronting them if they should join the league and Switzerland become the principal battle ground of a future war, as predicted by the highest military authorities of the country.

"The date of the special election to decide the momentous question has not been fixed. It was to have been this month, but it will probably not be called until the treaty has been ratified by three principal powers. Switzerland, being between the devil and the deep sea, is putting off the day as long as possible, hoping something will intervene. If the American Senate should intervene, there would be general rejoicing. America would again ingratiate herself with her poor little sister Republic now in deepest distress and pleading for help."

Mr. FLETCHER. I have received a communication from the secretary of the League to Enforce Peace, together with a petition to Members of the Senate, dated August 27, 1919, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEAGUE TO ENFORCE PEACE,
New York, August 27, 1919.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I beg to call your attention to the inclosed petition to Members of the Senate signed by representative citizens of 39 States and the District of Columbia. Since the League to Enforce Peace has strong organization in every State, it would have been easily possible to secure thousands of signatures if such had been desired. The purpose, on the contrary, was to reach representative people in all walks of life who know and are competent to express the public opinion of their States. Since the southern Senators represent practically unanimous support of the South for the league of nations, no effort was made to get signatures from that section, except in a few instances where the signers represent organizations of national membership.

Very truly, yours, W. H. SHORT, Secretary.

To the Senate of the United States:

In the Senate at Washington, now that the Committee on Foreign Relations has reported the treaty, the lines are sharply drawn between the immediate ratification of the treaty of peace with Germany and its amendment with a reassembling of the conference and a reopening of negotiations that would bring great delay and prolonged uncertainty in settling the great issues of the peace. No partisan plea can be made. Party lines are already broken.

Standing at a distance from the conflict in the Senate Chamber, we plead for immediate ratification without delay. Our land requires it. A state of nervous strain, tension, and unrest exists, manifesting itself in disturbances, which in some cases have no self-evident connection with the war, but which are in fact its aftermath. The world is put in imminent peril of new wars by the lapse of each day. Dissensions between us and our former Allies are being sown. We firmly believe and solemnly declare that the States and cities in which we dwell desire immediate peace.

The waging of war steadied and united the American people. Peace will bring prosperity, and prosperity content. Delay in the Senate postponing ratification in this uncertain period of neither peace nor war has resulted in indecision and doubt, bred strife and quickened the cupidity of those who sell the daily necessities of life and the fears of those whose daily wage no longer fills the daily market basket.

We beseech the Senate to give the land peace and certainty by a ratification which will not keep us longer in the shadows of possible wars but give the whole world the light of peace. Reservations in the nature of clarifications in the meaning of the treaty, not inconsistent with its terms, will not require the reopening of the negotiations with Germany and with our associates in the war, which we all and each united to win.

But there is no possibility of doubt that amendment of the treaty, as is now proposed by the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, would require negotiation and a reopening of all the questions decided at Paris. Months of delay would follow. The perils of the present would become the deadly dangers of the near future. All the doubt engendered would aid the plots for violent revolution in this and other lands. The issues here and elsewhere between capital and labor, the conspiracy of speculator and profiteer, would all grow and become more perilous.

This can not be. The American people can not, after a victorious war, permit its Government to petition Germany, which has accepted the treaty, for its consent to changes in the treaty. Yet if the United States should amend the treaty for its own purpose and policy, Germany would have full right to ask for concessions. Germany has agreed to make no claim in regard to enemy property seized in this country to an amount of $700,000,000. Our recent foe could ask for a reopening of this issue and of the Lusitania claims. It could raise every question open before hostilities in regard to submarine warfare and the treatment of its nationals in this country. All the provisions for our trade in Germany raised by the economic clauses of the treaty, many of them vital to our industries and our farms, as in dye patents, dye supplies, and fertilizers, the working of the reparation commission which superintends the trade of all with Germany could all be brought up by Berlin for readjustment by our negotiators, acting for the United States alone and no longer associated with other victorious powers or supported by a victorious American Army on the German border.

Peace itself, the peace of the world, is delayed until ratification comes. And any amendment postpones peace. Germany and England alone of the principal powers have ratified. The other principals necessarily await our action, influential and powerful as we are to-day in the world's affairs. The ravages of war on more than a score of fighting fronts are continued by any needless delay. Let the Senate give the world peace by ratification without amendment.

Even the amendment for which most can be said, the provision in regard to Shantung, will secure nothing which can not be gained if China, backed by the powerful advocacy of the United States, addresses itself to the machinery for righting international wrongs and meeting just claims created by the league between nations. China, after 80 years of oppressive treaties and despoiled rights, by which all the great powers have profited directly or indirectly, has for the first time, in this covenant and treaty, the means and method to secure justice and the removal of the oppressive economic interference of stronger nations whose citizens are within her gates, protected by a long succession of international agreements. Moreover, it should be remembered that the clause regarding Shantung was made upon the statement by Japan that she will return the territory to China, and, therefore, upon that condition, compliance with which promise the league can require.

The peace of the present and the righteousness of the future can be best secured by the ratification of the covenant and treaty without amendment. Let the Senate take no action that will give any party to the treaty, and especially Germany, ground for maintaining that the ratification of the United States is not complete and that changes requiring a resumption of conference and negotiations have been made in it.

INTERNATIONAL AIR NAVIGATION (S. DOC. NO. 91).

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, in my address a few days ago on the treaty of peace with Germany I made reference to the convention relating to international air navigation, which was not printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks. As it is a part of the German treaty, I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD and also printed as a public document, with illustrations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CONVENTION RELATING TO INTERNATIONAL AIR NAVIGATION.

The attached document is the international convention for the regulation of international air navigation agreed by the representatives of the allied and associated powers serving on the international commission dealing with aerial navigation and appointed as a subcommission of the peace conference.

The convention has been agreed to by all the representatives, subject to certain reservations. The convention has not been formally approved by the supreme council of the peace conference. It has, however, been agreed that it should be issued for the information of the public of the allied and associated States.

CHAPTER I.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES.

Article 1.

The contracting States recognize that every State has complete and exclusive sovereignty in the air space above its territory and territorial waters.

Article 2.

Each contracting State undertakes in time of peace to accord freedom of innocent passage above its territory and territorial waters as well as above the territories and territorial waters of its colonies to the aircraft of the other contracting States, provided that the conditions established in this convention are observed.

All regulations made by a contracting State as to the admission over its territory of the aircraft of the other contracting States shall be applied without distinction of nationality.

Article 3.

Each contracting State has the right, for military reasons or in the interest of public safety, to prohibit the aircraft of the other contracting States, under the penalties provided by its legislation and subject to no distinction being made in this respect between its private aircraft and those of the other contracting States, from flying over certain areas of its territory.

If it makes use of this right, it shall publish and notify beforehand to the other contracting States the location and extent of the prohibited areas.

Article 4.

Every aircraft which finds itself above a prohibited area shall, as soon as aware of the fact, give the signal of distress provided in paragraph 17 of Annex D and land outside the prohibited area as near to it as possible and as soon as possible at one of the aerodromes of the State unlawfully flown over.

CHAPTER II.

NATIONALITY OF AIRCRAFT.

Article 5.

No contracting State shall, except by a special and temporary authorization, permit the flight above its territory of an aircraft which does not possess the nationality of a contracting State.

Article 6.

An aircraft possesses the nationality of the State on the register of which it is entered, in accordance with the provisions of section 1 (c) of Annex A.

Article 7.

An aircraft shall not be entered on the register of one of the contracting States unless it belongs wholly to nationals of such State.

An incorporated company can not be the registered owner of an aircraft unless it possesses the nationality of the State in which the aircraft is registered, and unless the president or chairman of the company and at least two-thirds of the directors possess the same nationality, and unless the company fulfills all other conditions which may be prescribed by the laws of each State.

Article 8.

An aircraft can not be validly registered in more than one State.

Article 9.

The contracting States shall every month exchange among themselves and transmit to the International Commission for Air Navigation copies of registrations and of cancellations of registration which shall have been entered on their official registers during the preceding month.

Article 10.

All aircraft engaged in international navigation shall bear their nationality and registration marks as well as the name and residence of the owner in accordance with Annex A.

CHAPTER III.

CERTIFICATES OF AIRWORTHINESS AND COMPETENCY.

Article 11.

Every aircraft engaged in international navigation shall, in accordance with Annex B, be provided with a certificate of airworthiness issued or rendered valid by the State whose nationality it possesses.

Article 12.

The commanding officer, pilots, engineers, and other members of the operating crew of every aircraft shall, in accordance with Annex E, be provided with certificates of competency and licenses issued or rendered valid by the State whose nationality the aircraft possesses.

Article 13.

Certificates of airworthiness and of competency and licenses issued or rendered valid by the State whose nationality the aircraft possesses, in accordance with the regulations established by Annex B and Annex E and hereafter by the International Commission for Air Navigation, shall be recognized as valid by the other States.

Each State has the right to refuse to recognize for the purpose of flights within the limits of and above its own territory certificates of competency and licenses granted to one of its nationals by another contracting State.

Article 14.

No wireless apparatus shall be carried without a special license issued by the State whose nationality the aircraft possesses. Such apparatus shall not be used except by members of the crew provided with a special license for the purpose.

Every aircraft used in public transport and capable of carrying 10 or more persons shall be equipped with sending and receiving wireless apparatus when the methods of employing such apparatus shall have been determined by the International Commission for Air Navigation.

This commission may later extend the obligation of carrying wireless apparatus to all other classes of aircraft in the conditions and according to the methods which it may determine.

CHAPTER IV.

ADMISSION TO AIR NAVIGATION ABOVE FOREIGN TERRITORY.

Article 15.

Every aircraft of a contracting State has the right to cross another State without landing. In this case it shall follow the route fixed by the State over which the flight takes place. However, for reasons of general security it will be obliged to land if ordered to do so by means of signals provided in Annex D.

Every aircraft which passes from one State into another shall, if the regulations of the latter State require it, land in one of the aerodromes fixed by the latter. Notification of these aerodromes shall be given by the contracting States to the international commission for air navigation and by it notified to all the contracting States.

The establishment of international airways shall be subject to the consent of the States flown over.

Article 16.

Each contracting State shall have the right to reserve to its national aircraft the carriage of persons and goods for hire between two points on its own territory.

Article 17.

If a contracting State establishes restrictions of the kind permitted by article 16, its aircraft may be subjected to the same restrictions in any other contracting State, even though the latter State does not itself impose these restrictions on other foreign aircraft.

Restrictions and reservations provided in article 16 shall be immediately published, and shall be communicated to the international commission for air navigation, which shall notify them to the States interested.

Article 18.

The passage or transit of any aircraft, with or without landing over or through the territory of any contracting State, including stoppages reasonably necessary for the purpose of such transit, shall not entail any seizure or detention of the aircraft by or on behalf of such State or any person therein, on the ground that the constitution or mechanism of the aircraft is an infringement of any patent, design, or model, duly granted or registered in such State. Every claim for an infringement of this kind shall be duly made in the country of origin of the aircraft.

CHAPTER V.

RULES TO BE OBSERVED ON DEPARTURE, ON LANDING, AND WHEN UNDER WAY.

Article 19.

Every aircraft engaged in international navigation shall be provided:

(a) With a certificate of registration in accordance with Annex A.

(b) With a certificate of airworthiness in accordance with Annex B.

(c) With certificates and licenses of the commanding officer, pilots, and crew in accordance with Annex E.

(d) If it carries passengers, with a list of their names.

(e) If it carries freight, with bills of lading and manifest.

(f) With log books in accordance with Annex C.

(g) If equipped with wireless, with the special license prescribed by article 14.

Article 20.

The log books shall be kept for two years after the last entry.

Article 21.

Upon the departure of an aircraft the authorities of the country shall have, in all cases, the right to visit the aircraft and to verify all the documents with which it must be provided.

Article 22.

Upon the landing of an aircraft the authorities of the country shall have, in all cases, the right to visit the aircraft and to verify all the documents with which it must be provided.

Article 23.

All persons on board an aircraft shall conform to the laws and regulations of the State visited.

In case of flight made without landing, from frontier to frontier, all persons on board shall conform to the laws and regulations of the country flown over, the purpose of which is to ensure that the passage is innocent.

Legal relations between persons on board an aircraft in flight are governed by the law of the nationality of the aircraft.

In case of crime or misdemeanor committed by one person against another on board an aircraft in flight the jurisdiction of the State flown over applies only in case the crime or misdemeanor is committed against a national of such State and is followed by a landing during the same journey upon its territory.

The State flown over has jurisdiction:

(1) With regard to every breach of its laws for the public safety and its military and fiscal laws.

(2) In case of a breach of its regulations concerning air navigation.

Article 24.

Aircraft of the contracting States shall be entitled to the same measures of assistance for landing, particularly in case of distress, as national aircraft.

With regard to the salvage of aircraft wrecked at sea the regulations of the several contracting States as to the salvage of ships will apply so far as practicable.

Article 25.

Every aerodrome in a contracting State, which upon payment of charges is open to public use by its national aircraft, shall likewise be open to the aircraft of all the other contracting States.

In every such aerodrome there shall be a single tariff of charges for landing and length of stay applicable alike to national and foreign aircraft.

Article 26.

Each contracting State undertakes to adopt measures to ensure that every aircraft flying above the limits of its territory, and that every aircraft under its flag, wherever it may be, shall comply with the regulations contained in Annex D of the present convention. It will punish all persons who do not obey these regulations.

CHAPTER VI.

PROHIBITED TRANSPORT.

Article 27.

The carriage by aircraft of explosives and arms and munitions of war is forbidden in international navigation. No foreign aircraft shall be permitted to carry such articles between any two points in the same contracting State.

Article 28.

Each State may prohibit or regulate the carriage or use of photographic apparatus. Any such regulations shall be at once notified to the International Commission for Air Navigation, which shall communicate this information to all the other contracting States.

Article 29.

As a measure of public safety the carriage of objects other than those mentioned in articles 27 and 28 may be subjected to restrictions by each contracting State. Any such regulations shall be at once notified to the International Commission for Air Navigation, which shall communicate this information to all the other contracting States.

Article 30.

All restrictions mentioned in article 29 shall be applied equally to national and foreign aircraft.

CHAPTER VII.

STATE AIRCRAFT.

Article 31.

The following are deemed to be State aircraft:

(a) Military aircraft.

(b) Aircraft exclusively employed in State service, such as posts, customs, police.

Every other aircraft is a private aircraft. All State aircraft other than military, customs, and police aircraft shall be treated as private aircraft and as such shall be subject to all the provisions of the present convention.

Article 32.

Every aircraft commanded by a person in military service detailed for the purpose is deemed to be a military aircraft.

Article 33.

Neither the flight of a military aircraft of a contracting State over the territory of another nor its landing upon such territory shall be permitted without special authorization.

In case of such authorization the military aircraft shall enjoy in the absence of special stipulation the privileges of exterritoriality which are customarily accorded to foreign ships of war.

A military aircraft which is forced to land or which is required or compelled to land shall, by reason thereof, acquire no right to exterritoriality.

Article 34.

Agreements between State and State will determine in what cases police and customs aircraft can be authorized to cross the frontier. They shall in no case be entitled to the privileges of exterritoriality.

CHAPTER VIII.

INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION FOR AIR NAVIGATION.

Article 35.

There shall be instituted, under the name of the International Commission for Air Navigation and as part of the organization of the league of nations, a permanent commission composed of—

Two representatives of each of the following States: The United States of America, France, Italy, and Japan;

One representative of Great Britain and one of each of the British Dominions and of India;

One representative of each of the other contracting States.

Each of the five States first named (Great Britain, the British Dominions, and India counting for this purpose as one State) shall have the least whole number of votes which, when multiplied by five, will give a product exceeding by at least one vote the total number of votes of all the other contracting States.

All the States other than the five first named shall each have one vote.

The International Commission for Air Navigation shall determine the rules of its own procedure and the place of its permanent seat, but it shall be free to meet in such places as it may deem convenient. Its first meeting shall take place at Paris. This meeting shall be convened by the French Government as soon as a majority of the signatory States shall have notified to it their ratification of the present convention.

The duties of this commission are:

(a) To receive proposals from or to make proposals to any of the contracting States for the modification or amendment of the provisions of the present convention and to notify changes adopted.

(b) To carry out the duties imposed upon it by the present article and by articles 9, 13, 14, 15, 17, 28, 29, and 38 of the present convention.

(c) To amend the provisions of the technical annexes.

(d) To collect and communicate to the contracting States information of every kind concerning international air navigation.

(e) To collect and communicate to the contracting States all information relating to wireless, meteorology, and medical science which may be of interest to air navigation.

(f) To insure the publication of maps for air navigation in accordance with the provisions of Annex F.

(g) To give its opinion on questions which the States may submit for examination.

Any modification of the provisions of any one of the annexes may be made by the International Commission for Air Navigation when such modification shall have been approved by three-fourths of the total possible vote and shall become effective from the time when it shall have been notified by the International Commission for Air Navigation to all the contracting States.

Any proposed modification of the articles of the present convention shall be examined by the International Commission for Air Navigation, whether it originates with one of the contracting States or with the International Commission for Air Navigation itself. No such modification shall be proposed for option by the contracting States unless it shall have been approved by at least two-thirds of all the possible votes which could be cast if all the States were present.

All such modifications of the articles of the convention (not of the provisions of the annexes) must be formally adopted by the contracting States before they become effective.

The expenses of organization and operation of the International Commission for Air Navigation shall be borne by the contracting States in proportion to the number of votes at their disposal.

The expenses occasioned by the sending of technical delegations will be borne by their respective States.

CHAPTER IX.

FINAL PROVISIONS.

Article 36.

Each contracting State undertakes to cooperate as far as possible in international measures concerning—

(a) The collection and dissemination of statistical, current and special meteorological information in accordance with the provisions of Annex G.

(b) The publication of standard aeronautical maps and the establishment of a uniform system of ground marks for flying in accordance with the provisions of Annex F.

(c) The use of wireless in air navigation, the establishment of the necessary wireless stations, and the observation of international wireless regulations.

Article 37.

General provisions relative to customs in connection with international air navigation are the subject of a special agreement contained in Annex H to the present convention.

Nothing in the present convention shall be construed as preventing the contracting States from concluding, in conformity with its principles, special protocols as between State and State in respect of customs, police, posts, and other matters of common interest in connection with air navigation.

Article 38.

In the case of a disagreement of two or more States relating to the interpretation of the present convention, the question in dispute shall be determined by the permanent court of international justice to be established by the league of nations, and until its establishment by arbitration.

If the parties do not agree on the choice of the arbitrators they shall proceed as follows:

Each of the parties shall name an arbitrator, and the two arbitrators shall meet to name a third. If the arbitrators can not agree the parties shall each name a third State and the third State so named shall proceed to designate the third arbitrator by agreement or by each proposing a name and then determining by lot the choice between the two.

In case of the disagreement of two or more contracting States relating to one of the technical regulations annexed to the present convention, the point in dispute shall be determined by the decision of the international commission for air navigation by a majority of votes.

In case the difference involves the question whether the interpretation of the convention or that of a regulation is concerned, final decision shall be made by arbitration as provided in the first paragraph of this article.

Article 39.

In case of war the provisions of the present convention do not affect the freedom of action of the contracting States either as belligerents or as neutrals.

Article 40.

The provisions of the present convention are completed by the Annexes A–H, which have the same effect and come into force at the same time as the convention itself.

Article 41.

The British Dominions and India are deemed to be States for the purposes of the present convention.

Protectorates, or territories administered by the league of nations or placed under its control, are, for the purposes of the present convention, deemed to form part of the protecting or mandatory States, both as regards their territory and as regards their nationals.

Article 42.

The present convention shall come into force as between any of the contracting States as soon as such States shall have exchanged ratifications, which shall take place within one year.

The ratifications shall be deposited in the archives of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the French Republic.

Article 43.

The States which have not taken part in the present war shall be admitted to adhere to the present convention upon their simple declaration notified to the Ministry of Foreign Affairs of the French Republic, which shall inform the contracting States of such adherence.

Article 44.

Any State which took part in the present war but which did not take part in the negotiation of this convention may express its desire to adhere to this convention and may be admitted to adhere to it if such State is a member of the league of nations, or until January 1, 1923, by a unanimous vote of the signatory and adhering States, or after January 1, 1923, by an affirmative vote comprising at least three-fourths of the total possible votes of the signatory and adhering States, the votes of the different States having the same weight as that provided by article 35 of this convention for the international commission for air navigation.

The ministry of foreign affairs of the French Republic shall receive requests for adherence to this convention under the conditions provided by this article, shall communicate them to the contracting States, shall receive the votes of the contracting States, and shall announce the result of the vote.

Article 45.

The denunciation of the present convention shall take effect with regard only to the State which shall have given notice of it. Such notice shall not be given before January 1, 1922 (nineteen hundred and twenty-two), and the denunciation shall not take effect until at least one year after the giving of notice.

Notices under this article shall be given to the ministry of foreign affairs of the French Republic, who shall communicate them to the contracting States.

In faith whereof the delegates have appended their signatures to the present convention.

Done at Paris the day of , 1919, in the English and French languages, which shall be of equal validity and authority, in a single copy, which shall remain deposited in the archives of the French Government, and duly certified copies of which shall be sent, through the diplomatic channel, to the contracting States.

ANNEX A.

THE MARKING OF AIRCRAFT.

I.

GENERAL.

(a) The nationality mark will be represented by capital letters in Roman characters, e. g.:

France ..... F

The registration mark shall be represented by a group of four capital letters; each group shall contain at least one vowel, and for this purpose the letter Y shall be considered as a vowel. The complete group of five letters shall be used as a call sign of the particular aircraft in making or receiving signals by wireless telegraphy or other methods of communication, except when opening up communication by means of visual signals, when the usual methods will be employed. The nationality and registration marks are assigned in accordance with the table contained in Section VIII of this annex.

(b) On aircraft other than State and commercial the registration mark shall be underlined with a black line.

(c) The entry in the register and the certificate of registration shall contain a description of the aircraft and shall indicate the number or other identification mark given to it by the maker; the nationality and registration marks mentioned above; the usual station of the aircraft; the full name, nationality, and residence of the owner and the date of registration.

(d) All aircraft shall carry affixed to the car or to the fuselage in a prominent position a metal plate inscribed with the names and residence of the owner and the marks of nationality and registration.

CERTIFICATE OF REGISTRATION.

Nationality .....
Nationality mark .....
Registration marks .....
Date of registration .....
Type of aircraft .....
- Tourist .....
- Commercial .....
- State .....

Maker .....
Maker's number .....
Description .....
Owner's full name .....
Owner's residence .....
Owner's nationality .....
Station of the craft .....

.....
(Signature and seal of authority issuing this certificate.)

II.

LOCATION OF MARKS.

The nationality and registration marks shall be painted in black on a white ground in the following manner:

(a) Flying machines: The marks shall be painted once on the lower surface of the lower main planes and once on the upper surface of the top main planes, the top of the letters to be toward the leading edge. They shall also be painted along each side of the fuselage between the main planes and the tail planes. In cases where the machine is not provided with a fuselage the marks shall be painted on the nacelle.

(b) Airships and balloons: In the case of airships the marks shall be painted near the maximum cross section on both sides and on the upper surface equidistant from the letters on the sides.

In the case of balloons the marks shall be painted twice near the maximum horizontal circumference as far as possible from one another.

In the case both of airships and balloons the side marks shall be visible both from the sides and ground.

III.

ADDITIONAL LOCATION OF NATIONALITY MARKS.

(a) Flying machines and airships: The nationality mark shall also be painted on the left and right sides of the lower surface of the lowest tail planes or elevators and also on the upper surface of the top tail planes or elevators, whichever is the larger. It shall also be painted on both sides of the rudder or on the outer sides of the outer rudders if more than one rudder is fitted.

(b) Balloons: The nationality mark shall be painted on the basket.

IV.

MEASUREMENTS OF NATIONALITY AND REGISTRATION MARKS.

(a) Flying machines: The height of the marks on the main planes and tail planes, respectively, shall be equal to four-fifths of the chord and in the case of the rudder shall be as large as possible. The height of the marks on the fuselage or nacelle shall be four-fifths of the depth of the narrowest part of that portion of the fuselage or nacelle on which the marks are painted.

(b) Airships and balloons: In the case of airships the nationality marks painted on the tail plane shall be equal in height to four-fifths of the chord of the tail plane and in the case of the rudder the marks shall be as large as possible. The height of the other marks shall be equal to at least one-twelfth of the circumference at the maximum transverse cross section of the airship.

In the case of balloons the height of the nationality mark shall be four-fifths of the height of the basket, and the height of the other marks shall be equal to at least one-twelfth of the circumference of the balloon.

(c) General: In the case of all aircraft the letters of the nationality and registration marks need not exceed 2.5 meters in height.

V.

MEASUREMENT, TYPE OF LETTERS, ETC.

(a) The width of the letters shall be two-thirds of their height and the thickness shall be one-sixth of their height. The letters shall be painted in plain block type and shall be uniform in shape and size. A space equal to half the width of the letters shall be left between the letters.

(b) In the case of underlined letters the thickness of the line shall be equal to the thickness of the letter and the space between the bottom of the letters and the line shall be equal to the thickness of the line.

VI.

SPACING BETWEEN NATIONALITY AND REGISTRATION MARKS.

Where the nationality and registration marks appear together a hyphen of a length equal to the width of one of the letters shall be painted between the nationality mark and registration mark.

VII.

MAINTENANCE.

The nationality and registration marks shall be displayed to the best possible advantage, taking into consideration the constructional features of the aircraft. The marks must be kept clean and visible.

VIII.

TABLE OF MARKS.

The nationality mark of the State named below applies to the aircraft of its dominions, colonies, protectorates, dependencies, or of countries of which it is the mandatory State.

Country.	Nationality mark.	Registration marks.

ANNEX B.

CERTIFICATES OF AIRWORTHINESS.

The following main conditions govern the issue of certificates of airworthiness:

1. The design of the aircraft in regard to safety shall conform to certain standard minimum requirements.

2. A satisfactory demonstration must be made in flying trials of the actual flying qualities of the type of aircraft examined, provided that machines subsequently manufactured which conform to the approved type need not be subject to such trials. The trials shall conform to certain standard minimum requirements.

3. The construction of every aircraft with regard to workmanship and materials must be approved. The control of the construction and of the tests shall be in accordance with certain standard minimum requirements.

4. The aircraft must be equipped with suitable instruments for safe navigation.

5. The standard minimum requirements of paragraphs 1 to 3, inclusive, shall be fixed by the international commission for air navigation. Until they have been so fixed each contracting State shall determine the regulations under which certificates of airworthiness shall be granted or remain valid.

ANNEX C.

LOG BOOKS.

I.

JOURNEY LOG.

This shall be kept for all aircraft and shall contain the following particulars:

(a) Category to which the aircraft belongs; its nationality and registration marks; the full name, nationality, and residence of the owner; name of maker; and the carrying capacity of the aircraft.

(b) In addition for each journey—

(i) The names, nationality, and residence of each of the members of the crew.

(ii) The place, date, and hour of departure; the route followed; and all incidents en route, including landings.

II.

AIRCRAFT LOG.

This is obligatory only in the case of aircraft carrying passengers or goods for hire, and shall contain the following particulars:

(a) Category to which the aircraft belongs; its nationality and registration marks; the full name, nationality, and residence of the owner; name of maker; and the carrying capacity of the aircraft.

(b) Type and series number of engine; type of propeller, showing number, pitch, diameter, and maker's name.

(c) Type of wireless apparatus fitted.

(d) Table showing the necessary rigging data for the information of persons in charge of the aircraft and of its maintenance.

(e) A fully detailed engineering record of the life of the aircraft, including all acceptance tests, overhauls, replacements, repairs, and all works of a like nature.

III.

ENGINE LOG.

This is obligatory only in the case of engines installed in aircraft carrying passengers or goods for hire, and in such cases a separate log book shall be kept for each engine and shall always accompany the engine. It shall contain the following particulars:

(a) Type of engine, series number, maker's name, power, normal maximum revolutions of engine, date of production, and first date put into service.

(b) Registration mark and type of aircraft in which the engine has been installed.

(c) A fully detailed engineering record of the life of the engine, including all acceptance tests, hours run, overhauls, replacements, repairs, and all work of a like nature.

IV.

SIGNAL LOG.

This is obligatory only in the case of aircraft carrying passengers or goods for hire, and shall contain the following particulars:

(a) Category to which the aircraft belongs; its nationality and registration marks; the full name, nationality, and residence of the owner.

(b) Place, date, and time of the transmission or reception of any signal.

(c) Name or other indication of the person or station to whom a signal is sent or from whom a signal is received.

V.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR USE OF LOG BOOKS.

(a) The constructor should fill in and sign the original entries in the log books, as far as he is in a position to do so. Subsequent entries should be made and signed by the pilot or other competent person.

(b) A copy of the certificate of airworthiness should be kept in the pocket at the end of the aircraft log book.

(c) All entries to be in ink, except in the case of journey and signal log books; the entries for these may be made in pencil in a rough notebook, but should be entered in ink in the log book every 24 hours. In the event of any official investigation the rough notebook may be called for.

(d) No erasures should be made in, nor pages torn from, any log book.

(e) A copy of these instructions should be inserted in each log book.

ANNEX D.

RULES AS TO LIGHTS AND SIGNALS—RULES OF THE AIR.

DEFINITIONS.

The word "aircraft" comprises all balloons, whether fixed or free; kites, airships, and flying machines.

The word "balloon," either fixed or free, shall mean an aircraft using gas lighter than air as a means of support and having no means of propulsion.

The word "airship" shall mean an aircraft using gas lighter than air as a means of support, and having means of propulsion.

The words "flying machine" shall mean all aeroplanes, seaplanes, flying boats, or other aircraft heavier than air, and having means of propulsion.

An airship is deemed to be "under way" within the meaning of these rules when it is not made fast to the ground or any object on land or water.

I.

RULES AS TO LIGHTS.

The word "visible" in these rules when applied to lights shall mean visible on a dark night with a clear atmosphere. The angular limits laid down in these rules as shown in the sketch (attached) shall be determined when the aircraft is in its normal attitude for flying on a rectilinear horizontal course.

1. The rules concerning lights shall be complied with in all weathers from sunset to sunrise, and during such time no other lights which may be mistaken for the prescribed lights shall be exhibited. The prescribed navigation lights must not be dazzling.

2. A flying machine, when in the air or maneuvering on land or water under its own power, shall carry the following lights:

(a) Forward, a white light visible in a dihedral angle of 220 degrees bisected by a vertical plane through the line of flight, and of such a character as to be visible at a distance of 8 kilometers.

(b) On the right side a green light so constructed and fixed as to show an unbroken light between two vertical planes whose dihedral angle is 110 degrees when measured to the right from dead ahead, and of such a character as to be visible at a distance of 5 kilometers.

(c) On the left side, a red light so constructed and fixed as to show an unbroken light between two vertical planes whose dihedral angle is 110 degrees when measured to the left from dead ahead, and of such a character as to be visible at a distance of at least 5 kilometers.

(d) The said green and red side lights shall be fitted so that the green light shall not be seen from the left side nor the red light from the right side.

(e) At the rear, and as far aft as possible, a white light shining rearward and visible in a dihedral of 140 degrees bisected by a vertical plane through the line of flight and of such a character as to be visible at a distance of at least 5 kilometers.

(f) In the case where, in order to fulfill the above conditions, the single light has to be replaced by several lights, the field of visibility of each of these lights should be so limited that only one can be seen at a time.

3. The rules determined for the lighting of flying machines shall apply to airships subject to the following modifications:

(a) All lights shall be doubled; the forward and aft lights vertically, and the side lights horizontally in a fore and aft direction.

(b) Both lights of each pair forward and aft shall be visible at the same time.

The distance between the lights comprising a pair shall not be less than 2 meters.

4. An airship, when being towed, shall carry the lights specified in paragraph 3, and, in addition, those specified in paragraph 6 for airships not under control.

5. (a) A flying machine, or airship, when on the surface of the water, and when not under control, that is to say, not able to maneuver as required by the Regulations for the Prevention of Collisions at Sea, shall carry two red lights not less than 2 meters apart one over the other, and of such a character as to be visible all around the horizon at a distance of at least 3 kilometers.

(b) The aircraft referred to in this paragraph, when not making way through the water, shall not carry the side lights, but when making way shall carry them.

6. An airship which from any cause is not under control, or which has voluntarily stopped her engines shall, in addition to the other specified lights, display conspicuously two red lights, one over the other, not less than 2 meters apart, and constructed to show a light in all directions, and of such a character as to be visible at a distance of at least 3 kilometers.

By day an airship, when being towed, which from any cause is not under control, shall display conspicuously two black balls or shapes, each 60 centimeters in diameter, placed one over the other not less than 2 meters apart.

An airship moored, or under way but having voluntarily stopped its engines, shall display conspicuously by day a black ball or shape, 60 centimeters in diameter, and shall be treated by other aircraft as being not under control.

7. A free balloon shall carry one bright white light below the car at a distance of not less than 5 meters, and so constructed as to show an unbroken light in all directions, and of such a character as to be visible at a distance of at least 3 kilometers.

8. A fixed balloon shall carry in the same position as the white light mentioned in paragraph 7, and in lieu of that light, three lights in a vertical line one over the other, not less than 2 meters apart. The highest and lowest of these lights shall be red, and the middle light shall be white, and they shall be of such a character as to be visible in all directions at a distance of at least 3 kilometers.

In addition, the mooring cable shall have attached to it at intervals of 300 meters, measured from the basket, groups of three lights similar to those mentioned in the preceding paragraph. In addition, the object to which the balloon is moored on the ground shall have a similar group of lights to mark its position.

By day the mooring cable shall carry in the same position as the groups of lights mentioned in the preceding paragraph, and in lieu thereof, tubular steamers not less than 20 centimeters in diameter and 2 meters long, and marked with alternate bands of white and red, 50 centimeters in width.

9. An airship when moored near the ground shall carry the lights specified in paragraphs 2 (a) and (e) and 3.

In addition, if moored but not near the ground, the airship, the mooring cable, and the object to which moored, shall be marked in accordance with the provisions of paragraph 8, whether by day or by night.

Sea anchors or drogues used by airships for mooring purposes at sea are exempt from this regulation.

10. A flying machine stationary upon the land or water but not anchored or moored shall carry the lights specified in paragraph 2.

11. In order to prevent collisions with surface craft:

(a) A flying machine when at anchor or moored on the water shall carry forward, where it can best be seen, a white light, so constructed as to show an unbroken light visible all round the horizon at a distance of at least 2 kilometers.

(b) A flying machine of 50 meters or upwards in length, when at anchor or moored on the water, shall, in the forward part of the flying machine, carry one such light, and at or near the stern of the flying machine, and at a height that it shall not be less than 5 meters lower than the forward light, another such light.

The length of a flying machine shall be deemed to be the overall length.

(c) Flying machines of 50 meters or upwards in span, when at anchor or moored in the water, shall in addition carry at each lower wing tip one light as specified in (a) of this paragraph.

The span of a flying machine shall be deemed to be the maximum lateral dimension.

12. In the event of the failure of any of the lights specified under these rules to be carried by aircraft flying at night, such aircraft shall land at the first reasonably safe opportunity.

13. Nothing in these rules shall interfere with the operation of any special rules made by the government of any State with respect to the additional station or signal lights for two or more military aircraft, or for aircraft in formation, or with the exhibition of recognition signals adopted by owners of aircraft which have been authorized by their respective Governments and duly registered and published.

II.

RULES AS TO SIGNALS.

14. (a) Aircraft wishing to land at night on aerodromes having a ground control shall before landing:

Fire a green Very's light or flash a green lamp, and in addition shall make by international Morse code the letter group forming its call-sign.

(b) Permission to land will be given by the repetition of the same call-sign from the ground, followed by:

A green Very's light or flashing a green lamp.

15. The firing of a red Very's light or the display of a red flare from the ground shall be taken as an instruction that aircraft are not to land.

16. An aircraft compelled to land at night shall, before landing, fire a red Very's light or make a series of short flashes with the navigation lights.

17. When an aircraft is in distress and requires assistance, the following shall be the signals to be used or displayed, either together or separately:

(a) The international signal, S O S, by means of visual or wireless signals.

(b) The international code flag signal of distress, indicated by NC.

(c) The distant signal, consisting of a square flag having either above or below it a ball, or anything resembling a ball.

(d) A continuous sounding with any sound apparatus.

(e) A signal, consisting of a succession of white Very's lights fired at short intervals.

18. To warn an aircraft that it is in the vicinity of a prohibited zone and should change its course, the following signals shall be used:

(a) By day: Three discharges, at intervals of 10 seconds, of a projectile showing, on bursting, white smoke, the location of the burst indicating the direction the aircraft should follow.

(b) By night: Three discharges, at intervals of 10 seconds, of a projectile showing, on bursting, white stars, the location of the burst indicating the direction the aircraft should follow.

19. To require an aircraft to land, the following signals shall be used:

(a) By day: Three discharges, at intervals of 10 seconds, of a projectile showing on bursting black or yellow smoke.

(b) By night: Three discharges, at intervals of 10 seconds, of a projectile showing on bursting red stars or lights.

In addition, when necessary to prevent the landing of aircraft other than the one ordered, a searchlight which shall be flashed intermittently shall be directed toward the aircraft whose landing is required.

20. (a) In the event of fog or mist rendering aerodromes invisible, their presence may be indicated by a balloon acting as an aerial buoy and/or other approved means.

(b) In fog, mist, falling snow, or heavy rainstorm, whether by day or night, an aircraft on the water shall make the following sound signals with a sound apparatus:

(1) If not anchored or moored, a sound at intervals of not more than two minutes, consisting of two blasts of about five seconds' duration with an interval of about one second between them.

(2) If at anchor or moored, the rapid ringing of an efficient bell or gong for about five seconds at intervals of not more than one minute.

III.

RULES OF THE AIR.

21. Flying machines shall always give way to balloons, fixed or free, and to airships. Airships shall always give way to balloons, whether fixed or free.

22. An airship, when not under its own control, shall be classed as a free balloon.

23. Risk of collision can, when circumstances permit, be ascertained by carefully watching the compass bearing and angle of elevation of an approaching aircraft. If neither the bearing nor the angle of elevation appreciably change, such risk shall be deemed to exist.

24. The term "risk of collision" shall include risk of injury due to undue proximity of other aircraft. Every aircraft that is required by these rules to give way to another to avoid collision shall keep a safe distance, having regard to the circumstances of the case.

25. While observing the rules regarding risk of collision contained in paragraph 24, a motor-driven aircraft must always maneuver according to the rules contained in the following paragraphs as soon as it is apparent that, if it pursued its course, it would pass at a distance of less than 200 meters from any part of another aircraft.

26. When two motor-driven aircraft are meeting end-on, or nearly end-on, each shall alter its course to the right.

27. When two motor-driven aircraft are on courses which cross, the aircraft which has the other on its own right side shall keep out of the way of the other.

28. An aircraft overtaking any other shall keep out of the way of the overtaken aircraft by altering its own course to the right, and must not pass by diving.

Every aircraft coming up with another aircraft from any direction more than 110 degrees from ahead of the latter, i. e., in such a position with reference to the aircraft which it is overtaking that at night it would be unable to see either of that aircraft's side lights, shall be deemed to be an overtaking aircraft, and no subsequent alteration of the bearing between the two aircraft shall make the overtaking aircraft a crossing aircraft within the meaning of these rules, or relieve it of the duty of keeping clear of the overtaken aircraft until it is finally past and clear.

As by day the overtaking aircraft can not always know with certainty whether it is forward or abaft the direction mentioned above from the other aircraft, it should, if in doubt, assume that it is an overtaking aircraft and keep out of the way.

29. Where by any of these rules one of the two aircraft is to keep out of the way the other shall keep its course and speed. When in consequence of thick weather or other causes the aircraft having the right of way finds itself so close that collision can not be avoided by the action of the giving-way aircraft alone, it shall take such action as will best aid to avert collision.

30. Every aircraft which is directed by these rules to keep out of the way of another aircraft shall, if the circumstances of the case admit, avoid crossing ahead of the other.

31. In following an officially recognized air route every aircraft, when it is safe and practicable, shall keep to the right side of such route.

32. All aircraft on land or sea about to ascend shall not attempt to "take off" until there is no risk of collision with alighting aircraft.

33. Every aircraft in a cloud, fog, mist, or other conditions of bad visibility shall proceed with caution, having careful regard to the existing circumstances and conditions.

34. In obeying and construing these rules due regard shall be had to all dangers of navigation and collision and to any special circumstances which may render a departure from the above rules necessary in order to avoid immediate danger.

IV.

BALLAST.

35. The dropping of ballast other than fine sand or water from aircraft in the air is prohibited.

V.

RULES FOR AIR TRAFFIC ON AND IN THE VICINITY OF AERODROMES.

36. At every aerodrome there shall be a flag hoisted in a prominent position which shall indicate that if an aircraft about to land or leave finds it necessary to make a circuit or partial circuit such circuit shall be left-handed (anticlockwise) or right-handed (clockwise), according to the color of the flag. A white flag shall indicate a right-handed circuit, i. e., that the flag is kept to the right side, or side which carries the green light of the aircraft, and a red flag shall indicate a left-handed circuit—i. e., that the red flag is kept to the left side, or side which carries the red light of the aircraft.

37. When an aeroplane starts from an aerodrome it shall not turn until 500 meters distance from the nearest point of the aerodrome, and the turning then must conform with the regulations provided in the preceding paragraph.

38. All aeroplanes flying between 500 and 1,000 meters distance from the nearest point of an aerodrome shall conform to the above-mentioned circuit law, unless such aeroplanes are flying at a greater height than 2,000 meters.

39. Acrobatic landings are prohibited at aerodromes of contracting States used for international aerial traffic. Aircraft are prohibited from engaging in aerial acrobatics within a distance of at least 2,000 meters from the nearest point of such aerodromes.

40. At every recognized aerodrome the direction of the wind shall be clearly indicated by one or more of the recognized methods—e. g., landing tee, conical streamer, smudge fire, etc.

41. Every aeroplane when taking off or alighting on a recognized aerodrome used for international air traffic shall do so upwind, except when the natural conditions of the aerodrome do not permit.

42. In the case of aeroplanes approaching aerodromes for the purpose of landing the aeroplanes flying at the greater height shall be responsible for avoiding the aeroplane at the lower height and shall, as regards landing, observe the rules of paragraph 28 for passing.

43. Aeroplanes showing signals of distress shall be given free way in attempting to make a landing on an aerodrome.

44. Every aerodrome shall be considered to consist of three zones when looking upwind. The right-hand zone shall be the taking-off zone, and the left-hand shall be the landing zone. Between these there shall be a neutral zone. An aeroplane when landing should attempt to land as near as possible to the neutral zone, but in any case on the left of any aeroplanes which have already landed. After slowing up or coming to a stop at the end of its landing run, an aeroplane will immediately taxi into the neutral zone. Similarly, an aeroplane when taking off shall keep as far as possible toward the right of the taking-off zone, but shall keep clear to the left of any aeroplanes which are taking off or about to take off.

45. No aeroplane shall commence to take off until the preceding aeroplane is clear of the aerodrome.

46. The above rules shall apply equally to night landings on aerodromes, when the signals shall be as follows:

(a) A red light shall indicate a left-hand circuit, and a green light shall indicate a right-hand circuit (see paragraph 36). The right-hand zone will be marked by white lights placed in the position of an "L," and the left-hand zone will be similarly marked. The "Ls" shall be back to back; that is to say, the long sides of the "Ls" will indicate the borders of the neutral zone, the direction of landing shall invariably be along the long arm of the "L," and toward the short arm. The lights of the "Ls" should be so placed that the lights indicating the top extremity of the long arm shall be the nearest point on the aerodrome upon which an aeroplane can safely touch ground. The lights indicating the short arm of the "L" should indicate the limit of safe landing ground for the aeroplanes; that is, that the aeroplane should not overrun the short arm (see diagram A).

(b) Where it is desired to save lights and personnel the following system may be used:

Two lights shall be placed on the windward side of the aerodrome to mark the limits of the neutral zone mentioned in paragraph 44, the line joining the lights being at right angles to the direction of the wind. Two more lights shall be placed as follows: One on the leeward side of the aerodrome on the line drawn parallel to the direction of the wind and passing midway between the two lights on the windward side, to show the extent of the aerodrome and the direction of the wind, and the other shall be placed midway between the two lights marking the limits of the neutral zone (see diagram B).

Additional lights may be symmetrically put along the boundary lines of the neutral zone, and on the ends of the taking-off and landing zones on the line through the three lights on the windward side.

47. No fixed balloon, kite, or moored airship shall be elevated in the vicinity of any aerodrome without a special authorization, except in the cases provided for in paragraph 20.

48. Suitable markings shall be placed on all fixed obstacles dangerous to flying within a zone of 500 meters of all aerodromes.

VI.

GENERAL.

49. Every aircraft maneuvering under its own power on the water shall conform to the regulations for preventing collisions at sea, and for the purposes of these regulations shall be deemed to be a steam vessel, but shall carry the lights specified in the preceding rules, and not those specified for steam vessels in the regulations for preventing collisions at sea, and shall not use, except as specified in paragraphs 17 and 20 above, or be deemed to hear the sound signals specified in the above-mentioned regulations.

50. Nothing in these rules shall exonerate any aircraft, or the owner, pilot, or crew thereof, from the consequences of any neglect to carry lights or signals, or of any neglect to keep a proper lookout, or of the neglect of any precaution which may be required by the ordinary practice of the air, or by the special circumstances of the case.

51. Nothing in these rules shall interfere with the operation of any special rule or rules duly made and published relative to navigation of aircraft in the immediate vicinity of any aerodrome or other place, and it shall be obligatory on all owners, pilots, or crews of aircraft to obey such rules.

ANNEX E.

MINIMUM QUALIFICATIONS NECESSARY FOR OBTAINING CERTIFICATES BY PILOTS AND NAVIGATORS.

I.

CERTIFICATES FOR PILOTS OF FLYING MACHINES.

(A) Private pilot's flying certificate (not valid for purposes of public transport).

1. Practical tests:

In each practical test the candidate must be alone in the flying machine.

(a) Test for altitude and gliding flight: A flight without landing, during which the pilot shall remain for at least an hour at a minimum altitude of 2,000 meters above the point of departure. The descent shall finish with a glide, the engines cut off at 1,500 meters above the landing ground. The landing shall be made without restarting the engine and within 150 meters or less of a point fixed beforehand by the official examiners of the test.

(b) Tests of skill: A flight without landing around two posts (or buoys) situated 500 meters apart, making a series of five figure-of-eight turns, each turn reaching one of the two posts (or buoys). This flight shall be made at an altitude of not more than 200 meters above the ground (or water) without touching the ground (or water). The landing shall be effected by:

(i) Finally shutting off the engine or engines at latest when the aircraft touches the ground (or water).

(ii) Finally stopping the flying machine within a distance of 50 meters from a point fixed by the candidate before starting.

2. Special requirements:

Knowledge of rules as to lights and signals and rules of the air. Rules for air traffic on and in the vicinity of aerodromes. A practical knowledge of international air legislation.

(B) Pilot's flying certificate for flying machines used for purposes of public transport.

1. Practical tests:

In each practical test the candidate must be alone in the flying machine.

(a) The tests for altitude and gliding flight and for skill are the same as those required for a private pilot's flying certificate. Candidates already in possession of the latter certificate are not required to pass these tests again.

(b) Test of endurance consisting of a cross-country or oversea flight of at least 300 kilometers, after which the final landing shall be made at the point of departure. This flight shall be made in the same flying machine within eight hours. It shall include two obligatory landings (during which the machine must come to rest), which shall not be at the point of departure, but which shall be fixed by the judges.

At the time of departure the candidate shall be informed of his course and furnished with the appropriate map. The judges will decide whether the course has been correctly followed.

(c) Night flight: A thirty minutes' flight, made between two hours after sunset and two hours before sunrise, at a height of at least 500 meters.

2. Technical examination:

After satisfactory practical tests have been passed, candidates will, when summoned, submit themselves to examination on—

(a) Flying machines:

Theoretical knowledge of the resistance of the air as concerns its effect on wings and tail planes, rudders, elevators, and propellers; functions of the different parts of the machine and of their controls.

Assembling of flying machines and their different parts.

Practical tests on rigging.

(b) Engines:

General knowledge of internal combustion engines, including functions of the various parts; a general knowledge of the construction, assembling, adjustment, and characteristics of aero-engines.

Causes of the faulty running of engines and of breakdown.

Practical tests in running repairs.

(c) Special requirements:

Knowledge of Rules as to Lights and Signals and Rules of the Air, and Rules for Air Traffic on and in the vicinity of Aerodromes.

Practical knowledge of the special conditions of air traffic and of international air legislation.

Map reading, orientation, location of position, elementary meteorology.

REMARKS.

The practical tests shall be carried out within a maximum period of one month.

They may be carried out in any order, and each may be attempted twice. They shall be witnessed by properly accredited examiners, who will forward the official reports to the proper authorities.

The official reports will give the different incidents, especially those of landings. The candidates shall furnish before each test proper identity forms.

A barograph shall be carried on all practical tests, and the graph, signed by the examiners, shall be attached to their report.

Pilots who hold the military pilot's certificate shall be entitled to the private pilot's flying certificate, but in order to obtain the pilot's flying certificate for purposes of public transport it will be necessary to pass the technical conditions for navigation as required by B (2) (c).

II.

CERTIFICATES FOR PILOTS OF BALLOONS.

1. Practical tests:

The candidate must have completed the following certified ascents—

1. By day: 3 ascents under instruction.
1 ascent in control under supervision.
1 ascent alone in the balloon.
2. By night: 1 ascent alone in the balloon.

Each ascent shall be of at least two hours' duration.

2. Theoretical tests:

Elementary aerostatics and meteorology.

3. Special requirements:

General knowledge of a balloon and its accessories; inflation; rigging; management of an ascent; instruments; precautions against cold and high altitudes.

Knowledge of rules as to lights and signals and rules of the air; rules for air traffic on and in the vicinity of aerodromes.

Practical knowledge of international air legislation. Map reading and orientation.

III.

CERTIFICATES FOR AIRSHIP OFFICER PILOTS.

Every airship officer pilot shall have qualified as pilot of a free balloon.

There shall be three classes of airship officer pilots.

The holder of a first-class certificate is qualified to command any airship.

The holder of a second-class certificate is qualified to command airships under 20,000 cubic meters capacity.

The holder of a third-class certificate is qualified to command airships under 6,000 cubic meters capacity.

All military and naval airship officer pilots are entitled to a third-class certificate.

All military and naval airship officer pilots who have commanded airships over 6,000 cubic meters capacity are entitled to a first-class certificate.

QUALIFICATIONS FOR THIRD-CLASS CERTIFICATE.

Practical tests:

(a) Twenty certified flights (three of which shall be by night) in an airship, each flight being of at least one hour's duration. In at least four of these flights the candidate must have handled the airship himself, under the supervision of the commanding officer of the airship, including ascent and landing.

(b) One cross-country flight on a predetermined course of at least 100 kilometers, terminating with a night landing, and made with a duly authorized inspector on board.

Theoretical examination:

Aerostatics and meteorology. (Density of gases, laws of Mariotte and of Gay-Lussac; barometric pressure, Archimedes principle; confinement of gases; interpretation and use of meteorological information and of weather charts.)

Physical and chemical properties of light gases and of materials used in the construction of airships.

General theory of airships.

Dynamic properties of moving bodies in air.

General knowledge:

Elementary knowledge of internal combustion engines.

Elementary navigation; use of the compass; location of position.

Inflation; stowage; rigging; handling; controls and instruments.

QUALIFICATIONS FOR SECOND-CLASS CERTIFICATE.

Practical tests:

To be eligible for a second-class certificate a candidate must be holder of a third-class certificate and have at least four months' service as a third-class officer on an airship, and also have completed at least 10 flights as third-class officer on an airship of capacity above 6,000 cubic meters, in which he has handled the airship himself, including ascent and landing, under the supervision of the commanding officer of the airship.

Theoretical examination:

Advanced knowledge of the subjects required for the third-class certificate.

QUALIFICATIONS FOR FIRST-CLASS CERTIFICATE.

Practical tests:

To be eligible for a first-class certificate a candidate must be holder of a second-class certificate, have at least two months' active service as a second-class officer on an airship, and also have completed at least five flights as second-class officer of an airship of capacity above 20,000 cubic meters, in which he has handled the airship himself, including ascent and landing, under the supervision of the commanding officer of the airship. Each flight must be at least of one hour's duration with a minimum of 15 hours for the five flights.

Theoretical examination:

As required for a second-class certificate.

IV.

CERTIFICATE FOR NAVIGATORS.

Aircraft used for public transport carrying more than 10 passengers and having to make a continuous flight between two points more than 500 kilometers apart overland, or a night flight, or a flight between two points more than 200 kilometers apart oversea, must have on board a navigator who has been granted a certificate as such after passing a theoretical and practical examination in the following:

1. Practical astronomy—

True and apparent movements of the celestial bodies. Different aspects of the celestial sphere.

Hour angles, mean, true, and astronomical time.

Shape and dimensions of the earth.

Star globes and maps.

Method of determining latitude, longitude, time, and azimuth.

2. Navigation—

Maps and charts—how to read them.

Compass, magnetic meridian, variation, deviation.

Courses, bearings, and their corrections.

Compensation of compasses (technical and practical).

Calculations of azimuth.

Flight by dead reckoning, measure of the relative speed, drift, traverse table.

Chronometer, chronometer rate, comparisons.

Sextants, adjustments.

Nautical almanac.

Determination of positions by means of bearing and altitude of stars.

Knowledge of great-circle navigation.

Aeronautical navigational instruments.

3. General knowledge—

International rules for air and maritime navigation.

International air legislation.

Practical knowledge of meteorology and of weather charts.

V.

MEDICAL CERTIFICATES.

International medical requirements for air navigation.

1. Every candidate before obtaining a license as a pilot, navigator, or engineer of aircraft engaged in public transport will present himself for examination by specially qualified medical men (flight surgeons), appointed by or acting under the authority of the contracting State.

2. Medical supervision, both for the selection and the maintenance of efficiency, shall be based upon the following requirements of mental and physical fitness:

(a) Good family and personal history, with particular reference to nervous stability. Absence of any mental, moral, or physical defect which will interfere with flying efficiency.

(b) The minimum age for pilots and navigators engaged in public transport shall be 19 years.

(c) General surgical examination: The aeronaut must neither suffer from any wound, injury, or operation, nor possess any abnormality, congenital or otherwise, which will interfere with the efficient and safe handling of aircraft.

(d) General medical examination: The aeronaut must not suffer from any disease or disability which renders him liable suddenly to become incompetent in the management of aircraft. He must possess heart, lungs, kidneys, and nervous system capable of withstanding the effects of altitude and also the effects of prolonged flight.

(e) Eye examination: The aeronaut must possess a degree of visual acuity compatible with the efficient performance of his duties. No pilot or navigator shall have more than two dioptres of latent hypermetropia; muscle balance must be good and commensurate with the refraction. He must have a good field of vision in each eye and must possess normal color perception.

(f) Ear examination: The middle ear must be healthy. The aeronaut must possess a degree of auditory acuity compatible with the efficient performance of his duties.

(g) The vestibular mechanism must be intact and neither unduly hypersensitive or hyposensitive.

(h) Nose and throat examination: The aeronaut must possess free nasal air entry on either side and not suffer from serious acute or chonic affections of the upper respiratory tract.

3. Each contracting State shall for the present fix its own methods of examination until the detail of tests and the minimal standard of requirements have been finally settled by the authorized medical representatives of the International Commission for Air Navigation.

4. The successful candidate will receive a medical certificate of acceptance, which must be produced before the license can be issued.

5. In order to insure the maintenance of efficiency, every aeronaut shall be reexamined periodically, at least every six months, and the findings shall be attached to his original record. In case of illness or accident, also, an aeronaut shall be reexamined and pronounced fit before resuming air duties. The date and result of each reexamination shall be recorded on the aeronaut's flying certificate.

6. No aeronaut who, before the date of the present convention, has given proof of his flying ability, shall, so long as he retains such ability, be necessarily disqualified because he fails to fulfill all of the above requirements.

7. Each contracting State may raise the conditions set forth above, as it deems fit, but these minimal requirements shall be maintained internationally.

ANNEX F.

INTERNATIONAL AERONAUTICAL MAPS AND GROUND MARKINGS.

International maps shall be made and ground marks established in accordance with the following general principles:

I.

MAPS.

1. Two types of aeronautical maps shall be used. They are hereafter mentioned as general maps and local maps.

2. The index scheme for the aeronautical maps, both general and local, shall be based on the index scheme, adopted for the "International 1:1,000,000 scale map" by the official international congress convened for the purpose in London in 1909 and in Paris in 1913.

NOTE.—Extract from the resolutions adopted by the conferences at London and Paris.

The sheets of the International 1:1,000,000 scale map shall include 6 degrees of longitude and 4 degrees of latitude. The limiting meridians of the sheets shall be at successive intervals, reckoning from Greenwich, of 6 degrees, and the limiting parallels, reckoning from the Equator, shall be at successive intervals of 4 degrees.

The longitudinal sectors, from longitude 180° east or west of Greenwich, are given numbers from 1 to 60, increasing in an easterly direction.

The 22 zones of 4 degrees in depth, extending from the Equator on each side to 88° latitude, are given letters from A to V.

The polar areas, extending for 2 degrees, are lettered Z.

In the northern hemisphere each sheet shall bear a descriptive symbol composed of the letter N, followed by the zone letter and sector number corresponding to its position, thus N.K.—12.

In the southern hemisphere the letter S shall replace the letter N. Example, S.L.—28.

3. The meter shall be used as the standard of measurement for lengths, distances, heights, depths, reserving for each nation the right to add figures expressing these quantities in its own units.

4. The colors, symbols, and arrangements for production adopted for the International 1:1,000,000 scale map shall be used as far as practicable on the aeronautical maps.

5. The general maps shall be drawn on Mercator's projection and shall be to a scale of 1 degree of longitude equals 3 centimeters. The general maps shall have marked on them in fine lines the meridians and parallels of each degree, and the meridians and parallels limiting the unit sections of the 1:1,000,000 map shall be accentuated. The same designation of unit sections shall be used as for the 1:1,000,000 map.

6. Each general (Mercator) map shall bear the French heading "Carte Générale Aéronautique Internationale (see the conventional sign plate, fig. 1), and under it a translation of this heading in the language of the country publishing the map. It shall also bear an appropriate geographical name.

Each sheet shall show at least the following: Principal physical features and geographical names, wireless stations, marine lighthouses (height and range at sea level, color, and character of the light); national frontiers, prohibited areas, principal air routes, lines of equal magnetic variation, South Polar distance, latitude, old and new notation of longitude (see par. 7), with an outer margin containing letters and numbers referring to the index of the 1:1,000,000 map, legend of symbols in English or French and in the language of the country publishing the maps, publisher's name, and date of publication and of successive editions.

7. The local maps shall be drawn to a scale of 1:200,000.

NOTE.—For local aeronautical maps of sparsely inhabited countries, the scale of 1:500,000 or 1:1,000,000, as appropriate, may be used.

In addition to the customary latitude and longitude notations, the local aeronautical maps shall bear numbers inclosed in rectangles, corresponding to a new system of coordinate reckoning based on the antimeridian of Greenwich and the South Pole. The new grid reckoning, with regard to latitude, shall commence with the South Pole as zero and increase northward by degrees and minutes to 180° at the North Pole, and with regard to longitude shall commence with the antimeridian of Greenwich as zero and run eastward by degrees and minutes to 360°.

8. Each unit sheet of the local aeronautical maps shall bear the French heading Carte Normale Aéronautique Internationale (see the conventional sign plate, fig. 2), and under it a translation of this heading in the language of the country publishing the map. It shall comprise one degree of latitude and one degree of longitude, and shall be designated by a locality name and by the new coordinates described in paragraph 7 of the southwest corner of the sheet, the unit digits being accentuated. In these designating coordinates, the figures referring to the South Polar distance shall invariably be written first.

EXAMPLES.—The sheet whose southern boundary is 49° N. (i. e., 139° South Polar distance) and western boundary 2° E. (i. e., 182° from the antimeridian of Greenwich) will be numbered 139–182.

Or the sheet whose southern boundary is 36° S. (i. e., 54° South Polar distance) and western boundary 7° W. (i. e., 173° from the antimeridian of Greenwich) will be numbered 54–173.

9. The local aeronautical unit sheets shall show, as far as the data is known, the following:

(a) Within the limiting meridians and parallels: Twenty-minute projection grid; roads divided into two classes according to their relative visibility from the air; railways of all kinds, cities and towns in outline and the plan of the principal public roads crossing them (villages similarly if practicable, otherwise their positions indicated); principal features of the surface water system; woodlands and other areas unsuitable for landing, aerodromes, hangars for airships, plants for balloon inflation, permanent landing places on ground and water, aeronautical ground marks (beacons and fixed navigational lights), marine lighthouses (height, range at sea level, color, and character of the light); wireless stations, meteorological stations, overhead electric-power lines, remarkable objects, national frontiers, prohibited areas, principal air routes, names of important bodies of water, towns, and important villages; the topographical relief by shading and figures indicating heights, the most important of which to be surrounded by an oval ring as (712)

(b) Outside the limiting meridians and parallels: A title, consisting of the name designating the locality and the index numbers of the sheet; a border scale graduated to minutes; the names of the neighboring sheets; latitude, South Polar distance, old and new notation of longitude (see par. 7); scale of kilometers; legend of symbols in English or French and in the language of the country publishing the map; magnetic variation diagram; key map showing abridged numbers of the sheet concerned and the eight surrounding sheets; frontiers and the names of the countries, parts of which are embraced by the key map; publisher's name and date of publication.

10. The forms of the general and local maps, titles, marginal notations, diagrams, and legends shall be as shown by the accompanying illustrations.

11. The general and local aeronautical maps and guide books of the areas traversed by the most important routes which may be established by international agreement shall be prepared first.

NOTE.—On account of the inadequacy of the usual methods of topographic mapping for making aeronautical maps, it is strongly recommended that steps be taken to survey from the air the areas along the most important international routes. Such surveys would furnish indispensable information regarding the features necessary to be shown on the maps the aviator is to use.

II.

UNIVERSAL SYSTEM OF GROUND MARKS.

1. All ground marks shall conform with the scheme of numbering adopted for the unit sheets of the local international aeronautical maps.

For this purpose each mark shall show (see the diagrams):

(a) The abridged number which designates the sheet within which it lies.

(b) An open rectangle, whose short sides shall be oriented north-south; the frames shall be open toward the opposite half of the unit sheet.

(c) A dot indicating the approximate position of the mark on the north or south half of the corresponding unit sheet.

The numbers shall be placed close to the frame at the top, bottom, or sides, but not inside.

Where marks are placed so close to each other as to admit of possible confusion, the round dot may be replaced by a square, triangular, or star-shaped dot.

It is recommended that the minimum dimensions of the marks be those indicated in the sketches.

2. Special attention shall be given to the distribution of marks along chosen international routes.

NOTE.—Steps to establish suitable marks for landing at night shall be eventually taken, in accordance with the decision of the international commission for air navigation.

ANNEX G.

COLLECTION AND DISSEMINATION OF METEOROLOGICAL INFORMATION.

1. Nature and object of meteorological information to be furnished by contracting States:

(A) "Statistical" is required for the purpose of indicating the degree of safety and convenience of different routes or aerodromes for different types of aircraft.

It consists of—

(a) Analysis and summaries of past meteorological records.

(b) Summaries of current observations.

(B) "Current" is required for the purpose of—

(a) Keeping a current record of the weather.

(b) Making forecasts.

It consists of—

1. The results of daily observations.

2. Lists of active stations at which these observations are taken.

(C) "Forecasts" are for the purpose of telling all concerned when and where flying is possible and the best conditions for the same. They are statements of conditions anticipated:

(a) "Short period," during the next three or four hours.

(b) "Normal," during the next 20 to 30 hours.

(c) "Long period," during the next two or three days.

(d) "Route," for particular region or route during the next six hours.

2. Methods and times of furnishing the different types of information:

(A) "Statistical" is furnished by central meteorological offices for general information.

(a) Analysis and summaries of past records—by the publication of special handbooks giving averages, frequencies, and extremes of the principal meteorological elements, together with charts and diagrams; prominence to be given to meteorological conditions of areas known to have special meteorological peculiarities.

(b) Summaries of current observations—by the monthly publication of the information obtained each month.

(B) "Current" is furnished by meteorological offices to meteorological offices.

(a) Results of daily observations telegraphically by—

1. Regular reports at fixed hours (see Appendix I); and

2. By special reports at intermediate times when requested (see Appendix II).

(b) Lists of stations, whenever necessary, to keep other countries informed where observations are being taken, giving also local and topographical details affecting weather conditions at each station.

(c) "Forecasts" are furnished by meteorological offices for general information by publication in the public press, telegraphically to other countries, if required, or any other, the best, means to bring them to the notice of those requiring them (see Appendix III).

APPENDIX I.

REGULAR REPORTS.

These are of two kinds:

1. Individual station reports.

2. Collective station reports.

1. Individual station reports are the results of observations of individual stations, taken at 0100, 0700, 1300, and (1800 or) 1900 G. M. T. The reports are made as soon as the observation has been taken and are rendered to a central collecting station or office; where reports for only two of these hours are possible or sufficient, the hours should be separated by an interval of 12 hours. (It is recommended that the standard hours be changed to 0300, 0900, 1500, and 2100 G. M. T. by international agreement.)

Reports will give information on the following whenever possible:

1. Wind,
2. Pressure,
3. Temperature and humidity,
4. Fog and visibility,
5. Clouds,
6. Precipitation,
7. Thunderstorms, hurricanes, tornadoes, dust storms,
8. Other weather phenomena,
9. State of sea, and also on upper air currents and upper air temperature and humidity from stations where facilities are available for observation.

Reports will be made in the general form and in the codes given in Appendix IV.

2. Collective reports are a collection of the individual reports received by a central station or office and transmitted to other central offices. They are of three classes:

Class 1. The central office in this case is usually the main office of a country; it transmits its reports, within one and one-half hours of the time the observations are taken at the individual stations, to all main offices of other countries within a radius of 1,500 kilometers.

Class 2. These are reports made for the purpose of giving countries over 1,500 kilometers distant information essential to making their own forecasts. The central office is that of a selective State which possesses a high-power wireless station capable of world-wide ranges (minimum range, 3,000 kilometers). The report is made within three hours of the observations and is a collection of reports selected from the class 1 reports and abridged. (See Appendix IV.) It should include a forecast of conditions in the country of origin.

Class 3. These are local reports made by local centers to other local centers (any within 500 kilometers). The report is a collection of reports selected from the class 1 reports from stations in the vicinity and abridged. (See Appendix IV.) It is made within 30 minutes of the time of observation.

APPENDIX II.

SPECIAL REPORTS.

Special reports give the results of continuous observations at aerodromes having meteorological stations on recognized air routes. They are to be rendered within 30 minutes of a request from a central office on a specified aerodrome on the route. The maximum distance from which these reports will be required is 500 kilometers. The requests may take the form of a demand for hourly reports.

The reports are rendered by telephone or wireless and may be from one country to another in the case of an international air route. The reports when made by telegram will be in the form and code given in Appendix IV.

APPENDIX III.

FORECASTS.

Short-period forecasts covering three to four hours will give a statement of the anticipated conditions of cloud, weather, surface wind, and visibility, together with direction and speed of wind at heights of 1,000 and 2,000 meters, and an estimate of meteorological fitness for different types of aircraft.

Normal forecasts for 20 to 30 hours will give similar information, but in more general terms.

Long-period forecasts give a general statement of the prospects for the next two or three days.

Route forecasts are made twice daily by central offices from information received from individual stations and will give a statement of conditions anticipated in the different regions or routes of the country for about six hours ahead.

APPENDIX IV.

GENERAL FORM IN WHICH REPORTS ARE TO BE RENDERED AND CODES FOR THEIR TRANSMISSION.

Individual stations will be allotted station-call signs, i. e., an index group of letters or figures which will be used in all reports to indicate the station, and will also serve as the wireless-call sign. These should be internationally distinct.

The general form is given in meteorological symbols or letters. For purposes of transmission an appropriate figure value is given to each symbol or letter in accordance with the codes given below:

METEOROLOGICAL SYMBOLS OR LETTERS AND THEIR SIGNIFICATION.

Standard symbols.

BBB = barometer reduced to sea level and expressed in millibars and tenths, i. e., corrected for temperature gravity and index error. The initial 9 or 10 is omitted.

DD = direction of wind (true direction as distinguished from magnetic) at a height of 10–15 meters above the surface expressed on scale 1–72 (see Code XI).

F = force of wind on Beaufort scale (wind above force 9 to be specially noted at end of telegram).

ww = present weather (Code I).

TT = temperature in degrees A (0° A = − 273° C., 273° A = 0° C.), first figure omitted.

A = form of low cloud (Code III).

L = amount of low cloud (in tenths of sky covered, amount 10 telegraphed as 0).

B = form of medium or high cloud (Code III).

M = amount of medium or high cloud in tenths.

h = height of base of low cloud (Code IV (a)).

WW = past weather (Code II).

V = visibility (Code V).

H_1 = relative humidity (Code VI).

S = state of sea (Code VII).

β = characteristic of barometric tendency (Code IX).

pb = amount of barometric tendency in half millibars per 3 hours; 50 added for negative tendencies.

F_1 = fitness of weather conditions for flying machines (Code VIII (a)).

F_2 = fitness of weather conditions for airships (Code VIII (b)).

RR = rainfall: (i) in day, (ii) in night; in millimeters and tenths.

MM = maximum temperature in the day.

mm = maximum temperature in the night.

X = reserve figure.

SPECIAL SYMBOLS FOR UPPER AIR CURRENTS.

H = height (Code IV. (b)).

DD = direction on scale 1–72 (i. e., to nearest 5° (see Code XI.)).

VV = speed in kilometers per hour (for speed above 99 K/hr. use three figures).

SPECIAL SYMBOLS FOR UPPER AIR TEMPERATURE AND HUMIDITY.

p = height or pressure (Code IV. (c)).

HH = actual percentage of relative humidity.

SPECIAL SYMBOL FOR COLLECTIVE REPORTS. CLASS 2.

BB = barometer in whole millibars with the initial 9 or 10 omitted.

GENERAL FORMS OF MESSAGES IN METEOROLOGICAL SYMBOLS.

Regular Reports.

1. Individual station reports: Station call sign followed by the following groups:

BBBDD. FwwTT. ALBMh. wwVHS. βbbF_1F_2.
RRMMX (or RRmmX).

Additional two groups for reports from stations having facilities for observations of upper air currents, the first of these being:

A five-figure group, to indicate that upper air current information is contained in the group which follows and which has the general form HDDVV.

Additional two groups for reports from stations having facilities for observations of upper air temperature and humidity, the first of these being:

A five-figure group, to indicate that upper air temperature and humidity information is contained in the group which follows, and which has the general form ρTTHH.

(NOTE.—These indicative five-figure groups would be better, from a signaling point of view, as a special Morse signal.)

2. Collective station report, Class 1: The individual station reports are given in sequence in the same general form as above. Upper air conditions are given at the end for those stations for which available: Upper air currents being given only for the following heights, 500, 1,000, 2,000, 5,000 meters (see Code IV. (b)).

Example of general form of collective report (Class 1) giving information from four stations, A, B, C, D, of which stations B, C have given upper air currents, and stations B, D upper air temperatures and humidity.

Call sign for "A"—BBBDD—FwwTT—ALBMh—wwVHS—βbbF_1F_2.
Call sign for "B"—BBBDD—FwwTT—ALBMh—wwVHS—βbbF_1F_2.
Call sign for "C"—BBBDD—FwwTT—ALBMh—wwVHS—βbbF_1F_2.
Call sign for "D"—BBBDD—FwwTT—ALBMh—wwVHS—βbbF_1F_2.
Group or signal indicating that upper air current information follows.
Call sign for "B"—HDDVV.
Call sign for "C"—HDDVV.
Group indicating that upper air temperature and humidity information follows.
Call sign for "B"—ρTTHH.
Call sign for "D"—ρTTHH.

3. Collective station reports, class 2: The individual station reports are given in sequence in an abridged form, as follows:
Call sign for station—BBDDF—wwTTh—ALβbb.

Upper air currents are given at the end of the telegram for heights 2,000 and 5,000 metres for selected stations.

Example of general form of collective report (class 2) giving information from four stations A, B, C, D, of which stations "B," "C" are selected for upper air current conditions.

Call sign for "A"—BBDDF—wwTTh—ALβbb.
Call sign for "B"—BBDDF—wwTTh—ALβbb.
Call sign for "C"—BBDDF—wwTTh—ALβbb.
Call sign for "D"—BBDDF—wwTTh—ALβbb.
Group indicating that upper air current information follows:
Call sign for "B"—HDDVV.
Call sign for "C"—HDDVV.
Forecast of conditions in country of origin.

4. Collective station reports, class 3: The individual station reports are given in sequence in an abridged form, as follows:
Call sign of station—DDFF$_1$F$_2$—ALBMh—wwWWV.

NOTE 1.—The general form for transmission "of special reports" and of forecasts has not yet been formulated.

NOTE 2.—Observations from ships at sea and the transmission of such observations require special arrangements, which it has not yet been possible to formulate. Similarly for observation from aircraft and their transmission.

CODES.

Code I.—Present weather.—ww.

NOTE.—00 to 49 weather without precipitation; 50 to 70 and 77 to 97 with precipitation.

31 equals SSE.	67 equals NNW.
36 equals S.	72 equals N.

To express directions calculated in degrees in this scale, divide the number of degrees by 5 (or multiply by 2 and divide by 10): e. g., 17° equals 03; 53° equals 11; 257° equals 51; 313° equals 63.

ANNEX H.

CUSTOMS.

GENERAL PROVISIONS.

1.

Any aircraft going abroad shall depart only from aerodromes specially designated by the customs administration of each contracting State, and named "customs aerodromes."

Aircraft coming from abroad shall land only in such aerodromes.

2.

Every aircraft which passes from one State into another is obliged to cross the frontier between certain points fixed by the contracting States. These points are shown on the aeronautical maps.

3.

All necessary information concerning customs aerodromes within a State, including any alterations made to the list and any corresponding alterations necessary on the aeronautical maps and the dates when such alterations become valid, and all other information concerning any international aerodromes which may be established, shall be communicated by the States concerned to each other and to the International Commission for Air Navigation, which shall notify such information to all of the contracting States. The contracting States may agree to establish international aerodromes at which there may be joint customs services for two or more States.

When, by reason of a case of force majeure, which must be duly justified, an aircraft crosses the frontier at any other point than those designated, it shall land at the nearest customs aerodrome on its route. If it is forced to land before reaching this aerodrome it shall inform the nearest police or customs authorities.

It will only be permitted to leave again with the authorization of these authorities, who shall, after verification, stamp the log book and the manifest provided for in paragraph 5; they shall inform the pilot of the customs aerodrome where he must necessarily carry out the formalities of customs clearance.

Before departure, or immediately after arrival, according to whether they are going to or coming back from a foreign country, pilots shall show their log books to the authorities of the aerodrome and, if necessary, the manifest of the goods and supplies for the journey which they carry.

6.

The manifest is to be kept in conformity with the attached Form No. 1.

The goods must be the subject of detailed declarations in conformity with the attached Form No. 2, made out by the senders.

Every contracting State has the right to prescribe for the insertion either on the manifest or on the customs declaration of such supplementary entries as it may deem necessary.

In the case of an aircraft transporting goods the customs officer, before departure, shall examine the manifest and declarations, make the prescribed verifications, and sign the log book as well as the manifest. He shall verify his signature with a stamp. He shall seal the goods or sets of goods, for which such a formality is required.

On arrival the customs officer shall insure that the seal is unbroken, shall pass the goods, shall sign the log book, and keep the manifest.

In the case of an aircraft with no goods on board the log book only shall be signed by the police and customs officials.

The fuel on board shall not be liable to customs duties provided the quantity thereof does not exceed that needed for the journey as defined in the log book.

As an exception to the general regulations certain classes of aircraft, particularly postal aircraft, aircraft belonging to aerial transport companies regularly constituted and authorized and those belonging to members of recognized touring societies not engaged in the public conveyance of persons or goods may be freed from the obligation of landing at a customs aerodrome and authorized to begin or end their journey at certain inland aerodromes appointed by the customs and police administration of each State at which customs formalities shall be complied with.

However, such aircraft shall follow the normal air route and make their identity known by signals agreed upon as they fly across the frontier.

REGULATIONS APPLICABLE TO AIRCRAFT AND GOODS.

9.

Aircraft landing in foreign countries are in principle liable to customs duties if such exist.

If they are to be reexported they shall have the benefit of the regulations as to permit by bond or deposit of the taxes.

In the case of the formation between two or more countries of the Union of touring societies the aircraft of the said countries will have the benefit of the regulations of the "Tryptique."

10.

Goods arriving by aircraft shall be considered as coming from the country where the log book and manifest have been signed by the customs officer.

As regards their origin and the different customs régimes, they are liable to the regulations of the same kind as are applicable to goods imported by land or sea.

11.

With regard to goods exported in discharge of a temporary receiving or bonded account or liable to inland taxes, the senders shall prove their right to send the goods abroad by producing a certificate from the customs of the place of destination.

AIR TRANSIT.

12.

When an aircraft to reach its destination must fly over one or more contracting States, without prejudice to the right of sovereignty of each of the contracting States, two cases must be distinguished:

1. If the aircraft neither sets down nor takes up passengers or goods, it is bound only to keep to the normal air route and make itself known by signals when passing over the points designated for such purpose.

2. In other cases it shall be bound to land at a customs aerodrome, and the name of such aerodrome shall be entered in the log book before departure. On landing the customs authorities shall examine the papers and the cargo and take, if need be, the necessary steps to insure the reexportation of the craft and goods or the payment of the dues.

The provisions of paragraph 9 (2) are applicable to goods to be reexported.

If the aircraft sets down or takes up goods the customs officer shall verify the fact on the manifest, duly completed, and shall affix, if necessary, a new seal.

VARIOUS PROVISIONS.

13.

Every aircraft during flight, wherever it may be, must conform to the orders from police or customs stations and police or customs aircraft of the State over which it is flying.

14.

Customs officers and excise officials and generally speaking the representatives of the public authorities, shall have free access to all starting and landing places for aircraft; they may also search any aircraft and its cargo to exercise their rights of supervision.

15.

Except in the case of postal aircraft, all unloading or throwing out in the course of flight, except of ballast, may be prohibited.

16.

In addition to any penalties which may be imposed by local law for infringement of the preceding regulations such infringement shall be reported to the State in which the aircraft is registered, and that State shall suspend for a limited time, or permanently, the certificate of registration of the offending aircraft.

17.

The provisions of this annex do not apply to military aircraft visiting a State by special authorization (articles 31, 32, and 33 of the convention), nor to police and customs aircraft (articles 31 and 34 of the convention).

FORM NO. 1.

NOTE.—The manifest should not bear on it erasures or corrections except those approved by the proper customs officials, nor contain interlineations or several articles entered on the same line. As many extra sheets may be added as are necessary.

ANNIVERSARY OF LAFAYETTE'S BIRTHDAY.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, on September 6 there was held in the city of New York a celebration of the anniversary of Lafayette's birthday. The gathering was addressed by the French ambassador to the United States, and messages were received from Mr. André Tardieu and Mr. Clemenceau, from the Prince of Wales, Marshal Haig, and other eminent persons of England and of France. I ask unanimous consent that the address of the French ambassador upon that occasion, together with the messages which were delivered from these eminent persons, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

AMBASSADOR JUSSERAND'S SPEECH.

"When we met last year on the same anniversary of the birth of Gen. Lafayette, the defender of liberty in the two worlds, the third battle begun at the Marne was still going on, the first having been fought A. D. 451 against the Huns—the original Huns—the second by Joffre in 1914, and the third about to be won by Foch and his peers, Haig and Pershing. It was still the time of the communiqués (how delightfully far off this now seems), and the day's communiqué had informed us that the Germans were in retreat on a front of 40 kilometers between Peronne and Chauny.

"A more memorable statement was due to the chairman of our meeting then and of our meeting to-day:

"'I trust,' he said, 'it may be the privilege of the chairman of next year's gathering to tell you of a complete victory for the allied cause.' We knew Justice Dowling was a man of manifold qualities; let us honor him for one more and a rare one—that of being a prophet; a good prophet.

"We are delighted to have the same chairman; no 'I told you so' was ever more welcome than his to-day, and we are pleased to form with him, as last year, on this Lafayette day, a group in which several of those nations without whom the war would have been lost are represented by men who love and admire each other's countries.

ROOSEVELT'S VOICE IS MISSED.

"But we mourn the absence of one man, and hearing no more a voice which on momentous occasions reached from one end of the world to the other, teaching men how to attain better days through courage, sense of duty, good citizenship, a voice now hushed forever—the voice of Theodore Roosevelt.

"The solemn occasion of last year will ever remain for me the more solemn because it so happened that I then saw and heard for the last time that big-hearted friend of many years and pressed his hand, now still.

"The war has now ended the way it should; peace has been signed; the peace that was to be, not a peace of vengeance, but a peace of reparation and safety—the strictly necessary amount of reparation and safety; nothing more, rather something less.

"'This reparation,' Mr. Roosevelt had said in his speech before you last year, 'must take the form of action that will render it impossible for Germany to repeat her colossal wrongdoing.' President Wilson had spoken and has acted to the same effect.

"If any who have not seen what we have seen and suffered what we have suffered, the willful devastations, the shooting or carrying away of civilians, the ruining of mines and machinery, the methodical blowing up of a city like Chauny, house by house, if any such may be tempted to consider this a harsh and cruel peace, and that it would be in our interest to become the friend of our enemy and to say to the blood-stained German let bygones be bygones, we would simply reply to them: Remember.

WEAK PEACE WOULD CAUSE SCORN.

"A weak peace and weak resolves would only cause scorn and tempt to new aggressions; which is not a way of speaking, but the stating of actual incontrovertible facts—just remember.

"Was the peace of 1871 a harsh and cruel peace for the Germans? It was written at their own dictation; they took our billions and Provinces. Yet they never for one moment ceased to be on the lookout for an occasion to begin again and achieve the destruction of France. They very nearly started a new war in 1875, and desisted not out of a sense of justice but out of fear, the fear of the British and the Russians. France herself was, in the meantime, so bent on peace that she yielded and yielded, going even so far as to present to Germany part of a colony, the French Congo, which we had settled and civilized without, by the way, any bloodshed. But peace could not be had, could not be bought, and sure as fate the day was to come when Herr von Schoen would notify us that we had bombarded Nuremberg, which was news to us and to the inhabitants of Nuremberg, too, and that therefore German 'Schrecklichkeit' was ready for us, as indeed it was.

"If even the enemy changes and understands, confesses not from the lips but from the heart, then we, too, shall change; not before. Has he understood, has he changed? Only yesterday, as reported, the man whom they worship, both in the flesh and as a wooden idol, Hindenburg, was saying that all of us, the defenders of right, who had been so bold as to dare fight for our hearths and our ideals, we, whose women have been carried into captivity, whose villagers have been shot, are what? We are, in his words, 'Helots and Pariahs.' Since we are not Germans, we are Pariahs. Do you believe that men who think thus would hesitate to try again the destruction of Helots and Pariahs if they could? They must be prevented, that is all.

REVELRY OF DESTRUCTION.

"There was such a revelry of destruction and crimes wherever Germans set foot during the war that with all those supposedly harsh conditions, even fulfilled to the letter, the fate of the vanquished aggressor, in his comfortable, well-closed homes, with heat and electricity, everything in order, the streets and monuments, the factories, schools, and churches intact, will be a most enviable one as compared with that, next winter, of millions of victors, living in their dreary hovels, burrowing under the wreckage in the cold and the mud. For whom will the harshness be? One must have seen those places, and I saw them.

"During my recent stay in France I made the most memorable journey of my life, visiting first those parts of my country which are French again owing to American valor. Chateau-Thierry, St. Mihiel, and some reconquered by our British friends, like Lens and Vimy Ridge, then Verdun, where the German did not pass, then Metz, the Strasbourg, then the valley of the Rhine, to Mainz with the French, Coblenz with the Americans, Cologne with the British, the three Yorktown nations, now friends forever; mangled France, victorious France, vanquished Germany.

"The situation of the winners seemed to us in a number of places harsh indeed and cruel, that of the vanquished prosperous and enviable. One French village we crossed had been deliberately burned down by the Germans in the earliest days of the war, when they thought they could not give us early enough a taste of their kultur, of their 'Schrecklichkeit.' Some 50 civilians had been shot, not one house remained, the assistant mayor was busy trying to recover among the ruins the body of his mother, a woman of 80, shot by the Germans in cold blood in August, 1914; he wanted to give her a decent burial. Some inhabitants had returned; they lived in dugouts, and had to walk 15 kilometers twice a week to get salt meat from the Government; four children had returned; no milk for them. Whatever the case may be as regards the peace terms, their fate certainly seemed to us harsh and cruel.

"Then it was Metz, then Strassburg, with the Tricolor flying at the top of the steeple; Metz, where our thoughts wandered to those far-off days when, in the first part of the sixteenth century, the earliest plebiscite on record was held, and by self-determination the city declared she wanted to be French; to the time of the early siege which François de Guise compelled the Germans to raise in 1552, and a medal was struck with an appropriate admonition to Emperor Charles the Fifth, and a pun on the name of the city, 'Haec sibi meta,' a word for word equivalent of our 'Thou shalt not pass.' And we thought, too, of that dinner, in more recent times, given by Count de Broglie, the governor of the place, in 1776, where a tall, keen-eyed, but silent young officer, aged 19, was present, heard for the first time of American independence, and there and then, in the capital of Lorraine, the Province of Joan of Arc, 'his heart,' as he wrote later, 'enlisted.' At Metz, indeed, began the wonderful career of the man whom we honor to-day, Marquis de Lafayette.

TRUE-BORN SON OF METZ.

"The present was even more moving for us than the past, with a visit to Fort Kaizerin, now Fort Jeanne d'Arc, with a distant survey of the battle fields of 1870, while listening to the experiences of that true-born son of Metz, Gen. de Maud'huy, now in command of the selfsame place. He told us, and this may show you what were the feelings of Lorrainers, that it had occurred to him in 1894 it was a shame for a son of Metz, the prisoner city, to take any amusement, and he vowed to himself that he would never go to a play until he could enter the theater of Metz preceded by his buglers. He had kept his word, abstaining from going to plays for 25 years; and a short while before, his vow being accomplished, he had entered the theater of his native city, in his uniform and decorations, preceded by 20 buglers sounding, all the audience rising, wild with enthusiasm. 'And here is now my response,' he added. 'I can go to the play any night; anything they perform is new to me.'

"At Strassburg, one thing we heard deeply touching. When in the midst of cheers and applause our troops entered a city where they had not been seen for 47 years, the inhabitants exhibited at their windows the portraits of their dead parents, so that they, too, should know and see.

FUTURE FRANCE BEING BUILT.

"And now that war is finished and peace is signed, what is going on in France? Much that is neither perceived nor heard. We hear of the difficulties of the task, of red tape, of wheels within wheels, and the rest. But in the meantime, in spite of mistakes and imperfections, future France is being built. Do not think that those sturdy men whom in company with you stopped the onrush of the Germans now stand aghast and disheartened at the sight of their ruins and undeserved hardships in store for them, peace or no peace. No; they flock, on the contrary, to the dismal regions, where they are sure to suffer, but where their fathers lived before them, and they want their children to live after them. They are busy clearing the wreckage, filling the shell holes and the trenches, removing the barbed wire and the unexploded shells (several million at Lens alone), preparing future crops.

"The little village I alluded to, a mere mass of ruins, had recovered 25 inhabitants when we saw it at Easter; when we left France to return here it had 100. Of the 107,000 inhabitants evacuated from the Department of Oise in 1914, over 61,000 had returned by the beginning of June last.

"A cheering thing it is to see the pride and joy of the inhabitants scattered in the ruins of their city when for the first time smoke is discovered rising from the chimney of one of their wrecked factories. This has been seen at Rheims, at La Cateau, and elsewhere. The desire to usefully live again is intense. I saw at Arras, in a hole underground, a workman busy with some plumbing work; he was cheerily working away.

"'I am a lucky man,' he told me. 'I had buried in this cellar what I had most valuable, and the Germans did not find it.'

"'And what was that?'

"'My tools, and so I can begin life again.'

ONE THOUSAND THREE HUNDRED BRIDGES DESTROYED.

"There were about 1,300 destroyed railway bridges. From the state of advancement of the work when I left France, they must all be rebuilt by this time, some only provisionally, but most of them permanently. For the most important ones, as at Courcelettes, connecting Lille and Paris, the work was continued day and night.

"The St. Quentin Canal, of the utmost importance, as connecting Paris with the Belgian coast regions, had been destroyed with the thoroughness for which German Kultur is famous; the supermen had been there at their best; the two tunnels especially under which the canal passes were considered masterpieces of destruction. But our mere men have already undone the mischief, and from what I hear the canal must now be in use.

"The inhabitants of the devastated regions have a newspaper of their own to state their wants, give warnings, report progress. Quite characteristically in one of their recent numbers they complained of complainers, often mere slackers. 'To all those who go on repeating, "There is no progress, nothing is being done," let us give a spade, a pickax, a wheelbarrow. Things will perhaps progress better.'

"They are indeed progressing, and the modern Cincinnati, returned from the camp to the native fields, are not idle.

"When Lafayette heard of American independence his heart enlisted. When you heard of the danger of France your hearts enlisted; the severest claims on you, the widening of the limits of military age for your population, the increase of war taxes were passed by a unanimous vote in the two Houses, and your descendants to the end of time will be proud of those ancestors of theirs who acted thus and fought so well in the great crisis.

VENERABLE MONUMENTS WRECKED.

"There is at Verdun a famous old cathedral which the Germans wanted very much to destroy; this was during the war a particular longing with them, as though one of the tenets of their kultur. I have seen a number of those venerable monuments all wrecked. The one at Arras will never be rebuilt; there are bushes, almost trees, growing now in the upper cornices. They could not see the one at Verdun owing to the hills, but they shelled it by the map, wrecking the nave, which is the oldest part, and missing the towers, which are more recent. On the day of the armistice last year the general in command told us some 400 Americans, soldiers, ambulance men, Red Cross men, and others, asked admittance. The one at their head explained that he was a Catholic priest; that others in the group were Catholics, Protestants, and Jews, and that all were united in the same desire, to be allowed to come into that church, kneel before the altar, and offer a hymn of gratitude for the glorious termination of the war.

"They were, of course, allowed, and, kneeling among the wreckage, sang their hymn, and then under the gaping vaults, through which the blue sky could be seen, they sang the 'Marseillaise' and the 'Star-Spangled Banner.'

"It occurred to the general that, since the towers remained, the bells must be safe, and by his order the 16 bells rang out in chimes, the first time they had been heard since they had sounded the tocsin for the general mobilization four years and a half before.

"He thereupon ordered, as a symbol of perennial union between our countries, the two flags to be raised on the two towers, the flag of France and that of America—the two flags of Lafayette, the Star-Spangled Banner, under which he had fought with Washington, and the flag which, in the early days of our revolution, he had devised for us, the tricolor of France."

DOWLING EULOGIZES ROOSEVELT.

"In his address of welcome Justice Dowling paid tribute to Col. Theodore Roosevelt, who spoke at the Lafayette Day exercises last year, and to the late French high commissioner to the United States, Edouard de Billy.

"'While many of our friends are here,' said Justice Dowling, 'we mourn one who last year gave us an address so timely and encouraging that the echo is still ringing in our ears. The loss which this country felt is doubly felt by this committee, and we have reason to thank God that He had given to this country in time of its emergency such a man as Col. Roosevelt. The place of Theodore Roosevelt in this country is safe for all time in the hearts of his countrymen.'

"Justice Dowling assured those who attended the exercises that the best assurance of peace was the fact that the great nations of the world allied in a common bond were still allies now that the fighting had ceased.

"These messages from distinguished men who had played big parts in the World War were read:

"'In the hours of trial and of the needed common efforts the American people and the French people united their thoughts in order to commemorate at once the birth of Lafayette and the battle of the Marne,' said President Poincaire. 'How could our two nations not seize, in this year of internal peace, the occasion to celebrate together the same anniversaries?

"'The brotherhood of America and France was born in the War of Independence. It has never been obscured since. It has found its final consecration in the great fight we have just fought shoulder to shoulder for the liberty of the world. It will keep all its strength in the future and contribute to consolidate, in the interest of humanity, the peace which has been established, at the cost of so many sacrifices, by the defenders of right.

"'To the people of the United States I send the greetings of the French Republic, to the American soldiers the cordial remembrance of their brothers in arms, to the American mothers who have lost their sons on the battle field of Europe the homage of my profound sympathy.'

"André Tardieu said:

"'Two years ago on the same date in the City Hall of New York I affirmed our common faith in the victory of right. Right has triumphed. To-day great duties await us which we shall fulfill only by maintaining in peace the closest solidarity of war.

"'Americans, you understood that it was your liberty that you came to defend with ours. Understand to-day that the future of our democracies is indissolubly bound and that the aiding of each other yesterday should be the law of to-morrow.'

CLEMENCEAU'S GREETING.

"Premier Clemenceau cabled:

"'The French nation takes profound joy in the thought that the American people associates this day in the same celebration the birthday of Lafayette and the anniversary day of the Battle of the Marne, the remembrance of the hero who immortalized himself in the struggle for American independence and the glorification of the victory which has assured the independence of France and of the world. You have proved to us how the noble example of Lafayette was always alive in the hearts of your sons. As he brought you the succor of his sword at the hour when you fought to become free, so, at the critical moment of our formidable struggle to escape barbarism, you came to give us the aid which assured victory. A witness of the valor of its soldiers, I send to the American people my warm and cordial greeting on this day, which commemorates two great anniversaries equally dear to the cause of liberty and of right.'

"The telegram from the Prince of Wales said:

"'I am proud to be asked to associate myself with your celebration. The British Empire can never forget its debt to France for the immortal victory of the Marne, the first great action of the war in which the French and British armies side by side imposed their will upon the enemy.'

HAIG'S CONGRATULATIONS.

"Marshal Haig wired:

"'It is a happy coincidence that on the anniversary of Lafayette's birthday America can celebrate also the first great victory won by the French and British armies for those principles of national liberty with which the name of Lafayette is closely identified. With traditions of a free people to guide her, it was, I think, inevitable that America should join the contest into which France and Britain had already been compelled to enter. It is a matter for congratulation on both sides of the Atlantic that she should have done so and to such purpose, and that henceforth the two great English-speaking peoples look back on sacrifices shared and victories won in common.'

"Admiral Beatty's message reads:

"'On the anniversary birthday of M. le Marquis de Lafayette and of the Battle of the Marne, the first since the termination of the greatest world struggle of all time, it is good to reflect on the following facts: That this distinguished Frenchman was one of the greatest upholders of freedom and opponents of tyranny; that the Battle of the Marne was the first great victory achieved in defense of a free world against tyrannical militarism that ruthless enemies attempted to force on it; that the teachings and example of this distinguished patriot and the valuable achievements on the Marne on this historic day in the cause of freedom go hand in hand, a sign that right and justice must triumph.'

PERSHING SENDS REGRETS.

"This is what Gen. Pershing sent:

"'I sincerely regret that I shall not be present in New York for the exercises in the City Hall celebrating the Lafayette-Marne anniversary. The first celebration of this joint anniversary since the signing of peace should be fraught with new significance to all Americans. Lafayette's services directly influenced our course of action in the war. The first Battle of the Marne saved the world from an overwhelming disaster. The memory of Lafayette and of the Marne must be kept fresh in the minds of every generation of our people.'

"Secretary Lansing wrote:

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD a resolution passed by Amherst Grange, No. 16, Patrons of Husbandry, of Amherst, Mass., upon the subject of the league of nations.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

AMHERST GRANGE, No. 16,
Amherst, Mass., September 5, 1919.

At its regular meeting, September 5, Amherst Grange, No. 16, passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That we are in favor of a league of nations to conserve peace and the establishment of a court of arbitration and the establishment of an international police force under such rules and regulations as the peace envoys shall determine.

H. M. THOMSON,
LORIN A. SHAW,
Mrs. CARRIE HAWLEY,
Resolution Committee.
FRED KENTFIELD, Master.
RUTH S. RUDER, Secretary.

LOAN OF TENTS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 95) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the city of Atlanta, Ga., tents, cots, horses, and saddle equipments for the use of United Confederate Veterans in their convention from October 7 to 10, 1919, which was to amend the title to read as follows: "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the city of Atlanta, Ga., tents, cots, blankets, and other camp equipment for the use of United Confederate Veterans in their convention from October 7 to 10, 1919."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Morning business is closed.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 7478, being the bill which we had before the Senate on Friday and which went over then with the understanding of those present that it should be taken up this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7478) to amend section 5200 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918.

MILITARY JUSTICE.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I desire to make a few observations in answer to a communication or rather to one of the syndicated articles of ex-President Taft which appears in the Washington Post this morning, and which, I assume, likewise appears in many other publications throughout the country. The heading of the article in question is as follows:

Taft defends courts-martial and opposes Chamberlain plan for a review by a civil tribunal—Declares administration of military justice has been vindicated—Errors few in number—Army must control trial to insure discipline or it will become a "mob."

Strange, Mr. President, as it may seem, in the very next column of the Post of this morning, paralleling Mr. Taft's, is an article prepared by a distinguished Member of Congress, Maj. ROYAL C. JOHNSON, now in Paris. He was an officer in the American Expeditionary Force, made a splendid record, and gave a good account of himself. The article is as follows:

BRUTAL TO A. E. F. MEN—PARIS PRISON OFFICIALS ACCUSED BY CHAIRMAN JOHNSON—BLAMES COL. E. P. GRINSTEAD—FINDS NO REASON FOR REDUCING "HARD-BOILED" SMITH'S SENTENCE—SOUTH DAKOTA REPRESENTATIVE SAYS MEDICAL OFFICER FOUND GUILTY OF MOST BRUTAL TREATMENT WAS RESTORED TO DUTY BY ORDER OF GENERAL HEADQUARTERS—DISPOSITION TO CONDONE OUTRAGES, HE SAYS.

[By ROYAL C. JOHNSON, United States Representative from South Dakota and chairman of committee investigating War Department expenditures.]

PARIS, September 14.

The treatment of military prisoners in and around Paris during the summer and fall of 1918 was undoubtedly brutal in the extreme, and no punishment could be too severe for those responsible for the conditions.

Men were robbed, starved, beaten, and abused, and apparently no officer above the rank of first lieutenant has been held responsible. I am not prepared to say at this time where the responsibility lies, but Col. Winship, of the judge advocate's office, in his testimony, and Gen. Donaldson in his report, clearly and specifically state that, in their opinion, Col. Edgar P. Grinstead, of the One hundred and fifty-eighth Infantry, was not free from blame. He was tried before an efficiency board in France, the board apparently consisting of three reputable colonels, and cleared.

REJECTS BOARD'S FINDINGS.

Upon testimony produced before the committee this seems unbelievable, but the Judge Advocate General refused to accept the findings of the board and ordered Grinstead to be returned to the United States for immediate demobilization. Further investigation will be necessary to determine all the facts and the ultimate responsibility.

The outstanding feature of the present investigation is the fact that the general headquarters of the American Expeditionary Forces reduced sentences of "Hard-Boiled" Smith without any apparent reason for the action.

The testimony showed conclusively that the medical officer at prison farm No. 2 was guilty of most brutal treatment to prisoners, had refused them medical treatment, exposed the men to the most vicious forms of infection, and yet when he was tried and found guilty by general court-martial and sentenced to be dishonorably dismissed from service the general headquarters again stepped in and restored him to duty and allowed him again to resume charge of the lives of American soldiers. The responsibility for this action has not been definitely fixed.

HEARS REVOLTING TESTIMONY.

There is not an American, however, who could believe that an American of any type could commit the acts of brutality which numberless witnesses testified had been committed by this so-called physician. The testimony is so revolting that it can not be published, and I feel no hesitancy in stating that an outrage was committed when this particular individual was restored to duty as an officer in the American Army. Much wonderful work has been done by our doctors in the American Army, but one blot on the record should not be allowed to condemn the entire organization.

There have been officers in the American Army who seemed to desire to condone the acts of brutality committed in American military prisons. Maj. Bennett, of the Inspector General's Department, has submitted report after report showing the most brutal acts, but his recommendations have universally been that no action should be taken and that the cases be dropped. I believe that the committee will be able to submit a unanimous report as to the prison conditions in the American Expeditionary Forces.

That article is by the chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on War Expenditures of the House of Representatives, who is over in France examining the charges of brutality and other charges which have been made from time to time against Army officials as affecting the enlisted personnel of the Army.

I do not intend at this time to address the Senate at any great length, Mr. President. I want to go into the subject later more fully than it is possible to do at this moment, and I merely wish to direct attention to some of the statements made by ex-President Taft in the article referred to. May I say that I am very fond of the ex-President, and in criticizing his position I do so without other than the most cordial good feeling and in the interest of substantial justice to our fighting men? One of his Republican friends, in a speech a few days ago, said that ex-President Taft has more friends in the United States than almost any other man, but fewer followers, and I do not know but that that is true. As one of my colleagues suggests as he passes me now, all respect him, but few follow him, which is another way of expressing the same sentiment. I am wondering how many followers he will have in his present contention.

Mr. President, from the reading of the article prepared by Mr. Taft it is evident that he has not given this subject any more than a one-sided consideration and has evidently read and relies upon the views expressed by the very department of the Government that has subjected itself to severe criticism. In it, amongst other things, he says:

In a letter under date of March 10, 1919, Gen. Crowder, at the invitation of the Secretary of War, took up the chief criticisms of Col. Ansell and his congressional supporters, and his suggestions for changes, and answered them. His letter is a very able document. It is a complete refutation of the attacks by statistical tables and a most overwhelming disclosure, by reference to the War Department records, of Col. Ansell's disingenuous methods, his inconsistency, and his lack of loyalty to his chief and generous friend. He makes it clear that the relieving of Col. Ansell from duty was due to his secret and devious course in securing the order of his appointment. The Crowder letter is a strong vindication of the administration of military justice in this war. When we consider the increase of our Army from less than 100,000 men to 4,000,000 and the necessity of adapting the machinery of justice to that enormous swelling of the number to be brought within military discipline, we may well feel satisfied with the results.

Mr. President, Mr. Taft may feel satisfied with the results, but I say to you without fear of contradiction that the American people are not satisfied with the results, nor is the Expeditionary Force nor the Army that remained in the United States satisfied with the results. He says further—and I am not going to read all of his article into the RECORD—that there were a very small number of errors committed by military tribunals in the war just closed. He continues:

Col. Ansell charged that the present system is an archaic one, with the abuses of centuries past. The truth is that the Articles of War were revised in 1916 by Congress, under the recommendations of Gen. Crowder, and were brought up to date after a full consideration of all the systems in vogue in all countries. Col. Ansell charged that courts-martial were completely under the control of the commanding generals and that they were in the habit of ignoring the action and recommendations of the Judge Advocate General as to errors and injustices in the record. Gen. Crowder shows that the percentage of cases in which the commanding generals failed to act upon the recommendations of the Judge Advocate General was so small as to be negligible.

I may say, parenthetically, that the reason they were so small as to be negligible was because they were not considered at all, many of them, by the office of the Judge Advocate General. Continuing:

Col. Ansell charged that the statute gave to the Judge Advocate General the right to revise and reverse the decision of the commanding general, but that the Secretary of War and Gen. Crowder refused so to construe the statute and to exercise the needed power. Gen.

Crowder shows that the statute had been held not to confer such power by the Judge Advocate Generals of the past, including Judge Advocate General Holt, and that this view had been sustained by the Federal court. He points out, moreover, that Col. Ansell's position in this regard, which Ansell seeks to have embodied in the new statute, would make the Judge Advocate General the supervisory officer of the action of the President, who created him and who is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

Mr. President, the Secretary of War about the 10th of March last published a letter in vindication of the present system; and although I requested that the other side of the controversy might be published at the same time and given the same publicity as the letter which he was issuing to the public, that opportunity was denied by the Secretary of War. I know that, because the Secretary of War was visiting some of the cantonments in the country in company with the Chief of Staff, and the subject was one of such great importance to the people of this country that I wired him myself and asked that Gen. Ansell's version of the matter might be submitted with the letter which the Secretary had given to the public. That request was refused. So ex-President Taft is making the same mistake, and he is giving the same one-sided statement and view of the subject, based entirely, I fear, upon the letter of Gen. Crowder.

Mr. President, Mr. Taft has permitted his generous friendship for the Judge Advocate General to lead him into great error. He has taken the statement of his friend without question or inquiry, thereby doing himself little credit and an innocent man gross wrong. It is unfortunate that he did not look at the record. The record neither shows nor suggests the slightest disingenuous conduct upon the part of Gen. Ansell. On the other hand, it shows that his conduct in these matters was characteristically frank and candid. So much, I regret, can not be said for others. Mr. Taft should have observed that Gen. Ansell could not have been relieved for any such reason as he assigns. The conduct of Gen. Ansell referred to was in November, 1917. He was kept on duty as Acting Judge Advocate General throughout the war, and at the end of the war received the highest honor that can come to a soldier—the distinguished-service medal, which was awarded him by the Secretary of War upon the recommendation of the Judge Advocate General. Nobody saw fit to call his conduct disingenuous until nearly two years afterwards, and not until he had criticized this system of military justice. Mr. Taft should have read the statement of Gen. Ansell, which the Secretary of War suppressed. It has since appeared in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and in pertinent portion is as follows:

HIS (GEN. CROWDER'S) CRITICISMS OF MY PERSONAL CONDUCT.

1. He claims that my efforts to establish a revisory power within the department through the office opinion of November 10 to that end was without his knowledge.

Assuming this to be true, it was well known in the department at that time that he had authorized me to manage the office in my own way and without further reference to him, except for certain appointments having political significance. But, as I heretofore said to the Secretary of War in the paper published in the New York Times, I did take occasion to consult Gen. Crowder upon the subject, and he replied:

"I approve heartily of your effort. Go ahead and put it over. I suspect, however, that you may have some difficulty with the military men arising out of article 37."

I knew of no change of attitude in him until I was advised shortly thereafter that he had prepared a brief in opposition, and two or three days later he resumed charge of the office and filed the brief. When I found this to be so, I went to Gen. Crowder and accosted him about his change of attitude. In explanation thereof he said:

"Ansell, I had to go back on you. I am sorry, but it was necessary to do it in order to save my official reputation."

He then added that he was nearing the end of his service; that he could not afford to be held responsible for the injustice that had gone on, if the existing law could be construed to have prevented it, and adverted to the fact that fixing such responsibility upon him would injure his career in this war. He then told me that the Secretary of War held him personally responsible and had "upbraided" him at the Army and Navy Club for sitting by and permitting this injustice to go uncorrected. The general then said that, humiliated at such imputation, he had gone back to the Provost Marshal General's office and consulted some of his friends there, and they decided that it was necessary for his self-protection to oppose the opinion the office had prepared and that two of the officers there helped him prepare the counter memorandum.

2. He says that I surreptitiously obtained an order appointing me as Acting Judge Advocate General in his absence.

Please look at his defense, pages 54 and 55. He admits that he said:

"It will be entirely agreeable to me to have you take up directly and in your own way with the Secretary of War the subject matter of your letter of yesterday."

I did take it up in a formal memorandum addressed to the Chief of Staff, the channel of communication prescribed by orders. I never spoke to the Chief of Staff on the subject and never endeavored in any way to obtain favorable action upon the memorandum. I let it take its course. Under 1132 Revised Statutes it was necessary that I be designated as Acting Judge Advocate General if I was to be charged with the policies and responsibilities of the office. Otherwise, the policies and responsibilities were Gen. Crowder's, who was not in a position to assume them. In furtherance of his ambitions he held three and sometimes four positions during this war, and he was in no position to perform the duties of Judge Advocate General or prescribe the policies of that office. Therein lies the difficulty. I was held responsible for the output, but for means and power was kept dependent upon an officer who was absent, absorbed in other tasks, and who differed with me on the policy of military justice.

The general bases his charge of surreptition solely on the ground that his approval of my designation as Acting Judge Advocate General was conditioned upon my taking it up "directly" with the Secretary of War. I had assumed that his language was frank and candid and not governed by the quibbling construction he now places upon it.

His other charge of surreptitious method is likewise based solely upon the fact that I made a recommendation on the subject of military justice in France to the Chief of Staff in a written memorandum which spoke for itself and which was never supplemented by any word or action of mine in support of it to secure favorable action. It is quibbling to say, as he does say (p. 58), that my statement to the effect that the commanding general of the American Expeditionary Forces was opposing means for a better supervision of military justice was untrue for the reason that the opposition was officially voiced to the department not by Gen. Pershing in person, but by his senior judge advocate and staff officer, Gen. Bethel, the staff officer, of course, representing the views of his chief.

3. He says that I myself had at first approved the death penalty in the cases from France. If I had done so the record would show it. The record is to the contrary. Neither is it to be expected that I should have once approved them and then have written a strong memorandum against approval without reference to my former position. The truth is, at the time the cases were being studied by Gen. Crowder, so far as he did study them, and his assistants I was away from the office in Canada. Col. Mayes, senior officer in my absence, has recently called my attention to this fact and informs me further that he has recently testified before the Inspector General that he had looked over the cases, but that I had not.

The War Department has indeed undertaken to maintain this vicious system at all costs and by methods which reveal the weakness of both the system and the department.

If ex-President Taft will take up this controversy as a lawyer and as a judge—and I may say that I do not know why this article was given to the public at this particular time, when a subcommittee of the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate is investigating the whole subject—and read the evidence that has been offered, he will completely change his view. He has changed his views occasionally. I think he was in favor of the covenant of the league of nations as it was printed the first time, but later suggested some amendments to it. He was in favor of the covenant of the league of nations as published the second time, and later thought some amendments or reservations ought to be made to it. I am satisfied, Mr. President, that if he will only hear this matter impartially and know of the injustices that have been done to the American youth, he will change his mind and espouse the side of the controversy championed by Gen. Ansell and other distinguished lawyers, both civil and military.

Mr. President, the controversy is largely a legal one. Mr. Taft does not mention that. Section 1199 of the Revised Statutes provides:

> The Judge Advocate General shall receive, revise, and cause to be recorded the proceedings of all courts-martial, courts of inquiry, and military commissions, and perform such other duties as have been performed heretofore by the Judge Advocate General of the Army.

It is the construction of that statute which makes the line of demarcation between the contention of the Judge Advocate General upon the one side and Gen. Ansell and those who agree with him upon the other, the Judge Advocate General and the War Department insisting that the power to revise does not give any power to do more than to suggest to the commanding officer, who has entire jurisdiction, a course which he ought to pursue, and that the Judge Advocate General, where the court below had jurisdiction and the proceedings were regular, has no other than this advisory power, while I insist, and many lawyers insist, and Gen. Ansell, who is a very distinguished officer and lawyer as well, insists that the power to revise gives to the Judge Advocate General not only an advisory power but the power to revise, modify if need be, and to change the judgment of the court below.

Mr. President, the revising power has not been exercised, with the result that innumerable cases have been tried before summary and general courts-martial, and terrible injustices have been perpetrated against the young men of the Army without any power of revision or modification or reversal lodged anywhere; and the only power asserted by the Judge Advocate General, and the War Department, through Mr. Baker, as well, is a power to examine these proceedings, which is sometimes done in a cursory way, and advise the commanding general as to whether or not the judgment ought to be approved.

In proof of that I am going to call attention to a few cases here, and to only a few. I am going to address myself to these and other cases in detail some time, and I will show the outrages that have been perpetrated against these men. This Army is not the ordinary peace-time Army, when many men who went into it went into it as professionals; men frequently who were out of a job, and who had in many cases no higher ambition than to live without very hard work; men who were used as roustabouts in the garrisons and camps, by the commanding officers as chauffeurs and gardeners and lawn keepers and stable keepers, and such things as that. The Army to-day is composed of the flower and chivalry of America. The millionaire and the laboring man, the man in the higher walks of social life and the man in the humblest stations, are working in this Army side by side and shoulder to shoulder, without any distinctions of wealth or caste, or anything else. To say that these young men who have come from the factory and the farm shall be treated as criminals and as serfs is an outrage against American citizenship, and I propose at some future time to endeavor to show it up in such a way that I think even Mr. Taft may be induced to change his view.

Mr. Taft says that in the increase of the Army from less than 100,000 to 4,000,000 there were some injustices, but he does not say how many cases there were. It appears from authentic sources that there were 322,000 trials by inferior courts in the Army since this war began and up to the armistice, and over 22,000 general court-martial trials for the same period, and that the average general court-martial sentence of confinement alone, including the most trivial offenses, reaches the period of seven years. This excludes sentences of life imprisonment and of death.

Now, notwithstanding the assertion of ex-President Taft that there were few injustices, there were 28,000 aggregate years of sentence imposed upon 4,000 of those who were tried by general court-martial for the period named, and since the armistice this aggregate of sentences has been reduced from 28,000 years to 6,700 years, and the work is still progressing; and it is progressing because a courageous man like Gen. Ansell and some distinguished lawyers who did not hesitate to tell conditions in the War Department have been insisting, in season and out of season, that these outrages against American citizenship ought to be corrected. They are being corrected, but they are being corrected in a way that does not render complete justice. The young men against whom these injustices have been perpetrated, instead of being able to have a court of last resort pass upon their cases and say whether or not they were guilty in the first instance, are compelled to come to the President of the United States begging for clemency, and then are pardoned for crimes which they never would have been adjudged to have committed if their cases had been properly tried and reviewed.

Mr. President, Mr. Taft in his article blames Gen. Ansell for speaking of this system as an archaic system. It is archaic. As evidence of that, Mr. President, let me call attention to the fact that the Articles of War that we now have were the British articles of war of 1774. These articles of war had been in force since feudal days without very much, if any, change. They were in force at a time when the King was the commander of the army, and moved it as pawns on a chessboard at his sweet will and pleasure. The enlisted men of his army had no other rights than were permitted them by the bounty and generosity of the King himself. Those articles of war were adopted with little change by the Continental Congress, and it is a remarkable fact of authentic history that Adams and Jefferson themselves expressed wonder that the articles could have been adopted by the Continental Congress without having been critically examined and without any opposition. It was emergency legislation of the Revolutionary period, and we all know what that means.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I ask the Senator to clarify a little the point he is making. Does he maintain that the present system results in unjust convictions or in excessive punishments?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Both.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. As far as excessive punishments are concerned, the present method seems to have worked satisfactorily by reducing the excesses, according to the figures which the Senator gives, the sentences having been reduced from many thousand to a very few thousand. Am I correct in that?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No; the Senator is not correct, and I will state why.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I had the impression from conversations with Gen. Ansell that most of the abuse consisted in excessive punishments, and it seems to me that the figures given by the Senator indicate that that evil has been eliminated by the clemency board, as I understand it is called. If there is also an evil of unjust convictions, I have not understood it to be very great. I thought it was chiefly a question of excessive punishments. I thought that possibly the Senator could clarify that.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will try to do it. Suppose the Senator's son was a member of the American Expeditionary Forces, a volunteer, or a man drafted into the service, for they stand on the same footing. A charge is made against him, we will say, of sleeping on his post, and he is tried. He is not given an opportunity to call the necessary witnesses. The environment of this young man at the time of the commission of the crime is not taken into consideration, as it ought always to be. The evidence might have been wholly insufficient, and yet this young man, we will say the Senator's son, is convicted of a crime which involves death or imprisonment in the penitentiary. His case goes up to the commanding officer, who approves the sentence of the court. From that conviction there is absolutely no appeal anywhere, provided only that the court had jurisdiction and the proceedings were regular. The sufficiency and character of the evidence do not enter into it at all. If the court had jurisdiction and the trial was regular, this young man is sent to the penitentiary or ordered to be shot, and the Judge Advocate General has no power to revise the judgment. He can, under his view of the law, only advise the commanding officer, who can entirely ignore such advice.

Assuming that it was a case where a young man in a civil tribunal had been convicted in an inferior court. He has the right of appeal to the supreme court; the supreme court looks over the record and finds that improper evidence was admitted, or that prejudicial error was committed, or that there was irregularity in the trial that warranted a reversal; the case is reversed and goes back to the lower court, with possibly instructions to dismiss or for a retrial, it makes no difference which; but in any event the young man is not a convict in the eyes of the law until he is finally convicted by the court of last resort, and the stigma of conviction does not attach to him. He is not turned loose upon the world branded as a convict. Suppose the soldier, in the illustration I have taken, undertakes to appeal to the Judge Advocate General. The Judge Advocate General looks over the record and says, "The court had jurisdiction. There may have been improper evidence admitted or insufficient evidence to warrant conviction; there may have been prejudicial error or gross irregularities in the trial; the court did not go into the case as fully as it ought; and yet I have no power, the War Department has no power, to revise." The only power the Judge Advocate General has, under his construction of the law, is to send it back, with his advice, to the commanding officer.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. In just a moment I shall be glad to yield.

The difference between the two cases is here: In the case of the young soldier he is convicted and he has the stigma of a convict upon his brow which he can not get away from. The evidence before the subcommittee shows that that verdict follows that young man wherever he goes. He is pursued by the Army itself, and wherever he applies for employment, no matter where he goes in this country, he is always a convict; while in the other case the stigma of conviction does not attach. The young soldier is compelled to go to the President of the United States as a suppliant and ask for a pardon for a crime that he did not commit and to have restored to him the rights of citizenship. That is the difference.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, with reference to the query of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], as to whether the complaints or cases cited by Gen. Ansell were not almost wholly those of excessive punishments, the Senator from Oregon will remember that in every case, I think, that he brought before the subcommittee it involved prejudicial error in the admission of evidence or irregularity in procedure and not excessive punishments.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Entirely so. It was admitted by the witnesses before our subcommittee, and some who sustain the present system, that the court-martial system is a system of terrorism. There is no question about that, is there, I will ask the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. LENROOT. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is a system of terrorism rather than of doing justice to the individual.

Now I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. It may be that the Senator will bring out what I want to ask him, but from some of my information and conversations, not only with Gen. Ansell but other officers in the Army, I formed the conclusion, and I wanted to know from the Senator whether there is any justification for it, that one of the great wrongs perpetrated is just what the Senator has referred to, that the young man, a private, let us say, is arrested for some charge, and whether he is innocent or guilty all agree that he ought to have a fair trial; the man selected as his attorney is selected by the same official who selects the prosecutor—the commanding general—and invariably, if it is a private soldier, it is the lowest commissioned officer who is selected. He is not selected because he is, in fact, an attorney. He may know nothing about legal procedure or nothing about procedure before a court-martial. One of the evils, as I understood it, is that all the men, not only the members of the court but the prosecuting officer as well as the attorney for the defense, are selected by the man who makes the charge in reality, and from whom every one of these officials, if they get a promotion, must secure it. Is that right?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Absolutely.

Mr. NORRIS. Of course, that surrounds the young man with an air of injustice to begin with.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is no question about that. The commanding officer appoints the court, he appoints the prosecutor, he appoints the counsel for the defendant, he decides upon the admissibility of evidence, he approves or disapproves the sentence when it is rendered. He either says, "I disapprove the sentence because you have not punished him enough," or "I disapprove the sentence because you have punished him too much." So the commanding officer has charge of the whole business from beginning to finish. The cases are not infrequent where the commanding officer disapproves of the sentence because the man was not punished severely enough or not punished at all. He orders the court to reconvene and retry the man and convict him of a higher crime, with a severer punishment.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it not a fact that in that kind of a trial all the persons connected with the trial, both of the prosecution and the defense, being officers under the commanding officer, if they know the kind of sentence he wants will be rather inclined, at least, not to bring any other judgment than that which the commanding officer expects, and that particularly the man who is called an attorney and who is not an attorney, unless he just happens to be one, who is defending the man, does not, in the first place, know anything about procedure and in the next place he would not want to go contrary to the wishes of the commanding officer, on whom he must depend if he ever gets a promotion or anything of that kind?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I would not want to impeach so generally the officers of the Army, but that is true in a great many cases.

Mr. NORRIS. That is perfectly natural, it seems to me.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. If I may digress for a moment, I will say that all the distinguished Senator has to do is to sit in the Military Committee room some time and listen to testimony of witnesses on the subject of Army reorganization. Many of them, I do not care how brave they may be, or what great soldiers they have been, or what records they have made, hesitate to tell what they think about these things in opposition to higher authority, and sometimes, I am sorry to say—if it was necessary I could call attention to individual cases—there are cases where men have dared to come before the committee and tell the truth, and they have been demoted for it. I will refer to only one, Gen. Ansell, who was practically demoted and put in a position on this clemency board of innocuous desuetude, where he could not do anything he wanted to do in the way of reforming a vicious system, surrounded, as he was, by men who were against him, and while he was not driven from the Army he occupied a position in it that no honorable man would want to occupy, where he had stood for years for rectifying the wrongs that had been perpetrated against these young men, and then was turned down by his chief and not even permitted to give publicity to his views, except as it is permitted to be done through the Congress of the United States.

But, Mr. President, I have digressed from what I had in mind. Mr. Taft denies that this is an archaic system. I say that both Jefferson and Adams expressed wonder that the Articles of War of 1774 were engrafted into laws of this country, with only some slight changes in them.

There are men in the Army who claim, Mr. President, that the President of the United States—they put a question mark after it—inherited some of the prerogatives of the king, and that Congress could not interfere with his prerogatives. Think of claiming, in this day and generation, that the President of the United States had such prerogatives! I call attention to the so-called Kernan report. I want Senators to read it, because in that the question is asked, Has Congress the power to interfere with this inherited kingly prerogative and power? I say that Congress can wipe out the Articles of War entirely if it sees fit to do so, or can change them so radically that injustice shall not and can not be done to the American youth.

The articles of 1774, the British articles, were verbally revised in 1806, again verbally revised two or three times, and finally revised in 1916. I know something about that, because I happened to be a member of the Military Affairs Committee at the time. But no radical changes have been made in them, simply changes in verbiage and in phraseology. The best thing that was put in the revised articles of 1916 was the power vested in The Adjutant General to take these young men who had been convicted of crimes, and, in due course, restore them to the colors if they behaved themselves well; and many young men took advantage of it and restored themselves to the colors by good conduct, showing that they were not criminals at heart.

The articles of 1774 have not been changed in system and but little in substance. The revision of 1916 was not such a revision, yet we find that the articles of Great Britain have been radically changed since those early days for use in the British Army.

The articles of war of France have been changed so as to give them a civilian touch.

Mr. Taft speaks of the necessity for keeping the administration of justice within military control in order to maintain discipline by a sort of terrorism and by instilling fear in the hearts of the young men in the Army, so that they will do their duty. Mr. President, under the British system the Judge Advocate General of the Army is not a soldier; he is independent of the Army; and he has appellate and revisory power and jurisdiction. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] asked me if the commanding officer here and under our system appointed the prosecutor and the defender. I answered in the affirmative. Under the British system the Judge Advocate General has a law officer even on the field court to advise, not to prosecute a man, not to defend a man, but he is there as a friend of the Government of Great Britain as a judge, to see to it that justice is done to every young man who comes before the court. He is independent of military authority, except in so far as he may be influenced, as in this country sometimes, by social or other influence. But he is supposed to be independent of the Army.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I wish to ask the Senator, in view of the fact that we are just inaugurating a general world millennium and all harshness and cruelty are to come to end, if he does not think we might possibly mitigate the treatment of our own boys in our own Army, particularly when they are going to serve in the field of peace where there is to be no more war?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think charity ought to begin at home.

Mr. REED. Now, asking a question in a serious vein, the Senator has spoken about the origin of this code of military procedure and has traced it back to the Middle Ages. Is it not a fact that at that time it was the common thing to impress men into the military service, even to impress inhabitants of other countries that had been conquered, to take them and put them in the army and force them to serve, and I ask the Senator if he does not think that the cruelties of this system of law can be directly attributed to the fact that it was written at a time when they were forcing men to serve by the processes of which I have spoken?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not know the original inception of it, but it is said that the British articles of 1774, which met the approval of Gustavus Adolphus, were a part of the old Roman military code, so that America, of all these powers, has not kept pace with advancing civilization in amending the Articles of War to meet changed and changing conditions.

Mr. REED. There is no doubt about the fact that in the fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, and early in the eighteenth century it was very common for a country to be invaded and for the people to be put into the army and compelled to serve. Men back of them had the power to try and convict them if they did not serve, and when that service was given it was entirely involuntary.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There is no question about that.

Mr. REED. Under those circumstances, of course, one can understand that the soldier was serving as a result of force and that brutality was essential to compulsion.

It seems to me, if the Senator will pardon the interruption, that in this day of education, in this day when the Government rests upon the consent of the governed, a different system of dealing with our young men is necessary; that the boy who leaves his home to-day, voluntarily or under the draft, is entitled in the Army to be regarded not only as a human being, but as an American citizen, and that any failure to have regard for that fact will put the Army in disrepute and will ultimately result in such a feeling against an army as to greatly injure the country.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am in thorough accord with the views of the Senator. I might give innumerable instances of hardships that have been perpetrated against them. Why, Mr. President, without going into lengthy details, take the case of the negro soldiers convicted down in Texas a few years ago. Those men were convicted by court-martial and the sentences approved by the commanding officer and the men shot within 48 hours. Where was there any chance to review the cases? The records came to the Judge Advocate General's office some four months after the men had been executed.

Without going into the merits of the controversy as to whether the execution of these men was proper or not, they had a right as American citizens to have their cases looked into by some one higher in authority.

Take the case of the sergeants, another case in Texas, tried and convicted as mutineers. They were splendid men and had violated some slight regulation of the camp, playing cards or something of the kind. While they were under arrest they were ordered to perform military duty, and they refused to perform the duty on the ground that while in arrest they were not subject to military duty. Then they were tried as mutineers and were convicted, and the sentence was approved, and although the War Department had an opportunity to examine the records, and conceded the illegality and injustice, the department sustained the findings, and those soldiers, who were training the men on the Mexican border, were dishonorably dismissed from the Army and their pay forfeited.

Mr. REED. Is that the way the case went?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is the way the case went. They went out of the service. The reviewing officer, when he reviewed that case, held that the court had jurisdiction.

Mr. REED. Did the Senator say that the reviewing officer held that, by operation of the law, it could not be corrected?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That was the fate of the men.

Mr. REED. The reviewing officer ought to be tried.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I think so myself. The Senator has tried a great many very important criminal cases, and there is no man in the Senate who knows more about criminal law than the Senator, both for the prosecution and for the defense. Take a case, by way of illustration, where 20 men are on trial charged with complicity in the commission of some crime. They have a right to sever in their defense, though the same court tries them all. Suppose they sever, and the court convicts the first man. It may become necessary for each of these men to examine the others. Their defenses may be entirely dissimilar. The defense of one would not be the defense of the other, and yet these men are tried by the same court, and if one of the men is convicted they will all be convicted, for that is the usual result. The same man prosecutes; the same man defends. Where is the chance for justice? There are cases of that kind.

Take the case of the four young men in France sentenced to be shot. The Senate is probably familiar with it, but I want the country to become familiar with it, and it seems impossible to get the facts before the country in a way that will attract attention and cause a demand for the remedy of these abuses. I dislike to read it into the RECORD——

Mr. NORRIS. I wish the Senator would do so.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I read from a letter addressed by Gen. Ansell to me and heretofore printed in the RECORD:

(c) The four death cases from France: The next cases cited by the Judge Advocate General as illustrating the justice with which the system meets "the stern necessities of war discipline" were four death sentences from France in the cases of four 18-year-old boys, who had volunteered at the beginning of the war—Nos. 110753, 110754, and the companion cases, 110751 and 110752. These were the first death sentences received from France. In the first two the death penalty was awarded for a charge of sleeping upon post, and in the last two for refusal to go to drill. The trials were legal farces, as any lawyer who will look at the records will see. In each of two of the cases the trial consumed about three-quarters of an hour, and the record occupies less than four loosely typewritten pages. The other two consumed slightly more time, and resulted in a slightly larger record. The courts were not properly composed, and in two of the cases were clearly disqualified. The accused were virtually denied the assistance of counsel and the right of defense. A second lieutenant as counsel made no effort to assist. That they were hindered rather than helped in their defense by counsel is domonstrated by the fact that in the case where a plea of guilty was entered the sole effort of counsel consisted of his calling a witness and asking him this question:

"Q. Was the accused's record good up to this time?—A. It was not. It is one of the worst in the company."

Two pleaded guilty to a capital offense and the other two made not the slightest fight for their lives. Even if the men had been properly tried and convicted, no just judge could have awarded the death penalty. These young soldiers had been driven to the point of extreme exhaustion. At the time of commission of the offenses the military authorities evidently regarded them lightly. The two who were charged with sleeping on post were not relieved from post nor were they arrested or accused for 10 days thereafter, and the two who were charged with refusal to go to drill were not arrested or charged for a month thereafter.

The offenses, under the circumstances of their commission, evidently were not considered as very serious at the time. Evidently something came up later that made the War Department or the commanding officer feel that this practice of terrorism ought to be indulged in against these men and an example set to the Army by taking their lives.

Mr. KIRBY. May I ask from what statement of fact the Senator is reading?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am reading from an article which I had inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. KIRBY. Whose statement?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is a letter which Gen. Ansell wrote me and which was heretofore printed in the RECORD. If the question is intended to impeach Gen. Ansell, Mr. President, the numbers of the cases are given, and I challenge the Senator or anyone else to say that this statement of fact is wrong in any way or particular whatsoever. I invite the Senator, and I invite anybody, if the records have not been changed, to go to the War Department and get them and insert them in the RECORD.

Mr. KIRBY. I do not know what the facts are, and I do not propose to go anywhere and get them to put in the RECORD. The thought I had in mind was to have the Senator state from what document he was reading in making a statement of fact.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. There was an implication in the question of the Senator, not intended possibly, that he questioned the statement of fact.

Mr. KIRBY. Not at all. I only desired information as to who made the statement of fact.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Gen. Ansell is the man.

Mr. KIRBY. I have the information; I thank the Senator.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have never found him to vary from the truth at any time. But that does not make very much difference; assuming there is some inaccuracy in the statement, even if it should be exaggerated a little, that does not affect what I am going to get at in a minute.

But at this juncture the authorities abruptly changed their policy and decided to make an example of these men.

That is, after having waited quite awhile to prefer charges against them and for the trial of both.

Gen. Pershing, who under the law had nothing whatever to do with these cases, injected his power and authority into the course of justice, clamored for the death penalty, and asked that the cable be used to transmit to him the mandate of death.

What became of the cases of these boys? Nothing in the world saved them except the fact that the death penalty could not be executed until the record had reached Washington.

Mr. President, these records reached in due course the office of the Judge Advocate General. That was their final resting place. The Judge Advocate General must have had some mental reservations about the justice of taking the lives of these young men. His correspondence with the War Department, with the Chief of Staff, shows that, and yet he finally approved the sentences. He approved them, and taking the records and evidence by the four corners and reading it, it is shown that he approved them to establish this practice of terrorism, and he approved them really in order to set an example to the balance of the Army. The Chief of Staff approved them. They were approved by all the military authorities. All of them, from the commanding officer up to Gen. Pershing and the authorities here, approved the finding in the cases of these young men, and yet the evidence shows that these young fellows were completely exhausted, two asleep at their posts, and the others who declined to drill.

Now, what happened to them? The discussion shows that Gen. Ansell was brave enough to say in terms that these convictions ought not to have been had, and that the sentences should not be approved. He probably ought to have been court-martialed himself for the efforts he made to save the lives of these young men, but he knew what had taken place, and that there was no chance to save them through military channels, so he placed the record of the cases in the hands of a Member of Congress with the request that he submit them to the President and get the President to intervene to save the lives of these poor boys—they were nothing but boys, Mr. President. The President did intervene and commuted the death sentence. That meant imprisonment for these young fellows. The surroundings and condition of the young men were not taken into consideration at the trial.

What happened? What further became of them? We had an enlightening statement about two of them a few days ago, when the Secretary of War addressed the President a letter and stated that two of these young fellows, whose names were given, had been permitted to go to the battle front; one of them had died in action, fighting for his country in one of the hard-fought battles of the war, while the other was wounded in action. But the letter referred to was silent as to the other two. Following is the correspondence, taken from the Washington Post of August 22, 1919:

BOYS SAVED BY PRESIDENT PROVE HEROES—SLEPT AT POSTS; PARDONED—ONE IS KILLED IN WAR, SECOND WOUNDED.

An exchange of letters between President Wilson and Secretary of War Baker yesterday revealed the redemption of two boy soldiers sentenced to die after a court-martial in France for sleeping on outpost duty, but later pardoned by the President. The letters, which tell the story, are as follows:

"MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: You will recall that early in 1918 four death sentences were presented to you from France. Two, for disobedience of orders, you remitted to terms of imprisonment, and two young boys, Sebastian and Cook, who were convicted of sleeping on outpost duty, you fully pardoned.

"It will interest you to know that upon restoration to duty both made good soldiers. Sebastian died in battle in the Aisne offensive in July, 1918. Cook was wounded in the same battle and restored to health in time to fight in the Meuse-Argonne Battle, when he again fought gallantly and was the second time wounded. He has now been restored to health through medical attention and has been honorably discharged from the service.

"Respectfully, yours, "NEWTON D. BAKER."

Here is the President's reply:

"MY DEAR BAKER: Thank you for your thoughtfulness in telling me about the records made by Sebastian and Cook, the two youngsters who were pardoned for sleeping on outpost duty. It is very delightful to know that they redeemed themselves so thoroughly, and it was very thoughtful of you to give me the pleasure of learning about it.

"Cordially and faithfully, yours,

"WOODROW WILSON."

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have been wondering, Mr. President, what became of the other two boys. It is fair to assume they were sent to the penitentiary, probably for life. Now I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I am sure the Senator wants to do justice to all who are concerned in this matter, and it is for that reason that I venture to interrupt by suggesting that in his letter to the Secretary of War last May, I think it was, the Judge Advocate General, Gen. Crowder, declares that it was through his efforts as well that the attention of the President was drawn to these circumstances.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I appeal to the only record I have to contradict that statement. The Senator may be correct, but I give the record I have.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not know anything about it beyond the fact that the letter referred to, which was somewhat generally circulated, was received by me in California. I was very much surprised when I read it, after listening to Gen. Ansell, to find recorded in it the statement that it was through the efforts of the Judge Advocate General, as well as those of Gen. Ansell, that the conviction of these young men was directed to the attention of the President. I neither affirm nor deny the truth of the statement, but if it is correct, then some note should be made of it as we go along in this discussion.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am glad to have the Senator from Colorado call attention to it.

Mr. THOMAS. I may say, Mr. President, that I am in hearty sympathy with Gen. Ansell, and I was so during the entire period of his appearance before the Senate committee at the last session of Congress. I think he has done a great deal and is still doing a great deal to mitigate the severity of courts-martial, and is entitled to the thanks of the country for his earnest efforts in that direction.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Right in that line, I had not intended to quote it, but I am going to give Gen. Crowder's record in regard to these cases, for if he claimed to have interceded for the lives of these boys the claim is not sustained by the record. Gen. Ansell was in intimate touch with the situation generally there and he knew all about it. Here is what he says. I read from Gen. Ansell's letter to me under date of August 16, which was printed in the RECORD. This touches the very subject of which the Senator from Colorado was speaking. Says Gen. Ansell:

According to the Judge Advocate General, Gen. Pershing urged the adoption of the inexorable policy of awarding the death penalty in all cases of sleeping on post, and he insists that no one should be criticized for agreeing with this policy or acceding to Gen. Pershing's urgent request. And then the Judge Advocate General makes this surprising statement:

"I myself, as you know, was at first disposed to defer to the urgent recommendation of Gen. Pershing, but continued reflection caused me to withdraw from that extreme view, and some days before the case was presented for your final action the record contained a recommendation from me pointing in the direction of clemency."

This last was written by Gen. Crowder to the Chief of Staff. There were some prickings of conscience there no doubt that made him feel that he ought not to consent to the execution of these young fellows. Gen. Ansell proceeds to say:

The record shows an entirely different attitude. It shows that on March 29 to April 4 Gen. Crowder wrote the reviews in these cases, but did not as yet conclude them with his recommendation. On April 5 he sent them to Gen. March in this unfinished state, accompanied by a letter in which, while indicating that by right and justice these boys ought not to die, he suggested, nevertheless, that since Gen. Pershing insisted upon the death penalty the department should uphold him and present a united front to the President. He asked for a conference with the Chief of Staff in order that there might be unanimity in the department to that end.

Unanimity to what end? Unanimity to present a solid military front sustaining the execution of these young fellows. Here is Gen. Crowder's language:

You will notice that I have not finished the review by embodying a definite recommendation.

He was dodging; his conscience was disapproving while his fear of the military bureaucracy was yielding to what was asked to be done. Says Gen. Crowder:

It would be unfortunate indeed if the War Department did not have one mind about these cases. There is no question that the records were legally sufficient to sustain the findings and sentence. There is a very large question in my mind as to whether clemency should be extended.

Now, listen to this and think of the fear, the terrorism that this department insists on inspiring not only in the enlisted men but in the commissioned personnel of the Army:

Undoubtedly Gen. Pershing will think if we extend clemency that we have not sustained him in a matter in which he has made a very explicit recommendation.

May we have a conference at an early date?

He is appealing to the Chief of Staff. He did confer with Gen. March and they agreed to present a united front. Think of a law officer appealing to the head of the Military Establishment when he ought to have sustained it, if at all, on a legal ground.

He did confer with Gen. March, and they agreed to present the united front, to uphold the hands of Gen. Pershing, and to recommend the execution of the sentence of death. On April 6 Gen. Crowder brought back from his conference with the Chief of Staff the unfinished reviews and immediately concluded them by adding to them the following recommendation:

"I recommend that the sentence be confirmed and carried into execution"—

I call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to that—

"With this in view there is herewith inclosed for your signature a letter transmitting the records to the President for his action thereon, together with an Executive order designed to carry this recommendation into effect should such action meet with your approval.

"(Signed) E. H. CROWDER,
"Judge Advocate General."

Does that look very much like Gen. Crowder had done much to save these boys? He had assisted in presenting a united front to carry out the death sentences against these young men. If Gen. Crowder has any other evidence upon the subject, I am sure it will be produced, and I hope it will be.

As I said a while ago, it was only because of the fact that Gen. Ansell dared violate the military proprieties, went around and outside of military channels, and placed this matter in the hands of a Member of Congress, who presented it to the President, that clemency was exercised in behalf of these young men. Mr. President, Mr. Taft would have us believe that Gen. Ansell was rather a bad man! He served in the Army for days and weeks after he assisted in saving the lives of these boys, and testified that he did it, and they dared not undertake to court-martial him. Why? Simply because they knew he was not only appealing to the head but to the heart of the American people, and any court that convicted him would have to get out of the Army and get out of the country in order to be safe against the anger of an outraged public.

It was ordered, however, that Gen. Ansell's conduct be investigated by the Inspector General. It is all in the record here. He challenged them to go ahead with the investigation and prosecution and refused to testify before the Inspector General of the Army—another violation of military discipline. Why did they not put him out of the Army? Simply because he was appealing for justice for the young men who had assisted in making the world safe for democracy, if you please, and by his conduct hoped to have democratic methods applied to the Army itself.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Before the Senator closes I desire to call his attention to what is an apparent discrepancy in regard to the law. Since the Senator knows what the law is on the subject, I wish he would enlighten me. The Senator refers to the men convicted in France and sentenced to death, and calls attention to the fact that the law would not permit the death sentence to be carried out without the approval of the President.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. These happened to belong to that small class of death sentences that in time of war require the confirmation of the President. All others come now to the department only by regulation.

Mr. NORRIS. There is no law to that effect?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. No, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. Apparently there was a different regulation down on the Mexican border, where they shot a number of men.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The execution of those men and Gen. Ansell's protest led to the adoption of the regulation to give a man a chance to be heard by the legal authorities. Not only has that regulation been put in force since those men were shot in Texas, but another regulation has been put in vogue by the President very recently. If these appeals to the country do not do any other good, they at least led to a mitigation of sentences and to regulations. Only a few days ago a regulation was issued, as I understand, that men who had been acquitted by a court-martial should not be retried and convicted by order of a commanding officer. The rules of evidence in civil cases are ignored in most of these military trials, and it is astounding that the country has stood the system so long without protest. Not only were there unjust sentences imposed, but after the sentences had been imposed these young men were herded with criminals. An Army officer was in my office only a day or two ago who said that in the St. Anne Prison, in France, in a room not bigger than one of the cloakrooms here, there were crowded from three to four hundred men, some of whom had merely been absent without leave, having failed to catch the train to get out of Paris. They were herded with criminals.

Somebody is responsible not only for the passing the sentences to which I have referred, but somebody is responsible for the cruelties which have been practiced against the American Army. Can you wonder that some of these boys are coming back with their hands raised against the Government? Can you wonder that some of them have imbibed the spirit of Bolshevism, when they feel and know that they and their friends have been compelled to undergo severe sentences without any helping hand whatsoever?

Mr. President, I am unfortunate in some respects. Whenever I suggest legislation or indulge in criticism of conditions in order to ameliorate the situation of the men of the Army I am charged with criticizing the administration. I suppose if I were subject to court-martial I would be tried and shot. I am criticizing the law under which an un-American system is allowed to be maintained and injustices practiced on the young men of the Army.

Why should Mr. Taft object to a civil tribunal to hear appeals in such cases? We see from Gen. Crowder's own statement he was afraid not to put up a united front for the execution of these boys. Why afraid, if his conscience told him that he was doing the right thing? He was afraid that those in authority who were above him would relieve him of his job. That is why he was afraid, Mr. President.

Why not have a civil tribunal composed of eminent lawyers, disassociated from the Army, not to undertake to control the Army, but so that when these young men are convicted in the field or elsewhere their cases may be brought up, and the question determined by these tribunals as to whether the sentence of conviction ought to stand, for irregularities or otherwise? Why not adopt the progressive system of France and even of Great Britain, if you please, and make the Judge Advocate General entirely independent of the Army, and have those who follow the camps around and attend these courts-martial civilian officers rather than military officers, responsible only to the Judge Advocate General? Great Britain has done it. Why not progressive America?

I may say here and now that unless some change is made in this system, America is going to have a pretty hard time to raise an army in another emergency, because not only those who have suffered under the injustices of courts-martial but those who have been present and who know of the injustices that have been practiced in the Army will insist that some change shall be made. That is the only purpose of the bill which I have introduced and which Mr. Taft condemns—to ameliorate the situation of these young men and bring about changes which will see to it that when a man is willing to offer up his life on the altar of his country and goes to the battle front he shall be treated just exactly as any man in civil life is treated under similar circumstances.

I apologize for having taken so much of the time of the Senate, but I wanted the Senate to know my views in answer to the statement that ex-President Taft has made.

BOSTON POLICE AND LABOR UNIONS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I wish briefly to refer to another article in the Post of this morning, and I preface it by the reminder that the recent riotous demonstration in Boston seems to have subsided, partly because of the mobilization of the State military forces, but largely because the president of the American Federation of Labor very properly requested it; thus demonstrating my assertion of last week that the affiliation of a police union with the Federation of Labor implied the assumption of obligations which were out of harmony with their requirements and their duty as peace officers. Mr. Gompers undoubtedly performed a public service in taking this course, but we can not be assured that his successor may follow his example. The important fact is that the little finger of Mr. Gompers, as president of a private association, has proved as thick as the loins of the Commonwealth, his request more effective than the command of the governor, for instantly his request was transmitted to the striking policemen they offered to return to work and resume their duties as peace officers. That offer was denied by the governor of the State, and properly so, for, as he aptly said, these peace officers were not strikers but deserters.

The police commissioner of the city of Boston, Mr. President, is appointed by the governor and responsible only to him. The mayor has no control over the police commissioner or the police department, except in the matter of salaries, in which he has concurrent responsibility with the commissioner. Therefore the riotous conditions which immediately succeeded the voluntary suspension of duty by the members of the police force necessarily required executive action, and that action up to this time has been prompt, efficient, and commendable. The governor of Massachusetts, an American-born citizen, measures up to the standard set by the mayor of Seattle, a naturalized citizen. It is to such men that we must look for the preservation of American institutions, and I commend their example to every lover of his country.

I think, Mr. President, it is eminently proper that the telegram of Gov. Coolidge to the president of the American Federation of Labor, published in full in the Washington Post of this morning, be honored by a place in the RECORD. I therefore ask unanimous consent for the privilege of inserting it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the Washington Post of Monday, Sept. 15, 1919.]

Replying to your telegram, I have already refused to remove the police commissioner of Boston. I did not appoint him. He can assume no position which the courts would uphold except what the people have by the authority of their law vested in him. He spoke only with their voice. The right of the police of Boston to affiliate has always been questioned, never granted, is now prohibited. The suggestion of President Wilson to Washington does not apply to Boston. There the police have remained on duty. Here the policemen's union left their duty, an action which President Wilson characterized as a crime against civilization.

Your assertion that the commissioner was wrong can not justify the wrong of leaving the city unguarded. That furnished the opportunity, the criminal element furnished the action. There is no right to strike against the public safety by anybody, anywhere, at any time.

You ask that the public safety again be placed in the hands of these same policemen, while they continue in disobedience to the laws of Massachusetts and in their refusal to obey the orders of the police department. Nineteen men have been tried and removed. Others, having abandoned their duty, their places have under the law been declared vacant on the opinion of the attorney general. I can suggest no authority outside the courts to take further action.

DETERMINED TO MAINTAIN AUTHORITY.

I wish to join and assist in taking a broad view of every situation. A grave responsibility rests on all of us. You can depend on us to support you in every legal action and sound policy. I am equally determined to defend the sovereignty of Massachusetts and to maintain the authority and jurisdiction over her public officers, where it has been placed by the constitution and laws of her people.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7478) to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON].

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] has just entered the Chamber, and therefore I will not state what I rose to say. The amendment of the Senator from Nevada is now before the Senate, and as he was out of the Chamber I was going to call attention to the fact, and speak upon the bill until the Senator could be sent for and could arrive; but as the Senator is now in the Chamber I will not say what I had intended to say.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, relative to the amendment now pending to the bill under consideration, I withdraw the amendment, so as not to interfere with the passage of the bill. I understand there is a very urgent necessity for this legislation.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I know that there is another Senator who is very much interested in this matter, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Chamberlain	Curtis	France
Bankhead	Colt	Dillingham	Frelinghuysen
Beckham	Culberson	Edge	Gay
Capper	Cummins	Fletcher	Gerry

Gronna	McCumber	Page	Sutherland
Hale	McKellar	Phelan	Swanson
Harris	McLean	Phipps	Thomas
Harrison	McNary	Pittman	Townsend
Henderson	Moses	Pomerene	Trammell
Johnson, S. Dak.	Nelson	Reed	Walsh, Mass.
Jones, N. Mex.	New	Sheppard	Walsh, Mont.
Jones, Wash.	Newberry	Smith, Ga.	Warren
Kendrick	Norris	Smith, Md.	Watson
Keyes	Nugent	Smoot	Williams
Lenroot	Overman	Spencer	Wolcott
Lodge	Owen	Sterling

Mr. GERRY. The senior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY], the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS], the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], and the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] are detained on official business. I wish also to announce that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is detained from the Senate on account of illness in his family.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The bill is as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, on examining the bill I find that there are certain insertions made in the existing law. On page 2 of the bill, after the words "That the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values," which is the present law, there are inserted the words "including drafts and bills of exchange secured by shipping documents conveying or securing title to goods shipped and including demand obligations when secured by documents covering commodities in actual process of shipment," which might be regarded as phrases merely explanatory of the existing law. Then there follows a further insertion:

> And also including bankers' acceptances of the kinds described in section 13 of the Federal reserve act.

The insertion of this latter clause will make, I think, a substantive change in the existing statute because section 13 of the Federal reserve act put a limitation of 50 per cent of the capital and surplus on the amount of such bankers' acceptances, and if this language is inserted in the manner proposed, coupled with the language which follows on line 21, "shall not be considered as money borrowed within the meaning of this section," I think it will remove any limitation whatever on the extent of the acceptances that may be issued. In view of the fact that we have been extending credits very largely, and the cost of living is affected by the expansion of credit, I doubt the wisdom of leaving bankers' acceptances without limitation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I take it for granted we all understand that the last sentence of the paragraph just read by the Senator is inserted for the very purpose of doing away with the 50 per cent limitation. There is no purpose for those words other than that, and the Senator is perfectly correct in his construction.

Mr. OWEN. I will say to the Senator that he is of a directly contrary opinion to that of the chairman of the House Committee on Banking and Currency, and he agrees with my interpretation.

Mr. SMOOT. I agree with the Senator's interpretation.

Mr. OWEN. It depends, then, upon what the Senate wish to do about it, whether they wish to leave bankers' acceptances without any limit or whether they do not. I wanted the Senate to understand what is being done. I doubt, myself, the wisdom of leaving no limitation whatever upon these acceptances.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to say to the Senator that, since the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House reported to a number of Senators his idea of it, I have tried to construe it in the light in which he has construed it, but I can not read this provision in any other way than the Senator from Oklahoma has just construed it.

Mr. OWEN. I think that allowing acceptances to go up to the limit of the capital would be just as far as we ought to go; but to put no limitation whatever upon the sale of acceptances simply means to allow a banker who is not discreet or a banker who is willing to sell his profit without limit, and it might lead to some very serious embarrassment to our banking system. I do not think it is a wise thing to leave the sale of acceptances without any limit whatever. But if the Senate wants to do that, the power is in the hands of the Senate, and I must content myself with explaining what the meaning of it is.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, as I construe section 1 and section 2, if passed as they appear in the pending bill there will be no limitation on the amount of money that can be gotten out of a bank by discounting this paper, save and except that of the legal reserves which are required by the reserve act.

Mr. OWEN. I will say to the Senator that on the 24th of September, 1918, the act was modified so as to leave "the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values" and "the discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person, company, corporation, or firm negotiating the same" without limitation. I think it was a mistake to do it, too.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I realize that that change was made at that time, but if my attention was called to it I did not appreciate that there was no limitation upon the amount of paper that could be discounted, and I think it is high time that we place a limitation upon it.

Mr. OWEN. The change actually made in the existing statute is by inserting the words I have just read, "including drafts and bills of exchange secured by shipping documents conveying or securing title to goods shipped, and including demand obligations when secured by documents covering commodities in actual process of shipment," which might be regarded as merely explanatory of the preceding terms. This section puts no limitation at all upon acceptances. I think there ought to be a limitation upon acceptances.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I think, with all due respect, the language that is used is even more than an explanation, because if the Federal Reserve Board had been perfectly clear in their own minds that the "drafts and bills of exchange secured by shipping documents conveying or securing title to goods shipped and including demand obligations when secured by documents covering commodities in the actual process of shipment" were included in the phrase "bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values" there would have been no occasion for adding those words; and they have broadened the scope of paragraph 1 as it appeared in the bill, in my judgment.

Mr. OWEN. It does broaden it to the extent that the phrase is used—"including drafts and bills of exchange." The first language was "the discount of bills and exchange." This latter reads "including drafts and bills of exchange" without expressly saying "discounts"; but I assume that the discount refers to drafts and bills of exchange secured by shipping documents.

I wanted expressly to call attention to what section 13 of the existing law really means. Section 13 provides a 50 per cent limitation, at least, on bankers' acceptances. This eliminates it and leaves no limitation whatever on bankers' acceptances. I thought it would be advisable to insert after "described," in line 7, the words "and to the extent of the issue fixed in section 13 of the Federal reserve act." I make a motion to that effect.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I will not object to that amendment. I am assured by the chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House that his construction of the law is that without the amendment it would have that meaning. The amendment certainly clarifies it. I am doubtful as to the meaning without the amendment and I will not resist the amendment.

Mr. POMERENE. If I may ask the Senator from Oklahoma a question, Mr. President, after the amendment which has just been offered by the Senator from Oklahoma is adopted, if it shall be adopted, what limitation will there be upon the amount of money that can be secured from a given bank?

Mr. OWEN. As far as acceptances are concerned, it will be limited to 50 per cent. As far as these other items are concerned there is no limitation on it.

Mr. POMERENE. So that you can get 50 per cent of a bank's money by discounting bankers' acceptances, which perhaps would be the best class of paper that you could have, and then, when it comes to paper which is secured by a commodity, there will be no limitation upon it?

Mr. OWEN. That is undoubtedly the meaning of it.

Mr. POMERENE. Then let me ask the Senator further, Does he think it wise that there shall be a limitation of 50 per cent upon the very highest class of paper that can be had, namely, the discount of bankers' acceptances, and no limitation on the other paper?

Mr. OWEN. I think, if the actually existing values are in existence, it comprises a very high class of securities.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator allow me further to state that in the one case it is bills payable in the future, and in the other case it is a sight draft, which is immediately cashed, and fairly represents a transfer from the bank where it is drawn to the bank at the place of the drawee?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me further, that all means simply that if there is no shrinkage in the value of the goods against which the draft is drawn then the Senator from Georgia is right in his conclusion; but if there is a shrinkage, then there will be a liability. I think the mistake that is being made here is, that we are in effect saying that if a man borrows money at a bank and gives his note for it, that is a loan; but if he takes a draft, indorses it, discounts it, and is paid in full, then it is not a loan; it is an exchange. But if there is a shrinkage of 50 per cent, let us say by way of illustration, in the value of the goods against which the draft is drawn, or if the draft turns out to be a forgery, then it is in fact a loan, and there is where the risk comes when there is no limitation.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me suggest to the Senator from Oklahoma that I think that can be corrected by just three words in the way of an amendment. After the word "described" on line 7, page 2, insert the words "and as limited by secton 13 of the Federal reserve act."

Mr. OWEN. That is the substance of my amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. It seems to me that just that small amendment meets the difficulty.

Mr. OWEN. The language of my amendment "to the extent of the issue fixed" covers it.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the amendment should be "and as limited by section 13 of the Federal reserve act."

Mr. OWEN. "As limited and issued" would relieve it of ambiguity.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it would be very much clearer to have it read "and as limited by section 13."

Mr. OWEN. There are two limitations; one is of issue and the other is not of issue, and I do not want to leave it ambiguous.

Mr. SMOOT. What was the Senator's suggestion?

Mr. OWEN. "Limited as of issue," or "of the limited issue," any words that will describe the limit of issue.

Mr. SMOOT. In either way it is limited by section 13 of the Federal reserve act. Whatever limitations there are are covered by it. I would just as soon have the wording of the Senator, if he will offer that amendment.

Mr. OWEN. I offered an amendment, in line 7, page 2, after the word "described," to insert "and to the extent of the issue fixed," so as to read, "and also including bankers' acceptances of the kinds described and to the extent of the issue fixed in section 13 of the Federal reserve act."

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I am going to answer the Senator from Ohio in a moment if I can dispose of this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 7, after the word "described," insert the words "and to the extent of the issue fixed."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OWEN. Answering the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] with regard to the language used, "including drafts and bills of exchange," of course that does not impose any limitation upon it. The difference between that language and the language used in section 3 is the difference between lending on warehouse receipts of goods that may undergo serious depreciation and lending on a draft secured by commodities that have been sold to a purchaser. That draft has behind it the credit of the seller, the credit of the buyer, the bank that indorses it, and the commodity, too. It is limited to a number of days, 90 days, or some such matter. So in order to have it fail the commodity must prove to be utterly worthless at that time, the purchaser must fail, and the bank must fail, which is highly incredible and under the law of averages would not really be a very serious danger to be contemplated.

In the case of the language used in lines 11 to 17, which are in the existing law, I will say to the Senator that the words there deal with warehouse receipts, and so forth, and provided for a limitation of 25 per cent, and I think that limitation is absolutely necessary.

I am admonished that 2 o'clock has so nearly arrived that the bill may be interfered with unless I yield the floor, which I do.

OPEN EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business as in open session.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Before the motion is put I wish to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he will not permit us to have a vote on this bill now without further debate?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I think the motion is not debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business in open session.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH AUSTRIA (S. DOC. NO. 92).

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, before I call up the treaty of peace with Germany I have in my hand a copy of the peace treaty with Austria, which I owe to the kindness of the Chicago Tribune. It was sent on September 2 with the letter of transmittal to the Austrian delegation, with a notice in the letter that they must take it as presented, and five days were given them in which to sign. Owing to the absence of Dr. Renner the treaty was not signed until the 10th. But this is the text which was sent and which was signed without change. I think it will be useful to the Senate to have it here for consideration or examination while the treaty of peace with Germany is before us.

I shall ask to have it read, so that it may go into the RECORD, but not now, because the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] has given notice of a speech on the treaty with Germany, and I wish to give way to him at once, but I send it to the desk and shall ask that it be read later. I also ask that it be printed as a Senate document. I also send to the desk the letter of transmittal, which is in print, and the answer of the allied and associated powers to the Austrian note of the 20th of July requesting certain modifications. That is also in print. I will ask that they be printed as a Senate document without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LODGE. When the Senator from New Mexico has concluded I shall ask for the reading of the Austrian treaty, which is in English, so that it may appear in the RECORD as well as a document.

On the suggestion of some Senators about me I will withhold the two letters of transmittal and the response to the Austrian note and have them translated.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that as soon as I can get recognition from the Chair after the close of the morning business to-morrow, Tuesday, I shall address the Senate on the league of nations.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, on July 10 the President of the United States submitted to the Senate for ratification the treaty of peace with Germany, and on that day it was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. On September 10—last Wednesday—a majority of the Foreign Relations Committee reported the treaty back to the Senate and recommended the adoption of a resolution ratifying the treaty with certain vital reservations and amendments. We are told by Mr. Will S. Hays, chairman of the Republican national committee, in a public interview, that—

> The committee reservations constitute the irreducible minimum of the requirements of a substantial majority of the Senators.

I hope this statement was not made by authority. The effect of the adoption of such reservations as those presented has heretofore been fully discussed in this Chamber. This treaty will fail. If we ever have a treaty with Germany, it will be a negotiated and not a victorious treaty. The United States will not participate in restoring and preserving peace and bringing order out of the world's chaos. It can not be that such results are desired. Is it possible that there is anything objectionable in this treaty of such transcendant importance as to justify its rejection? That is the question which the report of the majority of the committee presents to us for decision. Let me appeal for calm and unimpassioned consideration.

Mr. President, the chief reasons advanced for opposition to the covenant are founded upon the assumption that this covenant creates a superstate, superpower, or some superentity to which the sovereignty of the United States is to be surrendered.

On February 22 of this year the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], in discussing the covenant of the league of nations, uses the following language:

> The national state can no longer serve the cause of civilization, and therefore we must resort to the international state. That was disclosed by every line and paragraph of this instrument. It is a distinct announcement that we must internationalize and place the sovereign powers of this Government to make war and control our economic forces in an international tribunal.

On February 19 the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] said:

They want to set up over the world a government such as that which our fathers set up over the States of the American Union and subject our Nation to those powers which the Federal Government exercises over the States.

The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on February 28 said:

We are asked, therefore, in a large and important degree to substitute internationalism for nationalism and an international state for pure Americanism.

The Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] said:

The revised draft of the league of nations extends over every Government the scepter of an international sovereign.

The thing created in the original league still endures. It rises in the affairs of men as a vast structure, endowed with all the vital organs of an independent State.

On May 26 the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] used this language:

Now, it is proposed that we shall end by setting up a European, an Asiatic, an African tribunal, in which we shall be a minority stockholder and shall give to it the right to control the fate of America.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], in his speech March 1, says:

Cast up in your mind the colossal powers granted to the executive council, in which, be it always remembered, we are but one of nine participating powers; recall the far-reaching and vital covenants into which we shall enter as one of the high contracting parties, and hold in mind that we are to give up the power to say when we shall have war, when peace, what shall our Army number, how many vessels of war shall we have, how, when, where, and under what conditions shall our Army and Navy be used, when shall our treaties be binding, what shall our treatment of commerce be, how great shall our gift of funds to other powers, and therefore how great the tribute we shall pay. Consider all these and you can not but say that our sovereignty has in matters of national life and death been destroyed.

On August 1 my distinguished colleague, in a very able discussion of the covenant, said:

Measured by all the definitions of a government, the league, if constituted, is a government. The league articles themselves limit the sovereignty of the various members joining the league exactly as the constitutional provisions limited directly the rights of the various States forming this Federal Union in the matter of making treaties, of making war or declaring war, of interference with interstate commerce.

I have read these excerpts for the purpose of getting before us the views which these distinguished Senators would impress upon the citizens of our country, and also the very broad way in which they have been expressed. It may be said also that in every speech which has been made against this covenant some apprehension has been expressed either directly or by inference that somehow the United States may be subjected to foreign control. If these views are to be accepted as a reasonable construction of the covenant of the league of nations as embodied in this treaty with Germany, it would not meet with the approval of any American. I feel sure that the American people are not willing to join in the creation of an independent supergovernment which shall dictate the policies, either domestic or foreign, of the United States. We are not willing that any superentity shall draft our armies and direct their movements in foreign combat. We are not willing to engage in the disputes and turmoils of other countries at the behest of a foreign directing force. We are not willing that any other power shall tell us what taxes we shall levy or what troops and munitions should be furnished in the prosecution of foreign wars. Nor are we willing to surrender the governmental institutions which we have builded, surrender our nationalism, or declare allegiance to any foreign authority bearing the insignia of an international government. On these questions we are all of one mind, and any proposal which should run counter to them would meet with instant and universal condemnation. But it is said that this proposed covenant of the league of nations, if carried into effect, would do each and all of these things. Can this be true?

I have given to this covenant of the league of nations careful and analytical consideration, and while I do not pretend any superior wisdom, and with due deference to all those who have reached a different conclusion, I fail to find anything in this covenant of the league of nations which even tends to justify these invectives which have been directed against it. I can understand how the wisdom of some of the provisions of this covenant may be drawn in question, but there should be no difference of opinion as to the creation of a supergovernment to which we shall surrender our sovereignty. The time may come bringing such mutations as will warrant the creation of a superentity supported by such forces as will enable it to direct and command the peace of the world, but in my judgment the time has not yet arrived.

At the threshold of our examination of this covenant of the league of nations we should not forget that it was framed for the most part by the five great nations which were associated in the prosecution of the dreadful conflict with Germany, and its terms have been accepted by the representatives of 26 other Governments. It must not be forgotten that whatever restrictions under this covenant are imposed upon the United States are also imposed upon all the other nations signatory to the treaty. Therefore we should hesitate before concluding that the representatives of all those nations would bring upon their Governments and their fellow countrymen all the calamitous results which it is said our representatives would impose upon us. The document in question is presented to us in the English language, and the combined wisdom of the Senate should be able to reach no uncertain conclusion concerning this momentous question which overshadows all other phases of this covenant. Let us, therefore, lay aside all prejudice, whether personal or political, take up this instrument by its four corners, and reach a clear and definite conclusion beyond a reasonable doubt as to whether or not a supergovernment is created to which we are to surrender our sovereignty.

The instrument is entitled "The covenant of the league of nations," and these words in some measure constitute an index to the ideas which are expressed in the various articles. The word "covenant" properly implies a written instrument containing the terms of an agreement solemnly arrived at.

The word "league" is defined as "a combination of different associations or bodies of persons for the promotion of common purposes." In discussions various plans under that general name have been suggested, but there is nothing in the word as used in this instrument which implies anything more than a "combination for the promotion of common purposes." Moreover, the purposes of the covenant are clearly expressed in the preamble, which declares that "the high contracting parties, in order to promote international cooperation and to achieve international peace and security, by the acceptance of obligations not to resort to war; by the prescription of open, just, and honorable relations between nations; by the firm establishment of the understandings of international law as the actual rule of conduct among governments; and by the maintenance of justice and a scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations in the dealings of organized peoples with one another, agree to this covenant of the league of nations." Clearly, there is nothing in this declared purpose of the covenant which bears any thought of the creation of a supergovernment.

The further examination of the question will be simplified by a consideration only of those provisions which affect the members of the league. We may safely lay aside all consideration of those provisions which involve the German colonies or other peoples incapable of sustaining self-government, as only those provisions which relate to members of the league can affect the sovereignty of the United States.

Article 2 of the covenant provides that "the action of the league under this covenant shall be effected through the instrumentality of an assembly and of a council, with a permanent secretariat." It is evident, therefore, that if any superdirecting force has been created the necessary attributes or powers have been vested in or conferred upon the assembly, the council, or the secretariat. No claim has been made that the secretariat has authority to perform any duties other than ministerial, and if any attributes of government are conferred we must find them among the duties and powers of either the assembly or the council, or both of them acting in concert.

Under article 3 the assembly shall consist of representatives of the members of the league. This language is significant and important.

A representative is an agent, deputy or substitute, who supplies the place of another being invested with his authority. In the case we are considering our representative in the assembly would act as the agent or substitute of the United States and be invested with its authority. His acts would be the acts of the United States. His powers would be limited to the scope of the authority conferred. Being only an agent, deputy, or substitute, there would be no presumption that he possessed any power or authority to direct or command the Government which appointed him. The words themselves imply the converse. The presumption is that the agent is at all times subject to and under the direction and control of his principal, and this presumption must prevail unless clear proof to the contrary is presented. He who contends that the representatives of which the assembly consists are clothed with authority to direct or command the nations which appoint them must furnish the proof. No intendments to that effect will be indulged. The same observations apply to the council. Article 4 provides that—

The council shall consist of representatives of the principal allied and associated powers, together with representatives of four other members of the league.

So far as these representatives are concerned this covenant is only a power of attorney.

With this rule of construction established, let us examine the authority conferred upon the assembly and the council. First let us consider the authority which is conferred in general or broad terms.

In article 3 it is stated:

The assembly may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the league or affecting the peace of the world.

In article 4 the identical language is used with respect to the council. This language has been seized upon as conferring unlimited jurisdiction not only to consider any matters affecting the peace of the world, but also as conferring authority to direct and command the nations which brought these assemblages into being. In this connection also should be considered article 11, which is as follows:

Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the members of the league or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole league, and the league shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations. In case any such emergency should arise the secretary general shall on the request of any member of the league forthwith summon a meeting of the council.

It is also declared to be the friendly right of each member of the league to bring to the attention of the assembly or of the council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens to disturb international peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends.

Contention has frequently been made that under these articles the assembly or the council is invested with authority to consider any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threaten to disturb international peace or the good understanding of nations upon which peace depends, and in addition thereto, according to some Senators, either the assembly or council is thereby clothed with power to direct the member nations as to what they shall do with respect thereto. The language used is, of course, broad and comprehensive. Language, however, is not to be interpreted solely by definition of the words used. It must be considered in relation to the subject matter under consideration. Authority to deal with any matter affecting the peace of the world may accomplish very different results, depending upon the persons or bodies on which the authority is conferred. An ordinary debating society is usually clothed with authority to "deal with any matter affecting the peace of the world," and it frequently does, but it does not dictate to nations. Quite a different notion would be conveyed if unlimited authority were conferred upon Gen. Foch, at the command of a fully equipped army of 10,000,000 men, to deal with any matter affecting the peace of the world.

Further illustrations are unnecessary, and the meaning of this general language used in the covenant should not be confusing when we consider the declared purpose for which the league is organized, the membership of the assembly and council, the means at their command, and the duties specifically assigned. Neither the assembly nor the council is provided with an army, with any munitions of war, or the power through taxation or otherwise to raise the funds necessary to equip or maintain an army. At their command is neither sheriff nor policeman, and no means is provided whereby they can be obtained. So far as these bodies are concerned the idea of force must be eliminated, and no government can function without force, actually at hand or accessible.

While these clauses do not confer any directing authority necessary to a supergovernment, these bodies under this language may, as will be pointed out later, perform a very great service in securing the peace of the world.

Parenthetically, I may say it has been argued with much force that the provisions of articles 3 and 4, to which I have referred, relate only to the order of business at meetings of the assembly and the council. Such is probably the correct construction to put upon them; but for the purpose of this discussion I have been willing to give to them the effect of conferring jurisdiction in the broadest language so as to meet on common ground the argument of those who contend that the covenant creates a supergovernment.

Let us now examine the remaining covenants of the league and ascertain, if we can, whether or not any specific authority has been conferred upon either the assembly or the council to exercise any of the functions of government. This examination will fortify the conclusion just reached as to the interpretation of the broad powers, as general language in a power of attorney is always to be construed in the light of the specific authority conferred.

Under article 4 the assembly is authorized, in concurrence with the council, to name additional members of the league whose representatives shall be members of the council, and with like concurrence increase the number of representatives on the council.

Under article 15 disputes which are not composed through arbitration may be referred to the assembly. In such case the assembly will endeavor to effect a settlement, and if its efforts are successful it shall make a public statement of the facts and terms of settlement. If the dispute is not thus settled, the assembly either unanimously or by a majority vote shall make and publish a report containing a statement of the facts of the dispute and the recommendations which are deemed just and proper in regard thereto.

Under article 19 it is provided that the assembly may from time to time advise the reconsideration by members of the league of treaties which have become inapplicable and the consideration of international conditions whose continuance might endanger the peace of the world.

What has been said is a full presentation of every power conferred or duty imposed upon the assembly, and I submit without further argument that no reasonable mind can entertain the thought that the assembly when organized can or will perform any supergovernmental act or function.

Let us now consider the specific authority of the council. Article 8 of the covenant contains the provisions relating to the reduction of national armaments, and in this connection it is provided that—the council, taking account of the geographical situation and circumstances of each State, shall formulate plans for such reduction for the consideration and action of the several governments.

Such plans shall be subject to reconsideration and revision at least every 10 years.

After these plans shall have been adopted by the several governments the limits of armaments therein fixed shall not be exceeded without the concurrence of the council.

The members of the league agree that the manufacture by private enterprise of munitions and implements of war is open to grave objections. The council shall advise how the evil effects attendant upon such manufacture can be prevented.

The duties of the council in this respect are both simple and plain. The ambassadors or representatives of the nine governments composing the council would consider the subject matter. No plan could be adopted without the concurrence of the American ambassador, and such plan when formulated does not go into effect until adopted by the several governments. After the plan has once been adopted, according to the agreement of the members of the league the governments will not increase their armaments unless their respective ambassadors in joint session shall unanimously agree respecting such increase. There is no hint here of any supercontrol of the United States.

Article 10 provides that—the member of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

There has been much discussion of the effect of this article, but the function which the council shall perform is so clear that discussion can not distort it. Here, again, the ambassadors of the respective governments composing the council meet for the purpose of considering a problem affecting the peace of the world, and if it is wise that it should be dealt with at all, it seems to me no better plan could be suggested than to have the ambassadors of each of the leading nations of the world meet in common council for the purpose of devising a plan which shall meet the emergency. After such plan shall have been formulated these representatives submit the plan to their respective governments for action. In actual practice I have no doubt that in the case of the United States any such plan so submitted would be adopted and acted upon. Our representative would be under the control and direction of our Government, delegated to perform a specific duty, which he would perform in accordance with the sentiment and desires of our Government. After having performed his duty, it would then be incumbent upon our Government to consider the plan thus recommended, and, if found satisfactory, to adopt it.

Much has been said as to the advisability of entering into an agreement such as is contained in article 10, but nothing can be said as the result of logical analysis in support of the contention that the council in this respect is exercising any function of a supergovernment. Sophistical minds may prate about it and conjure various specters, but the common, everyday citizen will easily understand it and not be frightened by transparent ghosts.

Article 12 simply provides that any dispute between members of the league likely to lead to a rupture which is not submitted to arbitration shall be submitted to inquiry or investigation by the council, and in this connection it needs no further comment.

Article 13 provides for voluntary arbitration, and in the event of failure to carry out such an award the council shall propose what steps shall be taken to give effect thereto. Here we have a contingency which in all probability will never occur. No civilized nation has ever voluntarily agreed to submit a matter to arbitration and thereafter failed to perform the award, but if such an instance should occur this section provides that the council shall "propose" what steps should be taken to give effect to the award. Here, again, in practical operation, the representatives of the governments composing the council would meet in conference and advise their respective governments as to what steps should be taken, but there is no suggestion of authority for the council to direct or coerce the governments which are represented.

Article 14 provides that the council shall formulate and submit to the members of the league for adoption plans for the establishment of a permanent court of international justice. This article needs no comment.

Article 15 provides that—

If there should arise between members of the league any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, which is not submitted to arbitration, * * * the members of the league agree that they will submit the matter to the council. * * * The council shall endeavor to effect a settlement of the dispute, and if such efforts are successful a statement shall be made public giving such facts and explanations regarding the dispute and the terms of settlement thereof which the council may deem appropriate. If the dispute is not thus settled, the council either unanimously or by a majority vote shall make and publish a report containing a statement of the facts of the dispute and the recommendations which are deemed just and proper in regard thereto. * * * If the dispute between the parties is claimed by one of them and is found by the council to arise out of a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the council shall so report and shall make no recommendation as to its settlement. The council may in any case under this article refer the dispute to the assembly.

The portions of article 15 which I have just read contain everything regarding the authority possessed by the council or the duties imposed upon the council with respect to disputes between the members of the league which are not submitted to arbitration. Here we find that from the action of the council there can result only a statement of facts and explanations regarding the dispute, and the terms of settlement which the council may deem appropriate. Attributes of government are not found in statements of facts or in recommendations.

Article 16 deals with the question of a member of the league resorting to war in disregard of its covenants, and it is provided that it shall be the duty of the council in such cases to recommend to the several Governments concerned what effective military, naval, or air force the members of the league shall severally contribute to the armed forces to be used to protect the covenants of the league. Again, the only authority conferred upon the council is to recommend to the several Governments what military operations should be undertaken by the Governments. It is further provided in this article that any member of the league which has violated any covenant of the league shall be declared to be no longer a member of the league by a vote of the council concurred in by the representatives of all the other members of the league represented thereon.

Article 17 is as follows:

In the event of a dispute between a member of the league, or between States not members of the league, the State or States not members of the league shall be invited to accept the obligations of membership in the league for the purposes of such dispute, upon such conditions as the council may deem just. If such invitation is accepted, the provisions of articles 12 to 16, inclusive, shall be applied with such modifications as may be deemed necessary by the council.

Upon such invitation being given, the council shall immediately institute an inquiry into the circumstances of the dispute and recommend such action as may seem best and most effectual in the circumstances.

If a State so invited shall refuse to accept the obligations of membership in the league for the purposes of such dispute and shall resort to war against a member of the league, the provisions of article 16 shall be applicable as against the State taking such action.

If both parties to the dispute when so invited refuse to accept the obligations of membership in the league for the purposes of such dispute, the council may take such measures and make such recommendations as will prevent hostilities and will result in the settlement of the dispute.

I have now presented every clause of this covenant which has any relation to the authority or duties of the assembly or the council, or both of them combined, so far as they affect in any degree the Governments which are members of the league. I have brought these provisions together with but slight comment for the purpose of presenting in close review all the provisions of the covenant which are supposed to create a supergovernment to which any sovereignty of the United States might be surrendered. It will be observed that the assembly and council are only empowered by specific authority to effect settlements through negotiation and to "formulate plans," "make inquiry," "advise," "submit," "report," "propose," and "recommend."

These are certainly no distinguishing attributes of government. I submit this statement to the judgment of the Senate and of the country. I fail to find in these simple provisions any foundation for the impassioned oratory which would present to the public gaze the specter of an overreaching power destined to destroy American institutions and make vassals of American citizens. This is the time of all times when intellectual integrity should be maintained and when mere inflammatory utterances should be restrained.

Mr. President, some Senators and some publicists outside this Chamber do not boldly assert the creation of a supergovernment, but with insidious declamation poison the public mind.

The Senator from Massachusetts, the leader of the Republican Party, a few days ago in his phillipic denouncing the covenant of the league of nations was bold to say—

Grover Cleveland was a Democrat and Theodore Roosevelt was a Republican, but they were both Americans, and it is the American spirit which has carried this country always to victory, and which should govern us to-day, and not the international spirit which would in the name of peace hand the United States over bound hand and foot to obey the fiat of other powers.

Again, he said:

I have never had but one allegiance; I can not divide it now. I have loved but one flag, and I can not share that devotion and give affection to the mongrel banner invented for the league.

In a recent address at Santa Fe, N. Mex., Gen. Leonard Wood declared:

The armies of America are never going to any war without the approval of the American people, and never under the mandate of any foreign nation or group of nations.

Many other quotations of like import might be presented. I shall not characterize such utterances, and am content that the American people shall determine whether or not there is in this covenant any foundation which justifies such utterances. I have been unwilling to believe that any Senator would deliberately mislead public thought. I have endeavored by much mental effort to discover the processes which could lead to such declamations. One query to which I make no answer continually arises. Is there bias or prejudice unconscious or otherwise? To some natures the failure to secure for a constituent a desired Federal appointment would arouse such personal hostility toward the President that it would be impossible to look with favor upon any proposal emanating from the Chief Executive, and any peace document proposed by him would provoke instant and withering scorn. It may be that others convinced of their unequaled fitness to negotiate a peace treaty were unable to believe that any treaty of merit was possible unless they had had some participation in its construction. In such cases failure to receive an invitation to join in the peace negotiations might in advance have so affected the intellectual integrity as to preclude the probability of sympathetic consideration. It may be that others keenly sensed the partisan thought that the conclusion of a treaty contributing to the future peace of the world following a victorious war would give to the President's party an assured advantage in approaching political contests. Should the greatest undertaking of this or any other age end in an ignominious failure it may be there are others with presidential visions now dark who would be able to catch some flashes of meteoric light.

Preconceived notions might also contribute to an erroneous examination and conclusion. It is easy to see how the public mind might have conceived the notion that as a result of the negotiations at Paris there might be proposed the creation of an entity empowered to decide international questions and be provided with the means to enforce its decisions. Especially during the last few decades many plans have been formulated for securing the peace of the world. These plans varied in scope from the establishment of tribunals for the arbitration of questions voluntarily submitted to the organization of a world republic which should legislate concerning and administer international affairs. A world force consisting of both army and navy was frequently referred to even in casual common discussion. One of the most extensive and influential organizations was called a League to Enforce Peace. Many eminent citizens had advocated the establishment of some power so equipped as to enforce peace throughout the world. Theodore Roosevelt, at Christiania, in 1910, in a speech accepting the Nobel peace prize, advocated as follows:

It would be a master stroke if those great powers honestly bent on peace would form a league of peace not only to keep the peace among themselves but to prevent, by force if necessary, its being broken by others. The supreme difficulty in connection with developing the peace work of The Hague arises from the lack of any executive power, of any police power, to enforce the decrees of the courts.

The one permanent move for obtaining peace which has yet been suggested with any reasonable chance of attaining its object is by an agreement among the great powers in which each should pledge itself not only to abide by the decisions of a common tribunal but to back with force the decision of that common tribunal. The great civilized nations of the world which do possess force, actual or immediately potential, should combine by solemn agreement in a great world league for the peace of righteousness.

They should, furthermore, agree not only to abide, each of them, by the decision of the court but all of them to unite with their military forces to enforce the decree of the court as against any recalcitrant member. Under these circumstances it would be possible to agree on a limitation of armaments that would be real and effective.

In a speech delivered at Union College prior to the last presidential election the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] spoke as follows:

> What can we do in the larger sense toward securing and maintaining the peace of the world? This is a much more difficult question; but turn it back and forth as we may, there is no escape from the proposition that the peace of the world can only be maintained, as the peace and order of a single community are maintained, as the peace of a single nation is maintained, by the force which united nations are willing to put behind the peace and order of the world. Nations must unite as men unite in order to preserve peace and order. The great nations must be so united as to be able to say to any single country, "You must not go to war"; and they can only say that effectively when the country desiring war knows that the force which the united nations place behind peace is irresistible. We have done something in advancing the settlement by arbitration of many minor questions which in former times led to wars and reprisals, although the points of difference were essentially insignificant, but as human nature is at present constituted and the world is at present managed there are certain questions which no nations would submit voluntarily to the arbitration of any tribunal, and the attempt to bring such questions within the jurisdiction of an arbitral tribunal not only fails in its purpose but discredits arbitration and the treaties by which the impossible is attempted. In differences between individuals the decision of the court is final, because in the last resort the entire force of the community is behind the court decision. In differences between nations which go beyond the limited range of arbitrable questions peace can only be maintained by putting behind it the force of united nations determined to uphold it and to prevent war. No one is more conscious than I of the enormous difficulties which beset such a solution of such a scheme, but I am certain that it is in this direction alone that we can find hope for the maintenance of the world's peace and the avoidance of needless wars. Even if we could establish such a union of nations, there might be some wars which could not be avoided, but there are certainly many which might be prevented.
> It might be easily said that this idea, which is not a new one, is impracticable; but it is better than the idea that war can be stopped by language, by speech making, by vain agreements, which no one would carry out when the stress came, by denunciations of war and laudations of peace, in which all men agree, for these methods are not only impracticable but impossible and barren of all hope of real result. It may seem Utopian at this moment to suggest a union of civilized nations in order to put a controlling force behind the maintenance of peace and international order, but it is through the aspiration for perfection, through the search for Utopias, that the real advances have been made. At all events, it is along this path that we must travel if we are to attain in any measure to the end we all desire of peace upon earth. It is at least a great, a humane purpose to which, in these days of death and suffering, of misery, and sorrow among so large a portion of mankind, we might well dedicate ourselves. We must begin the work with the clear understanding that our efforts will fail if they are tainted with the thought of personal or political profit or with any idea of self-interest or self-glorification. We may not now succeed, but I believe that in the slow process of the years others who come after us will reach the goal. The effort and the sacrifice which we make will not be in vain when the end in sight is noble, when we are striving to help mankind and lift the heaviest of burdens from suffering humanity.

It is needless to say that the views so expressed do not harmonize with the more recent utterances of the Senator from Massachusetts, and no attempt has been made by the Senator to explain why he should have entertained such views prior to the last presidential election and why he has discarded them now. Undoubtedly those vigorous expressions impressed upon the public mind the idea that the creation of an international force might be expected.

While the negotiations at Paris were hardly commenced, through insidious propaganda, the idea was disseminated throughout the country that a United States of the World would be created and that Woodrow Wilson was ambitious to become its first President. It was generally understood that France and some other nations were insisting upon an international army and navy. Nearly every day, following what seemed to be a definite program, Senators reviewed in fantastic horror provisions which it was assumed had been agreed upon at Paris. At one time it was attempted to be demonstrated that under the organization evolved in Paris the world would be governed by kings. On another occasion Great Britain ruled the world. On still another occasion the United States and all white people were to be dominated by Negroes and other dark races. On still another day the Pope, under the proposed plan for the league of nations, was accorded the opportunity to assume the temporal government of the world. Certain newspaper organizations took up the hue and cry and daily sought to impress the public that all our cherished institutions were to be subjected to the domination of a superforce. A Republican publicity organization conducted a systematized campaign tending, if not intended, to create the notion that the league of nations in process of formation was to be a distinct entity apart and above all nations, and ruling over them, so that the very name "league of nations" should be brought into popular disfavor and disrepute.

In concluding this part of the discussion I wish to state, not in dogmatic fashion, but as the result of the analysis which has been presented that in the further examination of the provisions of this covenant we may definitely eliminate any notion of a supergoverning tribunal. Let us rather think of the assembly and the council as meetings at which the representatives or ambassadors of the several nations confer and counsel as to matters affecting the peace of the world for the purpose of making recommendations to their respective governments.

Mr. President, I shall not take up the time of the Senate to discuss in detail the duties and powers of the league with respect to the German colonies and those peoples who are incapable of sustaining self-government. The agency of the league with respect to those peoples is the council, and the council in handling those matters acts in the capacity of a joint commission established by the members of the league, and subject to the direction and control of the governments who are members of the league, and whose representatives comprise the council. It may be added that the United States under the provisions of the covenant will not become a mandatory for any people except by its own consent, and can not be called upon to perform any duties with respect thereto unless such duties meet with its full approval.

The constitutional questions which have been raised are very enticing to all of us whose chief labors have hitherto been devoted to the legal profession. I am convinced, however, that further discussion of these questions would serve no useful purpose. A number of able lawyers nationally recognized as such have discussed them exhaustively on the floor of the Senate. Notably among these are the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG]. These discussions by those two Senators in every respect were fortified by precedent and judicial authority. If exhaustive research, logical reasoning, precedent, and judicial authority can settle any question in the United States Senate, it seems to me that the conclusions of those distinguished Senators should be a finality. In my judgment it clearly appears that only one legal principle is involved. Can the treaty-making power obligate the United States in a given case where by the Constitution Congress is empowered to legislate? This constitutional question is involved in practically every treaty which the United States has made. A simple illustration will suffice. In our treaty with Spain, with which most of the present generation is familiar, the United States agreed to pay to Spain twenty millions of dollars. Under the Constitution the Congress as distinct from the treaty-making power is the only authorized authority to appropriate money from the Federal Treasury. Yet no one has ever contended that the treaty-making power was without authority to obligate the United States for the payment of that sum of money. If that act by the treaty-making power was constitutional and in conformity with the institutions and policies of our country, no reasonable question can be raised against any of the provisions of this covenant on the ground of constitutionality. In the early history of our Government the lower House of Congress on different occasions contended against this right of the treaty-making power, but in no instance has Congress failed to fully perform any obligation entered into by that governmental agency.

Much has been said about the limitations of the sovereignty of the United States. The word "limitations" as thus used may and probably does clearly convey the idea intended. By the covenant the United States agrees as to how it will act, or withhold action, in certain contingencies. These agreements may be limitations of sovereignty, but they can more properly be considered the result of the exercise of sovereignty. If by retaining complete sovereignty we mean that the Nation shall not agree to any restraints or to any methods of intercourse with other nations, then any nation retaining its sovereignty in an unlimited way has no place in the civilized world. Any individual who insists in being a law unto himself has no place in modern society.

I submit therefore that only two questions remain. Will the provisions of this covenant if carried into operation promote the peace and security of the nations of the world, and are the methods proposed advisable? These two questions may well be considered together.

It is contemplated that the membership of the assembly will consist of 45 Governments and each Government entitled to one vote, which shall be registered by not more than three representatives. There will be nine nations members of the council, each with one representative, and each casting one vote. The United States, England, France, Italy, and Japan shall always be members of the council. The other four members are to be selected by the assembly, and until such selection these four members will be Belgium, Greece, Spain, and Brazil.

The powers and duties of the agencies of the league will doubtless be made clearer if we consider them in the order in which they will probably be exercised. I presume that the appointment of the commissions authorized by the covenant will first be considered. By article 9 it is provided that a permanent commission shall be constituted to advise the council on the execution of the provisions of articles 1 and 8 and on military, naval, and air questions generally. Article 1 relates to membership in the league and article 8 to the reduction of armaments. Article 14 provides that the council shall formulate and submit to the members of the league for adoption plans for the establishment of a permanent court of international justice. The court shall be competent to hear and determine any dispute of an international character which the parties to the dispute submit to it. The court may also give an advisory opinion upon any dispute or question referred to it by the council or by the assembly. Article 22 provides that a permanent commission shall be constituted to receive and examine the annual reports of the mandatories and to advise the council on all matters relating to the observance of the mandates. I know of none who is in doubt as to the purpose for which these commissions are to be created, or who doubts the advisability of the creation of such commissions if the league is to become a reality.

Attention would naturally be next directed to the provisions of the covenant relating to existing treaties between the member nations. Article 20 provides for the abrogation of all treaties or understandings which are inconsistent with the terms of the covenant, and the members of the league undertake to procure their release from any obligations so in conflict. Article 18 provides that every treaty or international engagement entered into hereafter by any member of the league shall be forthwith registered with the secretariat, and shall as soon as possible be published by it, and that no such treaty or international engagement shall be binding until so registered. Article 19 provides that the assembly may from time to time advise the reconsideration by members of the league of treaties which have become inapplicable and the consideration of international conditions whose continuance might endanger the peace of the world. The purpose of these articles is undoubtedly to insure that international obligations shall be evidenced only by open covenants. Secret treaties common in the past are to end, and with their disappearance will also disappear some causes that have resulted in countless wars which have hitherto afflicted and decimated the human race. The assembly, it is true, has no directing authority, but through it the civilized nations of the world by their representatives will meet at stated intervals to consider the world welfare. If there was ever any virtue in The Hague conferences or the Pan American Union, there can be no doubt that this assembly will perform a tremendous world service. Whenever the nations of the world meet in common counsel and discuss before the world international obligations and welfare, it may be safe to assume that wars of aggression and conquest will, in all probability, be no more. We may reasonably expect that international laws, which now rest upon no secure foundation, will be codified and made certain. A spirit of fairness and fellowship will develop, and the nation will be bold indeed which shall undertake to run counter to or do any act against the world opinion established and voiced through the assembly. We may expect that in this assembly will congregate great intellects from all nations, and that any recommendations it may make regarding treaties or international law or other international relations will meet with general approval. The decisions of the assembly as to these matters must be by unanimous vote, and this fact will be pointed out as one destroying the efficiency of the assembly. No doubt many questions will be discussed and no decision thereon reached. However, discussion alone will tend to make clear vital points and establish the trend of world thought. The only other important function of the assembly is the consideration of disputes between nations, which may be referred to it through the council.

It was because of the probable exercise of these simple and innocent powers of the assembly that Senators, drawing upon their oratorical imagination, sought to frighten the country with dire predictions of the control of the world by kings, the colored races, by Great Britain, or the Pope. I feel safe in expressing it as my belief that our fellow countrymen may cast aside such fears and not be disturbed by these fancies which surpass all poetical license.

Let us now consider in the natural order of events the activities of the council. Article 8 provides for the reduction of armaments and the control of the manufacture of war munitions through plans to be devised by the council and adopted by all the members of the league.

If armaments are to be reduced and manufacture by private enterprise of munitions and implements of war is to be controlled, it is difficult to see what better plan for the accomplishment of such purposes could be devised than that here proposed. It is unreasonable to suppose that without some concerted action anything in this connection may be expected. So long as each nation must depend upon its own resources for its protection from other nations just so long will each nation strive to maintain as great an organization for military and naval purposes as it shall consider necessary to secure such self-protection. Some nations, of course, will be more warlike than others, and they will maintain military forces not only for such purpose, but to constitute a threat against less powerful nations so that aggressions and selfish ambitions may be realized. The history of the past teaches us that except for brief intervals there is somewhere in the world some nation striving for world supremacy and world domination. Judging the future by the past, no nation is safe in being wholly unprepared for war, nor could any nation be expected to begin the reduction of its own armaments until it could know what reductions would be made by other nations. The extent of the military forces which each nation necessarily maintains bears direct relation to the forces maintained by other nations. It must be accepted, therefore, that any reduction of armaments must be brought about through concerted action. It is reasonable to suppose that if the nine largest and most representative nations of the world through their ambassadors confer upon this subject, and come to an agreement, such plan so arrived at would be accepted by the nations of the world, if it is possible to bring about a reduction of armaments. Any plan devised by the members of the council is only advisory, and each Government must act for itself in adopting or rejecting the plan. The Governments would be induced to accept the plan, because the provisions in the covenant for common defense against external aggression would render large armies and navies unnecessary.

In the speeches in opposition to the league of nations many appeals have been made to the patriotism of American citizens by the claim that no foreign Governments should tell us what armies we should assemble or what ships we shall build. A mere reading of the article should be convincing that no such result is in contemplation under this article, and no such result contemplated by those who support this covenant. It must be remembered that even the plan which may be proposed must receive the affirmative consent of the representative of the United States. If there remains any thought that whatever the council may advise in this respect must be adopted, a remedy is easily found. The covenant of the league of nations does not specify how the representatives of the members of the league constituting the council shall be selected. There is no doubt but what in the United States legislation will be necessary. Doubtless the Congress will enact that the representative of the United States shall be appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate. In such legislation it would be feasible if thought necessary to provide that our representative should give assent to no plan which, prior thereto, had not been submitted either to the Senate or to the Congress for approval. In this manner the fears of the most skeptical can be satisfied.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It has also been suggested that any plan that might be devised would not go into effect until it was ratified; that is, our representative was authorized only to give qualified approval.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Undoubtedly many suggestions may be made how to handle that question. The point is that if anybody has any apprehension about it, there are ample means to protect themselves from any such fear.

With the disappearance of secret treaties and the reduction of armaments the council will turn its attention to the consideration and amicable settlement of disputes arising between nations which might lead to war. Hitherto a neutral nation has had no international right to make even friendly suggestions for the settlement of disputes between other nations, and generally speaking, whenever a neutral nation has so interposed its good offices, one of the parties to the dispute has resented the action. By article 11 any war or threat of war is declared a matter of concern to the league, and the league is given the right to take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations. Under this provision the members of the council would give due consideration to any question which might threaten the peace of the world. It can readily be imagined that the probabilities for good arising out of this provision are almost unlimited. It will be remembered that the action of the council in this respect must be by unanimous vote, and I respectfully submit that it is almost impossible to conceive that any nation contemplating an act which would result in war would practically commit national suicide by refusing to accept the suggestions and representations which would thus be made by the council, backed up as they would be by the prestige of the nations which comprise the council. Doubtless through this means many questions would be settled without first having been submitted either to arbitration or to inquiry, as further provided in the covenant. If, however, the dispute should persist, and the parties immediately concerned should not agree to arbitration, then it would be necessary for the council to enter into a formal and deliberate inquiry as to the causes of the dispute, with a view to making a public recommendation as to what should be done. It is provided in article 15 that in such instances—

The council shall endeavor to effect a settlement of the dispute, and if such efforts are successful, a statement shall be made public, giving such facts and explanations regarding the dispute and the terms of settlement thereof as the council may deem appropriate.

If the dispute is not thus settled, the council, either unanimously or by a majority vote, shall make and publish a report containing a statement of the facts of the dispute and the recommendations which are deemed just and proper in regard thereto.

Any member of the league represented on the council may make public a statement of the facts of the dispute and of its conclusions regarding the same.

Much speculation may be indulged in as to both the probabilities and improbabilities of the effectiveness of this provision. Such action may not settle all disputes, but it will invoke the conscientious consideration throughout the world of the facts in dispute. World discussion would follow, and in most cases public opinion would be clearly defined. This process may not prevent all wars, and some nations may be bold enough to defy world opinion as thus expressed, but I submit that it is unreasonable to suppose that any such contingency would probably arise, and that it is possible to conceive that by this means alone all future wars may be averted. In any event all will agree that much good can be done, and no harm can come from the undertaking.

Under article 17—

In the event of a dispute between a member of the league and a State which is not a member of the league, or between States not members of the league, the State or States not members of the league shall be invited to accept the obligations of membership in the league for the purposes of such dispute upon such conditions as the council may deem just.

If such an invitation is accepted, the provisions of the covenant with respect to arbitration and inquiry and the result which would follow the waging of war by members of the league without resorting to arbitration or inquiry would apply to such special members.

If both parties to the dispute when so invited refuse to accept the obligations of membership in the league for the purposes of such dispute, the council may take such measures and make such recommendations as will prevent hostilities and will result in the settlement of the dispute.

In any case arising under this provision the council in all probability would begin an independent inquiry as to the causes of the dispute and seek some method for bringing about an amicable adjustment. That such efforts would succeed I believe there can be no reasonable doubt. In the given case we would have the dispute between two nonmembers brought to the attention of representatives of the nine representative and most powerful nations of the earth. Recognizing the horrors of war, these nine representatives would without question give to the matter in dispute earnest and energetic consideration, supported by an unselfish desire to adjust in a fair and equitable manner the difficulties in question without hope of any gain except the peace of the world.

In the event, however, of the failure of the good offices of the council to effect a settlement, and the nonmembers should still maintain their hostile attitude, the members of the council would be authorized to submit to their respective Governments such measures as might be deemed necessary for the prevention of war. If the members of the council should agree that affirmative action by their respective Governments was necessary, and a plan of joint action were devised, it seems to me there can be no reasonable doubt but that such action would be taken as would result in the prevention of hostilities beween these nonmembers.

I confidently believe that with the treaty relations between member nations being made public, and armaments reduced according to a plan accepted by the members, a strong inducement would arise for the further reduction of armaments, and that world thought would be directed to peaceful ends. Such disputes as might arise would doubtless be adjusted through the provisions for arbitration or inquiry. But if the unexpected should happen and any nation should engage in external aggression against any member of the league, under article 10 it would be the duty of the council in this last resort to advise their respective Governments as to the means which should be employed to preserve the members of the league from such external aggression against the territorial integrity or political independence of the member of the league so threatened. It has been claimed for the provisions of this article that the United States would be compelled to go to war under the mandate of foreign power, and that Congress would have no voice in the declaration of war or in the extent of forces to be employed. It has even been contended that under the direction of the council the President of the United States would not only be warranted in using the armed forces in accordance with such mandates, but that it would be his duty so to do. I respectfully submit that no such interpretation should be placed upon the provisions of this article, but if there be any doubt about it, Congress would have the power and might be justified in providing that our representative upon the council should not give any advice or make any recommendation without first having submitted the same to Congress. It would be an extreme case indeed that would call for the application of this article, and the probability that any action under it would ever become necessary is exceedingly remote. The existence in the covenant, however, of this article will unquestionably exert a most wholesome influence. It will remain in the background, giving its support to the operation of the less drastic provisions of the covenant. It gives the world to understand that it is the desire of the signatories to this covenant that there shall be world peace; that disputes should be settled by peaceful means, but that in no contingency shall war be commenced against a member of the league for purposes of political conquest or the destruction of political independence.

We have now reviewed the methods proposed in accordance with which the assembly and the council, the agencies of the members of the league, are to act, and by which their actions are circumscribed. It may be that a better plan could be devised, but thus far it has not been suggested.

Mr. President, I trust it has been shown that the actions of the assembly and of the council in accordance with the powers conferred will constitute a very effective utility in the promotion of the peace of the world, notwithstanding the fact that they can only "confer," "consider," "advise," "propose," and "recommend." The covenant, however, does not rely exclusively upon these created agencies. The members of the league assume certain very broad and solemn obligations, and it seems to me that we are justified in bringing these obligations together for the purpose of a comprehensive view and the consideration of their efficiency in the promotion of the objects of the covenant. Here again I think it advisable to consider these obligations in the order in which they will probably be acted upon rather than in the order in which they appear in the covenant. Doubtless the first obligations to be carried into effect are the ones relating to treaties. Article 20 provides that—

The members of the league severally agree that this covenant is accepted as abrogating all obligations or understandings inter se which are inconsistent with the terms thereof, and solemnly undertake that they will not hereafter enter into any engagements inconsistent with the terms thereof.

In case any member of the league shall, before becoming a member of the league, have undertaken any obligations inconsistent with the terms of this covenant, it shall be the duty of such member to take immediate steps to procure its release from such obligations.

Article 18 provides that—

Every treaty or international engagement entered into hereafter by any member of the league shall be forthwith registered with the secretariat and shall as soon as possible be published by it. No such treaty or international engagement shall be binding until so registered.

Under article 8 it is provided—

The members of the league recognize that the maintenance of peace requires the reduction of national armaments to the lowest point consistent with national safety and the enforcement by common action of international obligations.

The members of the league agree that the manufacture by private enterprise of munitions and implements of war is open to grave objections. The council shall advise how the evil effects attendant upon such manufacture can be prevented, due regard being had to the necessities of those members of the league which are not able to manufacture the munitions and implements of war necessary for their safety.

The members of the league undertake to interchange full and frank information as to the scale of their armaments, their military, naval, and air programs and the condition of such of their industries as are adaptable to warlike purposes.

Article 12 provides that—

The members of the league agree that if there should arise between them any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, they will submit the matter either to arbitration or to inquiry by the council, and they agree in no case to resort to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report by the council.

Article 13 provides that—

The members of the league agree that whenever any dispute shall arise between them which they recognize to be suitable for submission to arbitration and which can not be satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, they will submit the whole subject matter to arbitration.

The members of the league agree that they will carry out in full good faith any award that may be rendered, and that they will not resort to war against a member of the league which complies therewith.

Under article 15 it is provided that—

If there should arise between members of the league any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, which is not submitted to arbitration in accordance with article 13, the members of the league agree that they will submit the matter to the council. Such dispute shall be referred at the request of either party to the assembly.

Article 16 provides that—

Should any member of the league resort to war in disregard of its covenants under articles 12, 13, or 15 it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other members of the league, which hereby undertake immediately to subject it to the severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking State, and the prevention of all financial, commercial, or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking State and the nationals of any other State, whether a member of the league or not.

The members of the league agree further that they will mutually support one another in the financial and economic measures which are taken under this article in order to minimize the loss and inconvenience resulting from the above measures, and that they will mutually support one another in resisting any special measures aimed at one of their number by the covenant-breaking State, and that they will take the necessary steps to afford passage through their territory to the forces of any of the members of the league which are cooperating to protect the covenants of the league.

Article 10 provides that—

The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league.

These provisions regarding open treaties and reduction of armaments will unquestionably remove many of the irritating causes which have heretofore led to disputes and ruptures, and if these two provisions alone were put in operation the number of wars would be greatly diminished. If, however, disputes should arise, peaceful means are provided for their settlement. Every inducement is offered for the settlement of disputes by diplomatic methods. The very fact that they agree to either submit their disputes to arbitration or inquiry would have a tendency to promote settlements through diplomacy. The result of a mere inquiry would be the submission of the ascertained facts to the court of world opinion, accompanied by a recommendation as to what the disputants should do. It would be an extreme case, indeed, which would cause any nation to resort to war against the unanimous opinion of the leading nations of the world. In any event, the nations agree not to go to war for three months after the facts are found, recommendations made, and publicity given thereto. This provides a cooling time during which any nation contemplating war contrary to public opinion would after calm deliberation make further efforts to settle the dispute by peaceful means. Such measures have long been advocated, and heretofore we have entered into treaties with no less than 20 nations which provide for the submission of all disputes either to arbitration or inquiry, and which obligate these countries not to go to war for one year after the submission to inquiry. As already stated, these are the methods provided for the friendly settlement of national disputes. The covenant, however, does not stop there.

Sections 16 and 10 provide for the necessary force in the background. Under section 16, if any member of the league should resort to war in disregard of its covenants, this would constitute an act of war. It would not, however, constitute a state of war or necessarily result in war by all the members of the league. If such an act of war be committed, the other members of the league agree to enforce the boycott which is provided. The fact that provision is made for this economic boycott through its deterring influences would prevent, in most cases, the occurrence of the causes which might lead to its enforcement. The provisions of article 10 would not be brought into operation until after the provisions for arbitration, inquiry, and economic pressure had been exhausted. It seems to me that no one will question the advisability of coercing in some manner any member of the league which should decline to submit a matter of dispute to either arbitration or inquiry. Refusal being a breach of its solemn obligations, would brand such nation as an outlaw among civilized peoples. It is almost inconceivable how the enforcement of the provisions of article 10 should ever become necessary. Under the terms of the covenant there can be no external aggression by any member of the league against another member until the provisions for arbitration and inquiry had failed and the economic pressure imposed, and the possible war must have for its purpose an attack upon the territorial integrity or political independence of the other nation. As to the wisdom of this article there seems to me to be no question. This is a declaration to the world that war for conquest shall end and that this declaration will be supported by the combined power of all the other members of the league. With such assurance all the members of the league, both small and large, would be relieved of the anxieties of the past and be warranted in devoting themselves to peaceful pursuits as never before in the history of the world. In my humble judgment, if this covenant is entered into, wars may possibly occur, but such occurrence will be exceedingly improbable.

Mr. President, let us now consider briefly the principal objections which have been urged against the covenant. It is contended that Congress should be free to consider on its merits any case which might arise for the reduction of armaments under article 8, or the enforcement of the provisions of article 10. In my judgment, by the plain terms of these articles the Congress would be free to act on the merits of any case which might be presented, but if it should be thought necessary to safeguard the rights of Congress in these respects it may easily be done by instructions to the representative of the United States in the council. No reservation is necessary to that end.

Objection is also made to that clause of article 15 which is as follows:

If the dispute between the parties is claimed by one of them, and is found by the council to arise out of a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the council shall so report, and shall make no recommendation as to its settlement.

It is admitted by all that it is not the intention of this covenant to bring purely domestic questions under the jurisdiction of the league; but it is said that the council should not be clothed with authority to decide what is a domestic question. It seems to be admitted that there is no probability that the council would ever assume jurisdiction over any question which the United States might consider a domestic question, as all the other nations members of the league would bind themselves by any ruling which might be established as against the United States; but there seems to be a determination on the part of some Senators to remove all possibility of such a decision and reserve to the United States the sole right in every instance to determine for itself whether or not the question presented is one wholly of domestic concern. If such right be reserved, not only as to the United States but as to all other members of the league, it is easy to conjecture that the whole scheme devised for the peace of the world could be rendered of no avail. In clear cases, such as questions affecting immigration, the tariff, coastwise trade, and so forth, any decision against us would be purely arbitrary, and if we can conceive that the membership of the council would act arbitrarily it is more reasonable to conceive that a single nation would, if it suited its purposes, resort to arbitrary action. All international questions in a sense are of domestic concern, and only one arbitrary step further is needed to claim that the question is one solely within the domestic jurisdiction. Let us weigh these consequences against the ills which we should have to bear in the event that the council should make a mistake and take jurisdiction of a question which was actually, according to international law, one solely of domestic jurisdiction. Let us take the most horrifying example, which has frequently been referred to, because it appears so obnoxious to the American people, that of Japan seeking to have her citizens given all the rights of alien immigrants in the United States. We will assume that Japan has presented her claim to the council, that the council has decided that the question of immigration is one within its jurisdiction, and that under the treaty existing between the United States and Japan the citizens of Japan have a right to enter the United States. Of course, it is inconceivable that such would ever occur; but let us assume that it does occur, and show how the provisions of the covenant would operate with respect thereto and see how far we would be injured by any of the requirements of this covenant. In this contingency the council, after having found that the Japanese had a right to emigrate to the United States, would recommend that the United States permit them so to do. Of course, the United States would not feel bound to comply with any such outrageous decision and would not comply.

The only penalty provided is our obligation not to go to war about it. The situation could be easily met and the difficulties overcome by means other than war. Such a recommendation of the council could only be made by reason of that provision in the treaty existing between the United States and Japan, which gives to the citizens of Japan all the rights of citizens of the most-favored nations; or, in other words, the rights of citizens of other countries, such as those of England or France. In the event of such a decision as this the Congress would not only be impelled to do so but would be justified in passing a law prohibiting immigration from all countries. Thus a means would readily be found which would settle this most serious of imaginable disputes, and without resort to war. I am unable to conceive of any controversy arising under this provision which could not be properly met without any necessity for hostile combat. But if a decision should be made against our contention which could not be circumvented, would it not be better to conclude that we were wrong rather than go to war about it? It must be remembered that no obligation would arise not to resort to war, in case the dispute was with Japan, unless there should be a unanimous decision and recommendation against us by England, France, Italy, Belgium, Greece, Spain, and Brazil, if the dispute were submitted for inquiry by the council. If we felt that those seven nations were so hostile to the United States that they would probably render an arbitrary decision against us, we would have the right to transfer the matter to the assembly. If the matter were presented to the assembly, there could be no recommendation against us without the unanimous vote of the seven nations mentioned and a majority of all the other members of the league. So the final recommendation against us before it would have any binding effect must have the unanimous vote of the 7 nations comprising the membership of the council and the affirmative vote of at least 20 other nations. It is inconceivable that any decision unless the question should be extremely doubtful would receive the affirmative support of this array of nations, and would we not conclude to find some means with which to meet the situation other than resort to war? If Japan should resort to war against us, we would not be obligated to refrain from making war against war and in our defense.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I am glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Is there anything in the covenant at that point by virtue of which Japan could call upon the other nations to help her under the circumstances to make war upon us?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Absolutely none, so far as I have been able to discover.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Is there any way provided in the league covenant under which that demand could be enforced against us?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Absolutely none.

But I submit we have no right to assume that the vast majority of the nations of the world are going to agree upon any decision which is purely arbitrary. Any such assumption would preclude the establishment of any international relation which would bring about concerted action regarding world conditions. No individual has a right to be a law unto himself, and no nation has a right under all circumstances to be a judge in its own case. Civilization means association, and if nations are to join in any plan looking toward peaceful intercourse each must be prepared to submit to enlightened and organized opinion of the civilized world. It is unthinkable that the American people want to perpetuate that old doctrine that each nation is privileged to take and hold what it can. That doctrine was the inspiration of Germany in the recent conflict, and it was because of our opposition to such doctrine that we sent our millions of men to Europe and expended our billions of treasure.

Objection is also urged that by this covenant we surrender the privilege of maintaining upon our own responsibility the traditional policy known as the Monroe doctrine. Article 21 provides:

> Nothing in this covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements, such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings like the Monroe doctrine, for securing the maintenance of peace.

No one has attempted to define the Monroe doctrine, but whatever it is, it is excluded from the jurisdiction of the league, and its validity specifically recognized. This statement is disputed, but I am willing to believe that the American people will accept what appears to be the plain and simple interpretation of this language. The Monroe doctrine is specifically named, and by no construction can any meaning be given to those words without reaching the conclusion that its validity is not to be affected. It is universally recognized that in the construction of a statute or an obligation each word should be given some meaning and effect, if it is possible to do so. Applying this rule to the article in question, unless the words "Monroe doctrine" as therein used are given the obvious effect, they have no meaning whatever.

The objections, however, go further. It is also insisted that the time might come when a question would arise as to whether or not a given case would fall within the Monroe doctrine. No jurisdiction is given to the council to define this doctrine. But it is said that a dispute might arise regarding some question which the United States would claim to fall within this doctrine, and in such controversy the council would be required to pass judgment upon it. This Monroe doctrine was promulgated about a century ago, and has been applied in several specific cases. In fact, concrete cases to which the doctrine has been applied have been sufficient, it seems to me, to establish in this practical way every essential element of the doctrine. Clearly, the principles involved in these concrete cases would be recognized by the provisions of this article as having a binding force in any decision of the council or assembly. If we assume, as we must, an honest decision, any fundamental principle materially affecting our interests would be recognized. Doubtful questions, of course, are conceivable, but I submit that they can not affect the vital interests of the United States. No illustration of any such doubtful, vital question has been presented. The primary purpose of this doctrine was to prevent European nations from so establishing themselves within the Western Hemisphere as to become a menace to the United States. I shall not consume the time of the Senate in discussing the language of the doctrine, or the cases which have arisen under it, but respectfully request that if any Senator has in mind any specific situation within the spirit of that doctrine which would vitally affect the security of the United States, and which does not fall within the clear language of the doctrine as announced by President Monroe, or the principles established in the application of that doctrine in our dealings with England, France, Spain, and Germany, it would be illuminating to have it presented. Thus far nothing of the kind has been done. If, however, some doubtful question should arise, would it not be far better for us to submit it for unanimous decision by England, France, Italy, Belgium, Greece, Spain, and Brazil, as members of the council, and a majority of the other members of the assembly, rather than to go to war about it? All that I have said in discussing jurisdiction of domestic questions applies with equal force here.

It is also objected that our right to withdraw from the league is dependent upon the will of other nations. The provision of article 1 in regard thereto is as follows:

> Any member of the league may, after two years' notice of its intention so to do, withdraw from the league, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under this covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal.

On August 19 President Wilson and the members of the Foreign Relations Committee met at the White House for the purpose of discussing the terms of the covenant. In a formal statement the President, in referring to this withdrawal provision, said:

> The right of any sovereign State to withdraw had been taken for granted, but no objection was made to making it explicit. Indeed, so soon as the views expressed at the White House conference were laid before the commission it was at once conceded that it was best not to leave the answer to so important a question to inference. No proposal was made to set up any tribunal to pass judgment upon the question whether a withdrawing nation had in fact fulfilled "all its international obligations and all its obligations under the covenant." It was recognized that that question must be left to be resolved by the conscience of the nation proposing to withdraw; and I must say that it did not seem to me worth while to propose that the article be made more explicit, because I knew that the United States would never itself propose to withdraw from the league if its conscience was not entirely clear as to the fulfillment of all its international obligations. It has never failed to fulfill them and never will.

Later, during the conference, the following colloquy ensued:

> Senator BORAH. Mr. President, if no one else desires to ask a question, I want, so far as I am individually concerned, to get a little clearer information with reference to the withdrawal clause in the league covenant. Who passes upon the question of the fulfillment of our international obligations, upon the question whether a nation has fulfilled its international obligations?
> The PRESIDENT. Nobody.
> Senator BORAH. Does the council have anything to say about it?
>
> The PRESIDENT. Nothing whatever.
> Senator BORAH. Then, if a country should give notice of withdrawal it would be the sole judge of whether or not it had fulfilled its international obligations—its covenants—to the league?
>
> The PRESIDENT. That is as I understand it. The only restraining influence would be the public opinion of the world.
> Senator BORAH. Precisely; but if the United States should conceive that it had fulfilled its obligations that question could not be referred to the council in any way, or the council could not be called into action.
> The PRESIDENT. No.
> Senator BORAH. Then, as I understand, when the notice is given the right to withdraw is unconditional?
>
> The PRESIDENT. Well, when the notice is given it is conditional on the faith of the conscience of the withdrawing nation at the close of the two-year period.
> Senator BORAH. Precisely; but it is unconditional, so far as the legal right or the moral right is concerned?
> The PRESIDENT. That is my interpretation.
> Senator BORAH. There is no moral obligation on the part of the United States to observe any suggestion made by the council?
> The PRESIDENT. Oh, no.
> Senator BORAH. With reference to withdrawing?
> The PRESIDENT. There might be a moral obligation if that suggestion had weight, Senator, but there is no other obligation.
> Senator BORAH. Any moral obligation which the United States would feel would be one arising from its own sense of obligation?
> The PRESIDENT. Oh, certainly.
> Senator BORAH. And not by reason of any suggestion by the council?
> The PRESIDENT. Certainly.
> Senator BORAH. Then the idea which has prevailed in some quarters that the council would pass upon such obligation is an erroneous one, from your standpoint?
> The PRESIDENT. Yes; entirely.
> Senator BORAH. And, as I understand, of course, you are expressing the view which was entertained by the commission which drew the league?
> The PRESIDENT. I am confident that that was the view. That view was not formulated, you understand, but I am confident that that was the view.

That interpretation by the President should be conclusive. It was published throughout the world on August 20, and not a suggestion against it has come from any authoritative source. It may well be accepted as having been concurred in by the representatives of all the other nations who participated in the preparation of the covenant.

It is also urged that we should obey the admonition of George Washington and not enter into any foreign alliances. This subject has been the theme of orators, and any reference thereto is a strong appeal to the sympathetic consideration of the American people. In my humble judgment, however, these orators do the memory of Washington a grievous wrong. The admonition left to us by him is generally recognized as having been both timely and wise. But Washington never said that this admonition should last for all time. He never said that conditions would not change. He never contended that there would never be such progress in civilization as to warrant the association of nations. On the other hand, if we consider his life and acts, we must be convinced that he recognized that changes would come. A notable illustration can be given by referring to the Constitution of the United States. That document is conceded to be the greatest instrument of national government ever devised at one time. George Washington was president of the convention which framed it. He had as his associates the recognized leaders of public thought from the several confederated States. To this instrument he devoted his best time and efforts, and in the work had the cooperation, advice, and assistance of the other members of the convention. If any time ever existed when an immutable law could or should be established, controlling the conduct of the United States, that was the time to prescribe it. But no thought was even suggested that it would be immutable, and so provision was made for its change by amendment. It is not conceivable that Washington thought our domestic affairs more subject to change than our foreign relations, and these changes have come. It has been asserted on the floor of the Senate by the Senator from Idaho that the situation now is precisely the same as it was in the days of Washington, and therefore his advice given more than a century ago should be followed. I shall not dwell upon the economic changes, the scientific changes, the financial and other changes which have taken place since that time, as they are known to even the casual readers of the country. The only similarity between the situation at the present time and that which existed at the time when Washington spoke lies in the mere fact that now we are at the conclusion of a war, and we were so then. I am sure that the views expressed by the Senator from Idaho are not entertained by any considerable number of his countrymen.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire to ask the Senator if he considers an agreement between all nations of the world to keep the peace, and not to resort to war, an alliance in any sense whatsoever?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I certainly do not; and I should take great pleasure in discussing this subject at greater length. The Senator from North Dakota understands, however, that in a general discussion of this kind we must stop somewhere. I should like very much to enter into the very inviting field which the inquiry of the Senator presents to us. There is no similarity between an alliance such as Washington had in mind and an association under this covenant of the league of nations.

It has also been suggested that we should not enter this league because we would be assuming large burdens and with no direct or material benefit. According to my notion, if such be the case, we would be justified in becoming a member of the league. To my mind the peace of the world means so much for mankind if this league only tended to bring about peace in Europe and would have no tendency to save the life of any American, I would still be willing to make even greater sacrifices for its accomplishment. The unselfish, the ideal, the altruistic motives which have inspired this league are sufficient inducements for all the sacrifices and effort which we will be called upon to make in carrying out its provisions. But if there are those who insist upon some direct and material benefit to the United States, they ought to be satisfied. Already the unsavory condition in Mexico has cost us much treasure and has taken the lives of hundreds of our fellow countrymen. I shall not discuss the details of that situation. They are known in a great measure to all of us. It is evident that the situation there is daily growing intolerable. The time is near at hand when order must be brought out of that national chaos. That nation prior to the revolution was in close contact with the rest of the civilized world. Citizens of the United States, Great Britain, France, and other nations had established themselves and had acquired interests there upon the invitation of that Government. The financial interests are still there, and also many of the citizens of these countries. The situation must be dealt with in the near future. It is true that we are powerful enough to deal with it alone, but it must be recognized that by reason of jealousy or other causes the good offices of the United States are not acceptable to the present régime in Mexico. It may also be recognized that this régime has its sympathizers in some other countries on the Western Hemisphere. It would seem, therefore, that if the settlement of that situation is to devolve upon the United States alone nothing but armed intervention will suffice. Such intervention, of course, means war. We could lay aside the thought of the financial burden as a thing inconsiderable, but we can not with coolness contemplate the sacrifice of American lives which would ensue. We do not want war with Mexico, but we do want Mexican lawlessness to cease. I submit that no greater agency can be conceived for the purpose of bringing about peace in Mexico without war than the establishment of this league of nations. With it established the Mexican situation would probably be brought to the attention of the council.

If this were done, and the processes authorized by this covenant employed, can there be a serious doubt that they would be effective? Any representation coming from the council as the spokesman for the United States, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, Belgium, Greece, Spain, and Brazil would be convincingly persuasive. The Mexican régime would instantly realize that it could no longer remain a menace to its neighbors and to civilization. Of course, I am not speaking for those American citizens, if any there be, who may be looking forward to the time when the United States shall enter with her Army into Mexico for the purpose of conquest, with resultant material benefits to themselves. But I do have in mind the untold satisfaction which would come to that vast majority of our men and women who want to look upon, deal with, and think of Mexico as a friendly neighbor. There are blood ties which bind many of our citizens to the citizens of Mexico, and we do not want these ties severed by the horrors of war. Doubtless some will suggest that we have the right, and that it is our exclusive privilege to deal with Mexico and take the situation into our own hands, by reason of the Monroe doctrine. I submit, however, that no such contention can be sustained either by the language of President Monroe or any precedent established under it. The United States has never assumed the right to supervise the conduct of nations on the Western Hemisphere. It has never assumed the responsibility of sponsor for their conduct. The United States has never guaranteed investments within their boundaries. And foreign nations, with respect to their citizens and their investments, have the same rights in Mexico as has the United States. The only thing which we insist upon is that the territorial integrity and political independence of Mexico shall not be jeopardized by foreign action.

If further selfish interest is desired to accrue from this league of nations it can be found in tremendous proportions. Our financial relation to the rest of the world has been completely changed by this war. Prior to the war we were indebted to foreign countries in the sum of about $5,000,000,000. To-day the rest of the world is indebted to the United States in the sum of $12,000,000,000. Prior to the war our annual foreign commerce, both exports and imports, were about $4,000,000,000. During the last fiscal year the exports alone amounted to more than seven and one-half billions of dollars. We are expending in the construction of a merchant marine more than $2,000,000,000. The future prosperity of this country depends upon this foreign commerce. We must have world peace; we must have stable conditions in all countries with which we deal. We need the products of other countries, and those countries need our products. Our personal comfort as well as our prosperity depend upon the relationship which we shall establish with foreign nations. Peace is a prime essential. Without it all else fails.

Mr. President, this treaty is before us for final action. The responsibility resting upon us has been equaled only by that which weighed so heavily when by our votes the United States of America dedicated her resources and the flower of her manhood to the preservation of democratic civilization. Resources measured in billions, the product of toil and sacrifice, found their way across the mighty Atlantic. In millions of homes mothers with deft fingers plied the needle and consecrated their handiwork with unwilling tears. Millions of American sons bade farewell to those most dear and offered lives full of hope and promise to the service of their country. Seventy-five thousand sleep the everlasting sleep beneath the sod of devastated France. Other thousands maimed in body or weakened in mind during future years will mingle with their fellows living reminders of sacrifices made in harkening to their country's call. One hundred times, yea, twice one hundred times 75,000 of other lands lie moldering in untimely graves. Millions of mothers, sisters, wives, and innocent prattling children have felt the increasing pangs of hunger and met the gruesome demands of starvation. We hear the voices of these hovering spirits calling. Do they call in vain? What words of comfort have we for loved ones left behind? Shall they face a future dark with impending clouds of other wars? Autocracies have disintegrated; Republics have been erected. Their peoples plead for existence. Are our hearts turned to stone? What shall our answers be? May God give us wisdom to decide aright is my prayer.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH AUSTRIA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the proposed treaty with Austria, on the request of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I desire to ask whether the Senator from Massachusetts requested unanimous consent for the reading of the treaty with Austria?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the Senator from Massachusetts did request unanimous consent for the reading of the treaty with Austria, and that it was granted.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I entered the Chamber while the Senator from Massachusetts was on his feet, and I did not hear the request.

Mr. LODGE. I made the request. I do not think it requires unanimous consent.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Massachusetts assured me, and assured the Senate, that to-day he would lay before the Senate for consideration the proposed treaty with Germany.

Mr. LODGE. It is now before the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, if he proposes to read an entirely different treaty, which, in my opinion and in the opinion of the country, will be considered nothing more nor less than the squandering of time, I suppose the Senator from Massachusetts is willing to take the responsibility for assuming such a position. But I could not believe it possible. I supposed that in good faith the Senator from Massachusetts proposed to bring into the Senate to-day the treaty with Germany, and proceed to have that treaty read; and to think that he is now to take the valuable time of the Senate, when the whole country is waiting for action upon the treaty with Germany, to read an entirely different treaty, which has not even been sent to the Senate by the President of the United States, was to me incredible. I could not consider that the Senator from Massachusetts would do a thing of that sort. To me it is nothing more nor less than trifling with the Senate. It is nothing more nor less than flying in the face of the public demand for action here, and I am amazed that the Senator from Massachusetts should take such a position. He knows that while the so-called treaty with Austria is being read here, it will not be listened to by a dozen Senators. He knows that if he wants to give it publicity he can attain that by having it printed in the RECORD, and to take up the time of the Senate for hours in reading a treaty that is not before the Senate, and can not come before the Senate for some time, and which must again be read to the Senate when it comes from the proper authority, seems to me such a useless proceeding——

Mr. WILLIAMS. He has already obtained unanimous consent to have it read.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am told that the Senator has already obtained unanimous consent. I relied upon the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts that at 2 o'clock he would call up the treaty with Germany.

Mr. LODGE. I did so.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I entered the Chamber a minute or two after 2 o'clock, and the Senator from Massachusetts was still on his feet, as I supposed presenting the treaty with Germany, and now I am told that in that minute and a half the Senator secured unanimous consent for squandering hours of the time of the Senate in reading something that has nothing to do with this treaty whatever. I appeal to the Senator from Massachusetts to withdraw the request and to simply have the treaty printed, if it has to be printed at public expense, and not take the time of the Senate when we are gathered here for business.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, of course I can not undertake to be responsible for all the suppositions of the Senator from Nebraska. I presented this Austrian treaty, and a number of Senators about me asked that it be read, and said that it ought to be read. Personally I am perfectly willing to have it printed in the RECORD without reading. It was my intention when I came in the Chamber just now to ask, if there was no objection, that it be printed without reading; but after the Senator made his genial remarks I have been very much inclined to insist on its being read. I do not care to have it read; I do not desire to take up time in reading it. It ought to go before the Senate, but I am perfectly willing to withdraw the request and let it go into the RECORD without reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I would like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts what copy of the treaty this is and whence it comes.

Mr. LODGE. I explained that this morning. It was a copy of the treaty brought out here by a correspondent of the Chicago Tribune. It is a copy that was sent to Austria with the note of transmittal saying that they must take the treaty just as it stood and sign it within five days. Owing to the absence of Dr. Renner, the time was extended to seven days, and it was signed on the 10th. I think it is a very interesting document in connection with the treaty with Germany.

Mr. WILLIAMS. After all, then, it is a newspaper report of the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. No; it is an original copy brought from Paris.

Mr. WILLIAMS. It is what purports to be an original copy as published in a newspaper.

Mr. LODGE. No; it was not published in a newspaper. This is the original text; one of the official copies.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I thought the Senator said it was published in the Chicago Tribune.

Mr. LODGE. They may have published it this morning; I do not know. What I presented was the official, certified copy with the accompanying letter.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Do you mean a copy of it or the official copy itself?

Mr. LODGE. No; I mean in the sense in which you say a copy of a book. It is one of the official prints, if that word is more exact, of the treaty with Austria.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, it may serve to illuminate the subject to state that the copy the Senator from Massachusetts has presented is exactly of the same character in typography and paper and in every external aspect as that copy of the treaty with Germany which the Senator from Massachusetts some weeks ago received, probably as a "receiver of stolen goods, and by bribery."

Mr. LODGE. Which turned out to be exact.

Mr. MOSES. Which did turn out to be exact, despite the assertions of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK].

Mr. LODGE. It turned out to be one of the copies, if I may use that word, one of the official prints, of the treaty with Germany. There are also two letters in French. The treaty is in English. I have not the least desire to delay the Senate unnecessarily. I was asked by many Senators to have it read, and I thought perhaps that was the only way Senators would ever read it, was by hearing the Secretary read it. I am perfectly willing to let it go into the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not certain, upon reflection, that unanimous consent was granted for its reading, although the Senator from Massachusetts did prefer the request. By unanimous consent, if there be no objection, the document referred to will be printed in the RECORD without reading.

Mr. LODGE. I also ask that it be printed as a document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was agreed to.

There being no objection, the treaty was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TREATY OF PEACE BETWEEN THE PRINCIPAL ALLIED AND ASSOCIATED POWERS AND AUSTRIA.

THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, THE BRITISH EMPIRE, FRANCE, ITALY and JAPAN,

These Powers being described in the present Treaty as the Principal Allied and Associated Powers;

BELGIUM, BOLIVIA, BRAZIL, CHINA, CUBA, ECUADOR, GREECE, GUATEMALA, HAITI, THE HEDJAZ, HONDURAS, LIBERIA, NICARAGUA, PANAMA, PERU, POLAND, PORTUGAL, ROUMANIA, THE SERB-CROAT-SLOVENE STATE, SIAM, CZECHO-SLOVAKIA and URUGUAY,

These Powers constituting, with the Principal Powers mentioned above, the Allied and Associated Powers, of the one part;

And AUSTRIA,

of the other part;

Whereas on the request of the former Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government an Armistice was granted to Austria-Hungary on November 3, 1918, by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers in order that a Treaty of Peace might be concluded, and

Whereas the Allied and Associated Powers are equally desirous that the war in which certain among them were successively involved, directly or indirectly, against Austria-Hungary, and which originated in the declaration of war against Serbia on

July 28, 1914, by the former Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government, and in the hostilities conducted by Germany in alliance with Austria-Hungary, should be replaced by a firm, just and durable Peace, and

Whereas the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy has now ceased to exist, and has been replaced in Austria by a republican government, and

Whereas the Principal Allied and Associated Powers have already recognized that the Czecho-Slovak State, in which are incorporated certain portions of the said Monarchy, is a free, independent and allied State, and

Whereas the said Powers have also recognized the union of certain portions of the said Monarchy with the territory of the Kingdom of Serbia as a free, independent and allied State, under the name of the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, and

Whereas it is necessary, while restoring peace, to regulate the situation which has arisen from the dissolution of the said Monarchy and the formation of the said States, and to establish the government of these countries on a firm foundation of justice and equity;

For this purpose the HIGH CONTRACTING PARTIES represented as follows:

THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, by:

The Honourable Frank Lyon POLK, Under Secretary of State;

The Honourable Henry WHITE, formerly Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States at Rome and Paris;

Mr. Charles RENNER, Chancellor of the Austrian Republic.
WHO, having communicated their full powers, found in good and due form, have AGREED AS FOLLOWS:

From the coming into force of the present Treaty the state of war will terminate.

Austria is recognized under the name of the "REPUBLIC OF AUSTRIA."

From that moment, and subject to the provisions of this Treaty, official relations will exist between the Allied and Associated Powers and the Republic of Austria.

PART I.

THE COVENANT OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

THE HIGH CONTRACTING PARTIES,

In order to promote international co-operation and to achieve international peace and security

by the acceptance of obligations not to resort to war,

by the prescription of open, just and honourable relations between nations,

by the firm establishment of the understandings of international law as the actual rule of conduct among Governments, and by the maintenance of justice and a scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations in the dealings of organised peoples with one another,

Agree to this Covenant of the League of Nations.

Article 1.

The original Members of the League of Nations shall be those of the Signatories which are named in the Annex to this Covenant and also such of those other States named in the Annex as shall accede without reservation to this Covenant. Such accession shall be effected by a Declaration deposited with the Secretariat within two months of the coming into force of the Covenant. Notice thereof shall be sent to all other Members of the League.

Any fully self-governing State, Dominion or Colony not named in the Annex may become a Member of the League if its admission is agreed to by two-thirds of the Assembly, provided that it shall give effective guarantees of its sincere intention to observe its international obligations, and shall accept such regulations as may be prescribed by the League in regard to its military, naval and air forces and armaments.

Any Member of the League may, after two years' notice of its intention so to do, withdraw from the League, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under this Covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal.

Article 2.

The action of the League under this Covenant shall be effected through the instrumentality of an Assembly and of a Council, with a permanent Secretariat.

Article 3.

The Assembly shall consist of Representatives of the Members of the League.

The Assembly shall meet at stated intervals and from time to time as occasion may require at the Seat of the League or at such other place as may be decided upon.

The Assembly may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the League or affecting the peace of the world.

At meetings of the Assembly each Member of the League shall have one vote, and may have not more than three Representatives.

Article 4.

The Council shall consist of Representatives of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, together with Representatives of four other Members of the League. These four Members of the League shall be selected by the Assembly from time to time in its discretion. Until the appointment of the Representatives of the four Members of the League first selected by the Assembly, Representatives of Belgium, Brazil, Spain and Greece shall be members of the Council.

With the approval of the majority of the Assembly, the Council may name additional Members of the League whose Representatives shall always be members of the Council; the Council with like approval may increase the number of Members of the League to be selected by the Assembly for representation on the Council.

The Council shall meet from time to time as occasion may require, and at least once a year, at the Seat of the League, or at such other place as may be decided upon.

The Council may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the League or affecting the peace of the world.

Any Member of the League not represented on the Council shall be invited to send a Representative to sit as a member at any meeting of the Council during the consideration of matters specially affecting the interests of that Member of the League.

At meetings of the Council, each Member of the League represented on the Council shall have one vote, and may have not more than one Representative.

Article 5.

Except where otherwise expressly provided in this Covenant or by the terms of the present Treaty, decisions at any meeting of the Assembly or of the Council shall require the agreement of all the Members of the League represented at the meeting.

All matters of procedure at meetings of the Assembly or of the Council, including the appointment of Committees to investigate particular matters, shall be regulated by the Assembly or by the Council and may be decided by a majority of the Members of the League represented at the meeting.

The first meeting of the Assembly and the first meeting of the Council shall be summoned by the President of the United States of America.

Article 6.

The permanent Secretariat shall be established at the Seat of the League. The Secretariat shall comprise a Secretary General and such secretaries and staff as may be required.

The first Secretary General shall be the person named in the Annex; thereafter the Secretary General shall be appointed by the Council with the approval of the majority of the Assembly.

The secretaries and staff of the Secretariat shall be appointed by the Secretary General with the approval of the Council.

The Secretary General shall act in that capacity at all meetings of the Assembly and of the Council.

The expenses of the Secretariat shall be borne by the Members of the League in accordance with the apportionment of the expenses of the International Bureau of the Universal Postal Union.

Article 7.

The Seat of the League is established at Geneva.

The Council may at any time decide that the Seat of the League shall be established elsewhere.

All positions under or in connection with the League, including the Secretariat, shall be open equally to men and women.

Representatives of the Members of the League and officials of the League when engaged on the business of the League shall enjoy diplomatic privileges and immunities.

The buildings and other property occupied by the League or its officials or by Representatives attending its meetings shall be inviolable.

Article 8.

The Members of the League recognise that the maintenance of peace requires the reduction of national armaments to the lowest point consistent with national safety and the enforcement by common action of international obligations.

The Council, taking account of the geographical situation and circumstances of each State, shall formulate plans for such reduction for the consideration and action of the several Governments.

Such plans shall be subject to reconsideration and revision at least every ten years.

After these plans shall have been adopted by the several Governments, the limits of armaments therein fixed shall not be exceeded without the concurrence of the Council.

The Members of the League agree that the manufacture by private enterprise of munitions and implements of war is open to grave objections. The Council shall advise how the evil effects attendant upon such manufacture can be prevented, due regard being had to the necessities of those Members of the League which are not able to manufacture the munitions and implements of war necessary for their safety.

The Members of the League undertake to interchange full and frank information as to the scale of their armaments, their military, naval and air programmes and the condition of such of their industries as are adaptable to war-like purposes.

Article 9.

A permanent Commission shall be constituted to advise the Council on the execution of the provisions of Articles 1 and 8 and on military, naval and air questions generally.

Article 10.

The Members of the League undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all Members of the League. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the Council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

Article 11.

Any war or threat of war, whether immediately affecting any of the Members of the League or not, is hereby declared a matter of concern to the whole League, and the League shall take any action that may be deemed wise and effectual to safeguard the peace of nations. In case any such emergency should arise the Secretary General shall on the request of any Member of the League forthwith summon a meeting of the Council.

It is also declared to be the friendly right of each Member of the League to bring to the attention of the Assembly or of the Council any circumstance whatever affecting international relations which threatens to disturb international peace or the good understanding between nations upon which peace depends.

Article 12.

The Members of the League agree that if there should arise between them any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, they will submit the matter either to arbitration or to inquiry by the Council, and they agree in no case to resort to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report by the Council.

In any case under this Article the award of the arbitrators shall be made within a reasonable time, and the report of the Council shall be made within six months after the submission of the dispute.

Article 13.

The Members of the League agree that whenever any dispute shall arise between them which they recognise to be suitable for submission to arbitration and which cannot be satisfactorily settled by diplomacy, they will submit the whole subject-matter to arbitration.

Disputes as to the interpretation of a treaty, as to any question of international law, as to the existence of any fact which if established would constitute a breach of any international obligation, or as to the extent and nature of the reparation to be made for any such breach, are declared to be among those which are generally suitable for submission to arbitration.

For the consideration of any such dispute the court of arbitration to which the case is referred shall be the court agreed on by the parties to the dispute or stipulated in any convention existing between them.

The Members of the League agree that they will carry out in full good faith any award that may be rendered, and that they will not resort to war against a Member of the League which complies therewith. In the event of any failure to carry out such an award, the Council shall propose what steps should be taken to give effect thereto.

Article 14.

The Council shall formulate and submit to the Members of the League for adoption plans for the establishment of a Permanent Court of International Justice. The Court shall be competent to hear and determine any dispute of an international character which the parties thereto submit to it. The Court may also give an advisory opinion upon any dispute or question referred to it by the Council or by the Assembly.

Article 15.

If there should arise between Members of the League any dispute likely to lead to a rupture, which is not submitted to arbitration in accordance with Article 13, the Members of the League agree that they will submit the matter to the Council. Any party to the dispute may effect such submission by giving notice of the existence of the dispute to the Secretary General, who will make all necessary arrangements for a full investigation and consideration thereof.

For this purpose the parties to the dispute will communicate to the Secretary General, as promptly as possible, statements of their case with all the relevant facts and papers, and the Council may forthwith direct the publication thereof.

The Council shall endeavour to effect a settlement of the dispute, and if such efforts are successful, a statement shall be made public giving such facts and explanations regarding the dispute and the terms of settlement thereof as the Council may deem appropriate.

If the dispute is not thus settled, the Council either unanimously or by a majority vote shall make and publish a report containing a statement of the facts of the dispute and the recommendations which are deemed just and proper in regard thereto.

Any Member of the League represented on the Council may make public a statement of the facts of the dispute and of its conclusions regarding the same.

If a report by the Council is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof other than the Representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the Members of the League agree that they will not go to war with any party to the dispute which complies with the recommendations of the report.

If the Council fails to reach a report which is unanimously agreed to by the members thereof, other than the Representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute, the Members of the League reserve to themselves the right to take such action as they shall consider necessary for the maintenance of right and justice.

If the dispute between the parties is claimed by one of them, and if found by the Council, to arise out of a matter which by international law is solely within the domestic jurisdiction of that party, the Council shall so report, and shall make no recommendation as to its settlement.

The Council may in any case under this Article refer the dispute to the Assembly. The dispute shall be so referred at the request of either party to the dispute, provided that such request be made within fourteen days after the submission of the dispute to the Council.

In any case referred to the Assembly, all the provisions of this Article and of Article 12 relating to the action and powers of the Council shall apply to the action and powers of the Assembly, provided that a report made by the Assembly, if concurred in by the Representatives of those Members of the League represented on the Council and of a majority of the other Members of the League, exclusive in each case of the Representatives of the parties to the dispute, shall have the same force as a report by the Council concurred in by all the members thereof other than the Representatives of one or more of the parties to the dispute.

Article 16.

Should any Member of the League resort to war in disregard of its covenants under Articles 12, 13 or 15, it shall ipso facto be deemed to have committed an act of war against all other Members of the League, which hereby undertake immediately to subject it to the severance of all trade or financial relations, the prohibition of all intercourse between their nationals and the nationals of the covenant-breaking State, and the prevention of all financial, commercial or personal intercourse between the nationals of the covenant-breaking State and the nationals of any other State, whether a Member of the League or not.

It shall be the duty of the Council in such case to recommend to the several Governments concerned what effective military, naval or air force the Members of the League shall severally contribute to the armed forces to be used to protect the covenants of the League.

The Members of the League agree, further, that they will mutually support one another in the financial and economic measures which are taken under this Article in order to minimise the loss and inconvenience resulting from the above measures, and that they will mutually support one another in resisting any special measures aimed at one of their number by the covenant-breaking State, and that they will take the necessary steps to afford passage through their territory to the forces of any of the Members of the League which are co-operating to protect the covenants of the League.

Any Member of the League which has violated any covenant of the League may be declared to be no longer a Member of the League by a vote of the Council concurred in by the Representatives of all the other Members of the League represented thereon.

Article 17.

In the event of a dispute between a Member of the League and a State which is not a Member of the League, or between States not Members of the League, the State or States not Members of the League shall be invited to accept the obligations of membership in the League for the purposes of such dispute, upon such conditions as the Council may deem just. If such invitation is accepted, the provisions of Articles 12 to 16 inclusive shall be applied with such modifications as may be deemed necessary by the Council.

Upon such invitation being given the Council shall immediately institute an inquiry into the circumstances of the dispute and recommend such action as may seem best and most effectual in the circumstances.

If a State so invited shall refuse to accept the obligations of membership in the League for the purposes of such dispute, and shall resort to war against a Member of the League, the provisions of Article 16 shall be applicable as against the State taking such action.

If both parties to the dispute when so invited refuse to accept the obligations of membership in the League for the purposes of such dispute, the Council may take such measures and make such recommendations as will prevent hostilities and will result in the settlement of the dispute.

Article 18.

Every treaty or international engagement entered into hereafter by any Member of the League shall be forthwith registered with the Secretariat and shall as soon as possible be published by it. No such treaty or international engagement shall be binding until so registered.

Article 19.

The Assembly may from time to time advise the reconsideration by Members of the League of treaties which have become inapplicable and the consideration of international conditions whose continuance might endanger the peace of the world.

Article 20.

The Members of the League severally agree that this Covenant is accepted as abrogating all obligations or understandings inter se which are inconsistent with the terms thereof, and solemnly undertake that they will not hereafter enter into any engagements inconsistent with the terms thereof.

In case any Member of the League shall, before becoming a Member of the League, have undertaken any obligations inconsistent with the terms of this Covenant, it shall be the duty of such Member to take immediate steps to procure its release from such obligations.

Article 21.

Nothing in this Covenant shall be deemed to affect the validity of international engagements, such as treaties of arbitration or regional understandings like the Monroe doctrine, for securing the maintenance of peace.

Article 22.

To those colonies and territories which as a consequence of the late war have ceased to be under the sovereignty of the States which formerly governed them and which are inhabited by peoples not yet able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world, there should be applied the principle that the well-being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilisation and that securities for the performance of this trust should be embodied in this Covenant.

The best method of giving practical effect to this principle is that the tutelage of such peoples should be entrusted to advanced nations who by reason of their resources, their experience or their geographical position can best undertake this responsibility, and who are willing to accept it, and that this tutelage should be exercised by them as Mandatories on behalf of the League.

The character of the mandate must differ according to the stage of the development of the people, the geographical situation of the territory, its economic conditions and other similar circumstances.

Certain communities formerly belonging to the Turkish Empire have reached a stage of development where their existence as independent nations can be provisionally recognised subject to the rendering of administrative advice and assistance by a Mandatory until such time as they are able to stand alone. The wishes of these communities must be a principal consideration in the selection of the Mandatory.

Other peoples, especially those of Central Africa, are at such a stage that the Mandatory must be responsible for the administration of the territory under conditions which will guarantee freedom of conscience and religion, subject only to the maintenance of public order and morals, the prohibition of abuses such as the slave trade, the arms traffic and the liquor traffic, and the prevention of the establishment of fortifications or military and naval bases and of military training of the natives for other than police purposes and the defence of territory, and will also secure equal opportunities for the trade and commerce of other Members of the League.

There are territories, such as South-West Africa and certain of the South Pacific Islands, which, owing to the sparseness of their population, or their small size, or their remoteness from the centers of civilisation, or their geographical contiguity to the territory of the Mandatory, and other circumstances, can be best administered under the laws of the Mandatory as integral portions of its territory, subject to the safeguards above mentioned in the interests of the indigenous population.

In every case of mandate, the Mandatory shall render to the Council an annual report in reference to the territory committed to its charge.

The degree of authority, control, or administration to be exercised by the Mandatory shall, if not previously agreed upon by the Members of the League, be explicitly defined in each case by the Council.

A permanent Commission shall be constituted to receive and examine the annual reports of the Mandatories and to advise the Council on all matters relating to the observance of the mandates.

Article 23.

Subject to and in accordance with the provisions of international conventions existing or hereafter to be agreed upon, the Members of the League:

(a) will endeavour to secure and maintain fair and humane conditions of labour for men, women, and children, both in their own countries and in all countries to which their commercial and industrial relations extend, and for that purpose will establish and maintain the necessary international organisations;

(b) undertake to secure just treatment of the native inhabitants of territories under their control;

(c) will entrust the League with the general supervision over the execution of agreements with regard to the traffic in women and children, and the traffic in opium and other dangerous drugs;

(d) will entrust the League with the general supervision of the trade in arms and ammunition with the countries in which the control of this traffic is necessary in the common interest;

(e) will make provision to secure and maintain freedom of communications and of transit and equitable treatment for the commerce of all Members of the League. In this connection the special necessities of the regions devastated during the war of 1914–1918 shall be borne in mind;

(f) will endeavour to take steps in matters of international concern for the prevention and control of disease.

Article 24.

There shall be placed under the direction of the League all international bureaux already established by general treaties if the parties to such treaties consent. All such international bureaux and all commissions for the regulation of matters of international interest hereafter constituted shall be placed under the direction of the League.

In all matters of international interest which are regulated by general conventions but which are not placed under the control of international bureaux or commissions, the Secretariat of the League shall, subject to the consent of the Council and if desired by the parties, collect and distribute all relevant information and shall render any other assistance which may be necessary or desirable.

The Council may include as part of the expenses of the Secretariat the expenses of any bureau or commission which is placed under the direction of the League.

Article 25.

The Members of the League agree to encourage and promote the establishment and co-operation of duly authorised voluntary national Red Cross organisations having as purposes the improvement of health, the prevention of disease and the mitigation of suffering throughout the world.

Article 26.

Amendments to this Covenant will take effect when ratified by the Members of the League whose Representatives compose the Council and by a majority of the Members of the League whose Representatives compose the Assembly.

No such amendment shall bind any Member of the League which signifies its dissent therefrom, but in that case it shall cease to be a Member of the League.

PART II.

FRONTIERS OF AUSTRIA.

Article 27.

The frontiers of Austria shall be fixed as follows (see Map):

1. With Switzerland and Lichtenstein:

the present frontier.

2. With Italy:

From the point 2645 (Gruben J.) eastwards to point 2915 (Klopaier Spitz), a line to be fixed on the ground passing through point 1483 on the Reschen-Nauders road; thence eastwards to the summit of Dreiherrn Spitz (point 3505), the watershed between the basins of the Inn to the north and the Adige to the south;

thence south-south-eastwards to point 2545 (Marchkinkele), the watershed between the basins of the Drave to the east and the Adige to the west;

thence south-eastwards to point 2483 (Helm Spitz)

a line to be fixed on the ground crossing the Drave between Winnbach and Arnbach; thence east-south-eastwards to point 2050 (Osternig) about 9 kilometres northwest of Tarvis, the watershed between the basins of the Drave on the north and successively the basins of the Sextenbach, the Piave and the Tagliamento on the south;

thence east-south-eastwards to point 1492 (about 2 kilomètres west of Thörl), the watershed between the Gail and the Gailitz; thence eastwards to point 1509 (Pec), a line to be fixed on the ground cutting the Gailitz south of the town and station of Thörl and passing by point 1270 (Cabin Berg).

3. On the South, and then with the Klagenfurt area, subject to the provisions of Section II of Part III (Political Clauses for Europe):

from point 1509 (Pec) eastwards to point 1817 (Malestiger), the crest of the Karavanken;

from point 1817 (Malestiger) and in a north-easterly direction as far as the Drave at a point situated about 1 kilometre south-east of the railway bridge on the eastern branch of the bend made by that river about 6 kilometres east of Villach, a line to be fixed on the ground cutting the railway between Mallestig and Faak and passing through point 666 (Polana); thence in a south-easterly direction to a point about 2 kilometres above St. Martin,

the course of the Drave;

thence in a northerly direction as far as point 871, about 10 kilometres to the east-north-east of Villach, a line running approximately from south to north to be fixed on the ground; thence east-north-eastwards to a point to be chosen near point 725 about 10 kilometres north-west of Klagenfurt on the administrative boundary between the districts of St. Veit and Klagenfurt, a line to be fixed on the ground passing through points 1069 (Taubenbühel), 1045 (Gallinberg), and 815 (Freudenberg); thence eastwards to a point to be chosen on the ground west of point 1075 (Steinbruch Kogel), the administrative boundary between the districts of St. Veit and Klagenfurt; thence north-eastwards to the point on the Gurk where the administrative boundary of the district of Völkermarkt leaves this river, a line to be fixed on the ground passing through point 1076;

thence north-eastwards to point 1899 (Speikkogl), the administrative boundary between the districts of St. Veit and Völkermarkt; thence south-eastwards to point 842 (1 kilometre west of Kasparstein), the north-eastern boundary of the district of Völkermarkt; thence eastwards to point 1522 (Hühner Kogel), a line to be fixed on the ground passing north of Lavamünd.

4. With the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, subject to the provisions of Section II of Part III (Political Clauses for Europe):

From point 1522 (Hühner Kogel) eastwards to point 917 (St. Lorenzen), a line to be fixed on the ground passing through point 1330;

thence eastwards to the point where it meets the administrative boundary between the districts of Marburg and Leibnitz, the watershed between the basins of the Drave to the south and the Saggau to the north;

thence north-eastwards to the point where this administrative boundary meets the Mur, the above-mentioned administrative boundary;

thence to the point where it meets the old frontiers of 1867 between Austria and Hungary 5 kilometres south-east of Radkersburg, the principal course of the Mur downstream; thence northwards to a point to be fixed east of point 400 about 16 kilometres north of Radkersburg, the old frontier of 1867 between Austria and Hungary; thence north-eastwards to a point to be fixed on the watershed between the basins of the Raab and the Mur about 2 kilometres east of Toka, a line to be fixed on the ground, passing between the villages of Bonisfalva and Gedoudvar.

This point is the point common to the three frontiers of Austria, Hungary and the Serb-Croat-Slovene State.

5. With Hungary:

From the point above defined north-eastwards to point 353 about 6 kilometres north-north-east of Szentgotthard, a line to be fixed on the ground passing through point 353 (Janke B.), then west of the Radkersburg-Szentgotthard road and east of the villages of Nagyfalva, Nemetlak and Rabakeresztur; thence in a general north-easterly direction to point 234 about 7 kilometres north-north-east of Pinka-Mindszent, a line to be fixed on the ground passing through point 323 (Hochkogel), then south of the villages of Zsamand, Nemetbükkös and Karacsfa, and between Nagysaroslak and Pinka-Mindszent; thence northwards to point 883 (Trött Kö) about 9 kilometres south-west of Köszeg, a line to be fixed on the ground passing through points 241, 260 and 273, then east of Nagynarda and Rohoncz and west of Dozmat and Butsching; thence north-eastwards to point 265 (Kamenje) about 2 kilometres south-east of Nikitsch, a line to be fixed on the ground, passing south-east of Liebing, Olmod and Locsmand, and north-west of Köszeg and the road from Köszeg to Salamonfa; thence northwards to a point to be selected on the southern shore of Neusiedler See between Holling and Hidegseg, a line to be fixed on the ground, passing east of Nikitsch and Zinkendorf and west of Kövesd and Nemet-Pereszteg; thence eastwards to point 115 situated about 8 kilometres south-west of St. Johann, a line to be fixed on the ground, crossing the Neusiedler See, passing south of the island containing point 117, leaving in Hungary the branch railway running north-westwards from the station of Mexiko as well as the entire Einser canal, and passing south of Pamhagen; thence northwards to a point to be selected about 1 kilometre west of Antonienhof (east of Kittsee), this point being the point common to the three frontiers of Austria, Hungary, and the Czecho-Slovak State, a line to be fixed on the ground, leaving entirely in Hungarian territory the Csorna-Karlburg railway and passing west of Wüst-Sommerein and Kr. Jahrndorf, and east of Andau, Nikelsdorf, D. Jahrndorf and Kittsee.

6. With the Czecho-Slovak State:

From the point above defined north-westwards to the bend of the old frontier of 1867 between Austria and Hungary about 2½ kilometres north-east of Berg, a line to be fixed on the ground, cutting the Kittsee-Pressburg road about 2 kilometres north of Kittsee; thence northwards to a point to be selected on the principal channel of navigation of the Danube about 4½ kilometres upstream from the Pressburg bridge, a line to be fixed on the ground following as much as possible the old frontier of 1867 between Austria and Hungary; thence westwards to the confluence of the Morava (March) with the Danube, the principal channel of navigation of the Danube; thence the course of the Morava upstream, then the course of the Thaya upstream to a point to be selected about 2 kilometres south-east of the intersection of the Rabensburg-Themenau road with the Rabensburg-Lundenburg railway; thence west-north-westwards the above-mentioned administrative boundary between Lower Austria and Moravia situated about 400 metres south of the point where this boundary cuts the Nikolsburg-Feldsberg railway, a line to be fixed on the ground passing through points 187 (Dlouhyvrch), 221 (Rosenbergen), 223 (Wolfsberg), 291 (Raistenberg), 249 and 279 (Kallerhaide); thence west-northwestwards the above-mentioned administrative boundary; thence westwards to a point to be selected about 3 kilometres east of the village of Franzensthal, the old administrative boundary between Lower Austria and Bohemia; thence southwards to point 498 (Gelsenberg) about 5 kilometres north-northwest of Gmund, a line to be fixed on the ground passing east of the Rottenschachen-Zuggers road and through points 537 and 522 (G. Nagel B.); thence southwards and then west-north-westwards to a point on the old administrative boundary between Lower Austria and Bohemia situated about 200 metres north of the point where it cuts the Gratzen-Weitra road, a line to be fixed on the ground passing between Zuggers and Breitensee, then through the most south-easterly point of the railway bridge over the Lainsitz while leaving to Austria the town of Gmünd and to the Czecho-Slovak State the station and railway works of Gmünd (Wolfshof) and the junction of the Gmünd-Budweis and Gmünd-Wittingau railways, then passing through points 524 (Grundbühel), 577 (north of Hohenberg) and 681 (Lagerberg); thence south-westwards the above mentioned administrative boundary, then north-westwards the old administrative boundary between Upper Austria and Bohemia to its point of junction with the frontier of Germany.

7. With Germany:

The frontier of August 3, 1914.

Article 28.

The frontiers described by the present Treaty are traced, for such parts as are defined, on the one in a million map attached to the present Treaty. In case of differences between the text and the maps, the text will prevail.

Article 29.

Boundary Commissions, whose composition is fixed by the present Treaty, or will be fixed by a Treaty between the Principal Allied and Associated Powers and the, or any, interested States, will have to trace these frontiers on the ground.

They shall have the power, not only of fixing those portions which are defined as "a line to be fixed on the ground", but also, where a request to that effect is made by one of the States concerned, and the Commission is satisfied that it is desirable to do so, of revising portions defined by administrative boundaries; this shall not however apply in the case of international boundaries existing in August, 1914, where the task of the Commission will confine itself to the re-establishment of sign-posts and boundary-marks.

They shall endeavour in both cases to follow as nearly as possible the descriptions given in the Treaties, taking into account as far as possible administrative boundaries and local economic interests.

The decisions of the Commissions will be taken by a majority, and shall be binding on the parties concerned.

The expenses of the Boundary Commissions will be borne in equal shares by the two States concerned.

Article 30.

In so far as frontiers defined by a waterway are concerned, the phrases "course" or "channel" used in the descriptions of the present Treaty signify, as regards non-navigable rivers, the median line of the waterway or of its principal branch, and, as regards navigable rivers, the median line of the principal channel of navigation. It will rest with the Boundary Commissions provided for by the present Treaty to specify whether the frontier line shall follow any changes of the course or channel which may take place, or whether it shall be definitely fixed by the position of the course or channel at the time when the present Treaty comes into force.

Article 31.

The various States interested undertake to furnish to the Commissions all documents necessary for their tasks, especially authentic copies of agreements fixing existing or old frontiers, all large scale maps in existence, geodetic data, surveys completed but unpublished, and information concerning the changes of frontier watercourses.

They also undertake to instruct the local authorities to communicate to the Commissions all documents, especially plans, cadastral and land books, and to furnish on demand all details regarding property, existing economic conditions, and other necessary information.

Article 32.

The various States interested undertake to give every assistance to the Boundary Commissions, whether directly or through local authorities, in everything that concerns transport, accommodation, labour, material (signposts, boundary pillars) necessary for the accomplishment of their mission.

Article 33.

The various States interested undertake to safeguard the trigonometrical points, signals, posts or frontier marks erected by the Commission.

Article 34.

The pillars will be placed so as to be intervisible; they will be numbered, and their position and their number will be noted on a cartographic document.

Article 35.

The protocols defining the boundary and the maps and documents attached thereto will be made out in triplicate, of which two copies will be forwarded to the Governments of the limitrophe States and the third to the Government of the French Republic, which will deliver authentic copies to the Powers who sign the present Treaty.

PART III.

POLITICAL CLAUSES FOR EUROPE.

Section I.

ITALY.

Article 36.

Austria renounces, so far as she is concerned, in favour of Italy all rights and title over the territory of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy situated beyond the frontier laid down in Article 27 (2) and lying between that frontier, the former Austro-Hungarian frontier, the Adriatic Sea, and the eastern frontier of Italy as subsequently determined.

Austria similarly renounces so far as she is concerned in favour of Italy all rights and title over other territory of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy which may be recognized as forming part of Italy by any treaties which may be concluded for the purpose of completing the present settlement.

A Commission composed of five members, one nominated by Italy, three by the other Principal Allied and Associated Powers, and one by Austria, shall be constituted within fifteen days from the coming into force of the present Treaty to trace on the spot the frontier line between Italy and Austria. The decisions of the Commission will be taken by a majority and shall be binding on the parties concerned.

Article 37.

Notwithstanding the provisions of Article 269 of Part X (Economic Clauses), persons having their usual residence in the territories of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy transferred to Italy who, during the war, have been outside the territories of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy or have been imprisoned, interned or evacuated, shall enjoy the full benefit of the provisions of Articles 252 and 253 of Part X (Economic Clauses).

Article 38.

A special Convention will determine the terms of repayment in Austrian currency of the special war expenditure advanced during the war by territory of the former Austo-Hungarian Monarchy transferred to Italy or by public associations in that territory on account of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy under its legislation, such as allowances to the families of persons mobilised, requisitions, billeting of troops, and relief to persons who have been evacuated.

In fixing the amount of these sums Austria shall be credited with the amount which the territory would have contributed to Austria-Hungary to meet the expenses resulting from these payments, this contribution being calculated according to the proportion of the revenues of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy derived from the territory in 1913.

Article 39.

The Italian Government will collect for its own account the taxes, dues and charges of every kind leviable in the territories transferred to Italy and not collected on November 3, 1918.

Article 40.

No sum shall be due by Italy on the ground of her entry into possession of the Palazzo Venezia at Rome.

Article 41.

Subject to the provisions of Article 204 of Part IX (Financial Clauses) relative to the acquisition of, and payment for, State property and possessions, the Italian Government is substituted in all the rights which the Austrian State possessed over all the railways in the territories transferred to Italy which were administered by the Railway Administration of the said State and which are actually working or under construction.

The same shall apply to the rights of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy with regard to railway and tramway concessions within the above-mentioned territories.

The frontier railway stations shall be determined by a subsequent agreement.

Article 42.

Austria shall restore to Italy within a period of three months all the wagons belonging to the Italian railways which before the outbreak of war had passed into Austria and have not returned to Italy.

Article 43.

Austria renounces as from November 3, 1918, on behalf of herself and her nationals in regard to territories transferred to Italy all rights to which she may be entitled with regard to the products of the aforesaid territories under any agreements, stipulations or laws establishing trusts, cartels or other similar organizations.

Article 44.

For a period of ten years from the coming into force of the present Treaty central electric power stations situated in Austrian territory and formerly furnishing electric power to the territories transferred to Italy or to any other establishment the exploitation of which passes to Italy shall be required to continue furnishing this supply up to an amount corresponding to the undertakings and contracts in force on November 3, 1918.

Austria further admits the right of Italy to the free use of the waters of Lake Raibl and its derivative water-course and to divert the said waters to the basin of the Korinitza.

Article 45.

(1) Judgments rendered since August 4, 1914, by the courts in the territory transferred to Italy in civil and commercial cases between the inhabitants of such territory and other nationals of the former Austrian Empire, or between such inhabitants and the subjects of the allies of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, shall not be carried into effect until after endorsement by the corresponding new court in such territory.

(2) All decisions rendered for political crimes or offences since August 4, 1914, by the judicial authorities of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy against Italian nationals, including persons who obtain Italian nationality under the present Treaty, shall be annulled.

(3) In all matters relating to proceedings initiated before the coming into force of the present Treaty before the competent authorities of the territory transferred to Italy, the Italian and Austrian judicial authorities respectively shall until the coming into force of a special convention on this subject be authorized to correspond with each other direct. Requests thus presented shall be given effect to so far as the laws of a public character allow in the country to the authorities of which the request is addressed.

(4) All appeals to the higher Austrian judicial and administrative authorities beyond the limits of the territory transferred to Italy against decisions of the administrative or judicial authorities of this territory shall be suspended. The records shall be submitted to the authorities against whose decision the appeal was entered. They must be transmitted to the competent Italian authorities without delay.

(5) All other questions as to jurisdiction, procedure or the administration of justice will be determined by a special convention between Italy and Austria.

Section II.

SERB-CROAT-SLOVENE STATE.

Article 46.

Austria, in conformity with the action already taken by the Allied and Associated Powers, recognizes the complete independence of the Serb-Croat-Slovene State.

Article 47.

Austria renounces so far as she is concerned in favour of the Serb-Croat-Slovene State all rights and title over the territories of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy situated outside the frontiers of Austria as laid down in Article 27 of Part II (Frontiers of Austria) and recognised by the present Treaty, or by any Treaties concluded for the purpose of completing the present settlement, as forming part of the Serb-Croat-Slovene State.

Article 48.

A Commission consisting of seven members, five nominated by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, one by the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, and one by Austria, shall be constituted within fifteen days from the coming into force of the present Treaty to trace on the spot the frontier line described in Article 27 (4) of Part II (Frontiers of Austria.)

The decisions of the Commission will be taken by a majority and shall be binding on the parties concerned.

Article 49.

The inhabitants of the Klagenfurt area will be called upon, to the extent stated below, to indicate by a vote the State to which they wish the territory to belong.

The boundaries of the Klagenfurt area are as follows:

From point 871, about 10 kilometres to the east-north-east of Villach, southwards to a point on the Drave about 2 kilometres above St. Martin, a line running approximately from north to south to be fixed on the ground; thence in a north-westerly direction as far as a point about 1 kilometre south-east of the railway bridge on the eastern branch of the bend formed by the Drave about 6 kilometres to the east of Villach,

the course of the Drave;

thence in a south-westerly direction to point 1817 (Malestiger), a line to be fixed on the ground passing through point 666 (Polana) and cutting the railway between Mallestig and Faak; thence in an east-south-easterly direction, then north-west to point 1929 (Gushowa), the watershed between the basins of the Drave to the north and the Save to the south;

thence north-east to point 1054 (Strojna), a line to be fixed on the ground following in a general manner the western boundary of the basin of the Miess, passing through points 1558, 2124 and 1185; thence north-east to point 1522 (Hühner Kogel), a line to be fixed on the ground, crossing the Drave to the south of Lavamünd; from the Hühner Kogel westwards to point 842, 1 kilometre west of Kasparstein, a line to be fixed on the ground passing to the north of Lavamünd; thence as far as point 1899 (Speikkogl),

the north-eastern administrative boundary of the district of Völkermarkt; thence in a south-westerly direction and as far as the river Gurk,

the north-western administrative boundary of the district of Völkermarkt; thence in a south-westerly direction as far as a point on the administrative boundary to the west of point 1075 (Steinbruch Kogel), a line to be fixed on the ground, passing through point 1076;

thence in a westerly direction and as far a point to be fixed near point 725, about 10 kilometres north-west of Klagenfurt,

the administrative boundary between the districts of St. Veit and Klagenfurt; thence as far as point 871, which was the starting point of this description, a line to be fixed on the ground, passing through points 815 (Freudenberg), 1045 (Gallinberg) and 1069 (Taubenbühel).

Article 50.

With a view to the organisation of a plebiscite, the Klagenfurt area will be divided into two zones, the first to the south and the second to the north of a transversal line of which the following is a description:

From the point where the western boundary of the area leaves the Drave in a northerly direction as far as the point about 1 kilometre to the east of Rosegg (Saint-Michael), the course of the Drave downstream; thence in a north-easterly direction and as far as the western extremity of the Wörther See, south of Velden, a line to be fixed on the ground; thence in an easterly direction to the outlet of the Glanfurt from the lake,

the median line of that lake;

thence eastwards to its confluence with the river Glan,

the course of the Glanfurt downstream;

thence eastward to its confluence with the river Gurk,

the course of the Glan downstream; thence in a north-easterly direction, to the point where the northern boundary of the Klagenfurt area crosses the river Gurk, the course of the Gurk.

The Klagenfurt area will be placed under the control of a Commission entrusted with the duty of preparing the plebiscite in that area and assuring the impartial administration thereof. This Commission will be composed as follows: four members nominated respectively by the United States, Great Britain, France and Italy, one by Austria, one by the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, the Austrian member only taking part in the deliberations of the Commission in regard to the second zone, and the Serb-Croat-Slovene member only taking part therein with regard to the first zone. The decisions of the Commission will be taken by a majority.

The second zone will be occupied by the Austrian troops and administered in accordance with the general regulations of the Austrian legislation.

The first zone will be occupied by the troops of the Serb-Croat-Slovene State and administered in accordance with the general regulations of the legislation of that State.

In both zones the troops, whether Austrian or Serb-Croat-Slovene, shall be reduced to the numbers which the Commission may consider necessary for the preservation of order, and shall carry out their mission under the control of the Commission. These troops shall be replaced as speedily as possible by a police force recruited on the spot.

The Commission will be charged with the duty of arranging for the vote and of taking such measures as it may deem necessary to ensure its freedom, fairness and secrecy.

In the first zone the plebiscite will be held within three months from the coming into force of the present Treaty, at a date fixed by the Commission.

If the vote is in favour of the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, a plebiscite will be held in the second zone within three weeks from the proclamation of the result of the plebiscite in the first zone, at a date to be fixed by the Commission.

If on the other hand the vote in the first zone is in favour of Austria, no plebiscite will be held in the second zone, and the whole of the area will remain definitively under Austrian sovereignty.

The right of voting will be granted to every person without distinction of sex who:

(a) Has attained the age of 20 years on or before January 1, 1919;

(b) Has on January 1, 1919, his or her habitual residence within the zone subjected to the plebiscite; and,

(c) Was born within the said zone, or has had his or her habitual residence or rights of citizenship (pertinenza) there from a date previous to January 1, 1912.

The result of the vote will be determined by the majority of votes in the whole of each zone.

On the conclusion of each vote the result will be communicated by the Commission to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, with a full report as to the taking of the vote, and will be proclaimed.

If the vote is in favour of the incorporation either of the first zone or of both zones in the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, Austria hereby renounces, so far as she is concerned and to the extent corresponding to the result of the vote, in favour of the Serb-Croat-Slovene State all rights and title over these territories.

After agreement with the Commission the Serb-Croat-Slovene Government may definitively establish its authority over the said territories.

If the vote in the first or second zone is in favour of Austria, the Austrian Government, after agreement with the Commission, will be entitled definitively to re-establish its authority over the whole of the Klagenfurt area, or in the second zone, as the case may be.

When the administration of the country, either by the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, or by Austria, as the case may be, has been thus assured, the powers of the Commission will terminate.

Expenditure by the Commission will be borne by Austria and the Serb-Croat-Slovene State in equal moieties.

Article 51.

The Serb-Croat-Slovene State accepts and agrees to embody in a Treaty with the Principal Allied and Associated Powers such provisions as may be deemed necessary by these Powers to protect the interests of inhabitants of that State who differ from the majority of the population in race, language, or religion.

The Serb-Croat-Slovene State further accepts and agrees to embody in a Treaty with the Principal Allied and Associated Powers such provisions as these Powers may deem necessary to protect freedom of transit and equitable treatment of the commerce of other nations.

Article 52.

The proportion and nature of the financial obligations of the former Austrian Empire which the Serb-Croat-Slovene State will have to assume on account of the territory placed under its sovereignty will be determined in accordance with Article 203 of Part IX (Financial Clauses) of the present Treaty.

Subsequent agreements will decide all questions which are not decided by the present Treaty and which may arise in consequence of the cession of the said territory.

Section III.

CZECHO-SLOVAK STATE.

Article 53.

Austria, in conformity with the action already taken by the Allied and Associated Powers, recognizes the complete independence of the Czecho-Slovak State, which will include the autonomous territory of the Ruthenians to the south of the Carpathians.

Article 54.

Austria renounces so far as she is concerned in favour of the Czecho-Slovak State all rights and title over the territories of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy situated outside the frontiers of Austria as laid down in Article 27 of Part II (Frontiers of Austria) and recognised in accordance with the present Treaty as forming part of the Czecho-Slovak State.

Article 55.

A Commission composed of seven members, five nominated by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, one by the Czecho-Slovak State, and one by Austria, will be appointed fifteen days after the coming into force of the present Treaty to trace on the spot the frontier line laid down in Article 27 (6) of Part II (Frontiers of Austria) of the present Treaty.

The decisions of this Commission will be taken by a majority and shall be binding on the parties concerned.

Article 56.

The Czecho-Slovak State undertakes not to erect any military works in that portion of its territory which lies on the right bank of the Danube to the south of Bratislava (Pressburg).

Article 57.

The Czecho-Slovak State accepts and agrees to embody in a Treaty with the Principal Allied and Associated Powers such provisions as may be deemed necessary by these Powers to protect the interests of inhabitants of that State who differ from the majority of the population in race, language or religion.

The Czecho-Slovak State further accepts and agrees to embody in a Treaty with the Principal Allied and Associated Powers such provisions as these Powers may deem necessary to protect freedom of transit and equitable treatment for the commerce of other nations.

Article 58.

The proportion and nature of the financial obligations of the former Austrian Empire which the Czecho-Slovak State will have to assume on account of the territory placed under its sovereignty will be determined in accordance with Article 203 of Part IX (Financial Clauses) of the present Treaty.

Subsequent agreements will decide all questions which are not decided by the present Treaty and which may arise in consequence of the cession of the said territory.

Section IV.

ROUMANIA.

Article 59.

Austria renounces, so far as she is concerned, in favour of Roumania all rights and title over such portion of the former Duchy of Bukovina as lies within the frontiers of Roumania which may ultimately be fixed by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers.

Article 60.

Roumania accepts and agrees to embody in a Treaty with the Principal Allied and Associated Powers such provisions as may be deemed necessary by these Powers to protect the interests of inhabitants of that State who differ from the majority of the population in race, language or religion.

Roumania further accepts and agrees to embody in a Treaty with the Principal Allied and Associated Powers such provisions as these Powers may deem necessary to protect freedom of transit and equitable treatment for the commerce of other nations.

Article 61.

The proportion and nature of the financial obligations of the former Austrian Empire which Roumania will have to assume on account of the territory placed under her sovereignty will be determined in accordance with Article 203 of Part IX (Financial Clauses) of the present Treaty.

Subsequent agreements will decide all questions which are not decided by the present Treaty and which may arise in consequence of the cession of the said territory.

Section V.

PROTECTION OF MINORITIES.

Article 62.

Austria undertakes that the stipulations contained in this Section shall be recognised as fundamental laws, and that no law, regulation or official action shall conflict or interfere with these stipulations, nor shall any law, regulation or official action prevail over them.

Article 63.

Austria undertakes to assure full and complete protection of life and liberty to all inhabitants of Austria without distinction of birth, nationality, language, race or religion.

All inhabitants of Austria shall be entitled to the free exercise, whether public or private, of any creed, religion or belief, whose practices are not inconsistent with public order or public morals.

Article 64.

Austria admits and declares to be Austrian nationals ipso facto and without the requirement of any formality all persons possessing at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty rights of citizenship (pertinenza) within Austrian territory who are not nationals of any other State.

Article 65.

All persons born in Austrian territory who are not born nationals of another State shall ipso facto become Austrian nationals.

Article 66.

All Austrian national shall be equal before the law and shall enjoy the same civil and political rights without distinction as to race, language or religion.

Differences of religion, creed or confession shall not prejudice any Austrian national in matters relating to the enjoyment of civil or political rights, as for instance admission to public employments, functions and honours, or the exercise of professions and industries.

No restriction shall be imposed on the free use by any Austrian national of any language in private intercourse, in commerce, in religion, in the press or in publications of any kind, or at public meetings.

Notwithstanding any establishment by the Austrian Government of an official language, adequate facilities shall be given to Austrian nationals of non-German speech for the use of their language, either orally or in writing, before the courts.

Article 67.

Austrian nationals who belong to racial, religious or linguistic minorities shall enjoy the same treatment and security in law and in fact as the other Austrian nationals. In particular they shall have an equal right to establish, manage and control at their own expense charitable, religious and social institutions, schools and other educational establishments, with the right to use their own language and to exercise their religion freely therein.

Article 68.

Austria will provide in the public educational system in towns and districts in which a considerable proportion of Austrian nationals of other than German speech are residents adequate facilities for ensuring that in the primary schools the instruction shall be given to the children of such Austrian nationals through the medium of their own language. This provision shall not prevent the Austrian Government from making the teaching of the German language obligatory in the said schools.

In towns and districts where there is a considerable proportion of Austrian nationals belonging to racial, religious or linguistic minorities, these minorities shall be assured an equitable share in the enjoyment and application of the sums which may be provided out of public funds under the State, municipal or other budgets for educational, religious or charitable purposes.

Article 69.

Austria agrees that the stipulations in the foregoing Articles of this Section, so far as they affect persons belonging to racial, religious or linguistic minorities, constitute obligations of international concern and shall be placed under the guarantee of the League of Nations. They shall not be modified without the assent of a majority of the Council of the League of Nations. The Allied and Associated Powers represented on the Council severally agree not to withold their assent from any modification in these Articles which is in due form assented to by a majority of the Council of the League of Nations.

Austria agrees that any Member of the Council of the League of Nations shall have the right to bring to the attention of the Council any infraction, or any danger of infraction, of any of these obligations, and that the Council may thereupon take such action and give such direction as it may deem proper and effective in the circumstances.

Austria further agrees that any difference of opinion as to questions of law or fact arising out of these Articles between the Austrian Government and any one of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers or any other Power, a Member of the Council of the League of Nations, shall be held to be a dispute of an international character under Article 14 of the Covenant of the League of Nations. The Austrian Government hereby consents that any such dispute shall, if the other party thereto demands, be referred to the Permanent Court of International Justice. The decision of the Permanent Court shall be final and shall have the same force and effect as an award under Article 13 of the Covenant.

Section VI.

CAUSES RELATING TO NATIONALITY.

Article 70.

Every person possessing rights of citizenship (pertinenza) in territory which formed part of the territories of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy shall obtain ipso facto to the exclusion of Austrian nationality the nationality of the State exercising sovereignty over such territory.

Article 71.

Notwithstanding the provisions of Article 70, Italian nationality shall not, in the case of territory transferred to Italy, be acquired ipso facto;

(1) by persons possessing rights of citizenship in such territory who were not born there;

(2) by persons who acquired their rights of citizenship in such territory after May 24, 1915, or who acquired them only by reason of their official position.

Article 72.

The persons referred to in Article 71, as well as those who (a) formerly possessed rights of citizenship in the territories transferred to Italy, or whose father, or mother if the father is unknown, possessed rights of citizenship in such territories, or (b) have served in the Italian Army during the present war, and their descendants, may claim Italian nationality subject to the conditions prescribed in Article 78 for the right of option.

Article 73.

The claim to Italian nationality by the persons referred to in Article 72 may in individual cases be refused by the competent Italian authority.

Article 74.

Where the claim to Italian nationality under Article 72 is not made, or is refused, the persons concerned will obtain ipso facto the nationality of the State exercising sovereignty over the territory in which they possessed rights of citizenship before acquiring such rights in the territory transferred to Italy.

Article 75.

Juridical persons established in the territories transferred to Italy shall be considered Italian if they are recognized as such either by the Italian administrative authorities or by an Italian judicial decision.

Article 76.

Notwithstanding the provisions of Article 70, persons who acquired rights of citizenship after January 1, 1910, in territory transferred under the present Treaty to the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, or to the Czecho-Slovak State, will not acquire Serb-Croat-Slovene or Czecho-Slovak nationality without a permit from the Serb-Croat-Slovene State or the Czecho-Slovak State respectively.

Article 77.

If the permit referred to in Article 76 is not applied for, or is refused, the persons concerned will obtain ipso facto the nationality of the State exercising sovereignty over the territory in which they previously possessed rights of citizenship.

Article 78.

Persons over 18 years of age losing their Austrian nationality and obtaining ipso facto a new nationality under Article 70 shall be entitled within a period of one year from the coming into force of the present Treaty to opt for the nationality of the State in which they possessed rights of citizenship before acquiring such rights in the territory transferred.

Option by a husband will cover his wife and option by parents will cover their children under 18 years of age.

Persons who have exercised the above right to opt must within the succeeding twelve months transfer their place of residence to the State for which they have opted.

They will be entitled to retain their immovable property in the territory of the other State where they had their place of residence before exercising their right to opt.

They may carry with them their movable property of every description. No export or import duties may be imposed upon them in connection with the removal of such property.

Article 79.

Persons entitled to vote in plebiscites provided for in the present Treaty shall within a period of six months after the definitive attribution of the area in which the plebiscite has taken place be entitled to opt for the nationality of the State to which the area is not assigned.

The provisions of Article 78 relating to the right of option shall apply equally to the exercise of the right under this Article.

Article 80.

Persons possessing rights of citizenship in territory forming part of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, and differing in race and language from the majority of the population of such territory, shall within six months of the coming into force of the present Treaty severally be entitled to opt for Austria, Italy, Poland, Roumania, the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, or the Czecho-Slovak State, if the majority of the population of the State selected is of the same race and language as the person exercising the right to opt. The provisions of Article 78 as to the exercise of the right of option shall apply to the right of option given by this Article.

Article 81.

The High Contracting Parties undertake to put no hindrance in the way of the exercise of the right which the persons concerned have under the present Treaty, or under treaties concluded by the Allied and Associated Powers with Germany, Hungary or Russia, or between any of the Allied and Associated Powers themselves, to choose any other nationality which may be open to them.

Article 82.

For the purposes of the provisions of this Section, the status of a married woman will be governed by that of her husband, and the status of children under 18 years of age by that of their parents.

Section VII.

POLITICAL CLAUSES RELATING TO CERTAIN EUROPEAN STATES.

1. BELGIUM.

Article 83.

Austria, recognizing that the Treaties of April 19, 1839, which established the status of Belgium before the war, no longer conform to the requirements of the situation, consents so far as she is concerned to the abrogation of the said treaties and undertakes immediately to recognize and to observe whatever conventions may be entered into by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, or by any of them, in concert with the Governments of Belgium and of the Netherlands, to replace the said Treaties of 1839. If her formal adhesion should be required to such conventions or to any of their stipulations, Austria undertakes immediately to give it.

2. LUXEMBURG.

Article 84.

Austria agrees, so far as she is concerned, to the termination of the régime of neutrality of the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg, and accepts in advance all international arrangements which may be concluded by the Allied and Associated Powers relating to the Grand Duchy.

3. SCHLESWIG.

Article 85.

Austria hereby accepts so far as she is concerned all arrangements made by the Allied and Associated Powers with Germany concerning the territories whose abandonment was imposed upon Denmark by the Treaty of October 30, 1864.

4. TURKEY AND BULGARIA.

Article 86.

Austria undertakes to recognize and accept as far as she is concerned all arrangements which the Allied and Associated Powers may make with Turkey and with Bulgaria with reference to any rights, interests and privileges whatever which might be claimed by Austria or her nationals in Turkey or Bulgaria and which are not dealt with in the provisions of the present Treaty.

5. RUSSIA AND RUSSIAN STATES.

Article 87.

1. Austria acknowledges and agrees to respect as permanent and inalienable the independence of all the territories which were part of the former Russian Empire on August 1, 1914.

In accordance with the provisions of Article 210 of Part IX (Financial Clauses) and Article 244 of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty, Austria accepts definitely so far as she is concerned the abrogation of the Brest-Litovsk Treaties and of all treaties, conventions and agreements entered into by the former Austro-Hungarian Government with the Maximalist Government in Russia.

The Allied and Associated Powers formally reserve the rights of Russia to obtain from Austria restitution and reparation based on the principles of the present Treaty.

2. Austria undertakes to recognize the full force of all treaties or agreements which may be entered into by the Allied and Associated Powers with States now existing or coming into existence in future in the whole or part of the former Empire of Russia as it existed on August 1, 1914, and to recognize the frontiers of any such States as determined therein.

Section VIII.

GENERAL PROVISIONS.

Article 88.

The independence of Austria is inalienable otherwise than with the consent of the Council of the League of Nations. Consequently Austria undertakes in the absence of the consent of the said Council to abstain from any act which might directly or indirectly or by any means whatever compromise her independence, particularly, and until her admission to membership of the League of Nations, by participation in the affairs of another Power.

Article 89.

Austria hereby recognises and accepts the frontiers of Bulgaria, Greece, Hungary, Poland, Roumania, the Serb-Croat-Slovene State and the Czecho-Slovak State as these frontiers may be determined by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers.

Article 90.

Austria undertakes to recognise the full force of the Treaties of Peace and Additional Conventions which have been or may be concluded by the Allied and Associated Powers with the Powers who fought on the side of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, and to recognise whatever dispositions have been or may be made concerning the territories of the former German Empire, of Hungary, of the Kingdom of Bulgaria and of the Ottoman Empire, and to recognize the new States within their frontiers as there laid down.

Article 91.

Austria renounces so far as she is concerned in favour of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers all rights and title over the territories which previously belonged to the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, and which, being situated outside the new frontiers of Austria as described in Article 27 of Part II (Frontiers of Austria), have not at present been assigned to any State.

Austria undertakes to accept the settlement made by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers in regard to these territories, particularly in so far as concerns the nationality of the inhabitants.

Article 92.

No inhabitant of the territories of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy shall be disturbed or molested on account either of his political attitude between July 28, 1914, and the definitive settlement of the sovereignty over these territories, or of the determination of his nationality effected by the present Treaty.

Article 93.

Austria will hand over without delay to the Allied and Associated Governments concerned archives, registers, plans, title-deeds and documents of every kind belonging to the civil, military, financial, judicial or other forms of administration in the ceded territories. If any one of these documents, archives, registers, title-deeds or plans is missing, it shall be restored by Austria upon the demand of the Allied or Associated Government concerned.

In case the archives, registers, plans, title-deeds or documents referred to in the preceding paragraph, exclusive of those of a military character, concern equally the administrations in Austria, and cannot therefore be handed over without inconvenience to such administrations, Austria undertakes, subject to reciprocity, to give access thereto to the Allied and Associated Governments concerned.

Article 94.

Separate conventions between Austria and each of the States to which territory of the former Austrian Empire is transferred, and each of the States arising from the dismemberment of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, will provide for the interests of the inhabitants, especially in connection with their civil rights, their commerce and the exercise of their professions.

PART IV.

AUSTRIAN INTERESTS OUTSIDE EUROPE.

Article 95.

In territory outside her frontiers as fixed by the present Treaty Austria renounces so far as she is concerned all rights, titles and privileges whatever in or over territory outside Europe which belonged to the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, or to its allies, and all rights, titles and privileges whatever their origin which it held as against the Allied and Associated Powers.

Austria undertakes immediately to recognise and to conform to the measures which may be taken now or in the future by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, in agreement where necessary with third Powers, in order to carry the above stipulation into effect.

Section 1.

MOROCCO.

Article 96.

Austria renounces so far as she is concerned all rights, titles and privileges conferred on her by the General Act of Algeciras of April 7, 1906, and by the Franco-German Agreements of February 9, 1909 and November 4, 1911. All treaties, agreements, arrangements and contracts concluded by the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy with the Sherifian Empire are regarded as abrogated as from August 12, 1914.

In no case can Austria avail herself of these acts and she undertakes not to intervene in any way in negotiations relating to Morocco which may take place between France and the other Powers.

Article 97.

Austria hereby accepts all the consequences of the establishment of the French Protectorate in Morocco, which had been recognized by the Government of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, and she renounces so far as she is concerned the régime of the capitulations in Morocco.

This renunciation shall take effect as from August 12, 1914.

Article 98.

The Sherifian Government shall have complete liberty of action in regulating the status of Austrian nationals in Morocco and the conditions in which they can establish themselves there.

Austrian protected persons, semsars and "associés agricoles" shall be considered to have ceased, as from August 12, 1914, to enjoy the privileges attached to their status and shall be subject to the ordinary law.

Article 99.

All movable and immovable property in the Sherifian Empire belonging to the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy passes ipso facto to the Maghzen without compensation.

For this purpose, the property and possessions of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy shall be deemed to include all the property of the Crown, and the private property of members of the former Royal Family of Austria-Hungary.

All movable and immovable property in the Sherifian Empire belonging to Austrian nationals shall be dealt with in accordance with Sections III and IV of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty.

Mining rights which may be recognised as belonging to Austrian nationals by the Court of Arbitration set up under the Moroccan Mining Regulations shall be treated in the same way as property in Morocco belonging to Austrian nationals.

Article 100.

The Austrian Government shall ensure the transfer to the person nominated by the French Government of the shares representing Austria's portion of the capital of the State Bank of Morocco. This person will repay to the persons entitled thereto the value of these shares, which shall be indicated by the State Bank.

This transfer will take place without prejudice to the repayment of debts which Austrian nationals may have contracted towards the State Bank of Morocco.

Article 101.

Moroccan goods entering Austria shall enjoy the treatment accorded to French goods.

Section II.

EGYPT.

Article 102.

Austria declares that she recognises the Protectorate proclaimed over Egypt by Great Britain on December 18, 1914, and that she renounces so far as she is concerned the régime of the capitulations in Egypt.

This renunciation shall take effect as from August 12, 1914.

Article 103.

All treaties, agreements, arrangements and contracts concluded by the Government of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy with Egypt are regarded as abrogated as from August 12, 1914.

In no case can Austria avail herself of these instruments, and she undertakes not to intervene in any way in negotiations relating to Egypt which may take place between Great Britain and the other Powers.

Article 104.

Until an Egyptian law of judicial organization establishing courts with universal jurisdiction comes into force, provision shall be made, by means of decrees issued by His Highness the Sultan, for the exercise of jurisdiction over Austrian nationals and property by the British Consular Tribunals.

Article 105.

The Egyptian Government shall have complete liberty of action in regulating the status of Austrian nationals and the conditions under which they may establish themselves in Egypt.

Article 106.

Austria consents so far as she is concerned to the abrogation of the decree issued by His Highness the Khedive on November 28, 1904, relating to the Commission of the Egyptian Public Debt, or to such changes as the Egyptian Government may think it desirable to make therein.

Article 107.

Austria consents, in so far as she is concerned, to the transfer to His Britannic Majesty's Government of the powers conferred on His Imperial Majesty the Sultan by the Convention signed at Constantinople on October 29, 1888, relating to the free navigation of the Suez Canal.

She renounces all participation in the Sanitary, Maritime, and Quarantine Board of Egypt and consents, in so far as she is concerned, to the transfer to the Egyptian Authorities of the powers of that Board.

Article 108.

All property and possessions in Egypt of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy pass to the Egyptian Government without payment.

For this purpose, the property and possessions of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy shall be deemed to include all the property of the Crown, and the private property of members of the former Royal Family of Austria-Hungary.

All movable and immovable property in Egypt belonging to Austrian nationals shall be dealt with in accordance with Sections III and IV of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty.

Article 109.

Egyptian goods entering Austria shall enjoy the treatment accorded to British goods.

Section III.

SIAM.

Article 110.

Austria recognises, so far as she is concerned, that all treaties, conventions and agreements between the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy and Siam, and all rights, title and privileges derived therefrom, including all rights of extraterritorial jurisdiction, terminated as from July 22, 1917.

Article 111.

Austria, so far as she is concerned, cedes to Siam all her rights over the goods and property in Siam which belonged to the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, with the exception of premises used as diplomatic or consular residences or offices as well as the effects and furniture which they contain. These goods and property pass ipso facto and without compensation to the Siamese Government.

The goods, property and private rights of Austrian nationals in Siam shall be dealt with in accordance with the provisions of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty.

Article 112.

Austria waives all claims against the Siamese Government on behalf of herself or her nationals arising out of the liquidation of Austrian property or the internment of Austrian nationals in Siam. This provision shall not affect the rights of the parties interested in the proceeds of any such liquidation, which shall be governed by the provisions of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty.

Section IV.

CHINA.

Article 113.

Austria renounces, so far as she is concerned, in favour of China all benefits and privileges resulting from the provisions of the final Protocol signed at Peking on September 7, 1901, and from all annexes, notes and documents supplementary thereto. She likewise renounces in favour of China any claim to indemnities accruing thereunder subsequent to August 14, 1917.

Article 114.

From the coming into force of the present Treaty the High Contracting Parties shall apply, in so far as concerns them respectively:

(1) The Arrangement of August 29, 1902, regarding the new Chinese customs tariff;

(2) The Arrangement of September 27, 1905, regarding Whang-Poo, and the provisional supplementary Arrangement of April 4, 1912.

China, however, will not be bound to grant to Austria the advantages or privileges which she allowed to the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy under these Arrangements.

Article 115.

Austria, so far as she is concerned, cedes to China all her rights over the buildings, wharves and pontoons, barracks, forts, arms and munitions of war, vessels of all kinds, wireless telegraphy installations and other public property which belonged to the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, and which are situated or may be in the Austro-Hungarian Concession at Tientsin or elsewhere in Chinese territory.

It is understood, however, that premises used as diplomatic or consular residences or offices, as well as the effects and furniture contained therein, are not included in the above cession, and, furthermore, that no steps shall be taken by the Chinese Government to dispose of the public and private property belonging to the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy situated within the so-called Legation Quarter at Peking without the consent of the Diplomatic Representatives of the Powers which, on the coming into force of the present Treaty, remain parties to the Final Protocol of September 7, 1901.

Article 116.

Austria agrees so far as she is concerned to the abrogation of the leases from the Chinese Government under which the Austro-Hungarian Concession at Tientsin is now held.

China, restored to the full exercise of her sovereign rights in the above area, declares her intention of opening it to international residence and trade. She further declares that the abrogation of the leases under which the said concession is now held shall not affect the property rights of nationals of Allied and Associated Powers who are holders of lots in this concession.

Article 117.

Austria waives all claims against the Chinese Government or against any Allied or Associated Government arising out of the internment of Austrian nationals in China and their repatriation. She equally renounces, so far as she is concerned, all claims arising out of the capture and condemnation of Austro-Hungarian ships in China, or the liquidation, sequestration or control of Austrian properties, rights and interests in that country since August 14, 1917. This provision, however, shall not affect the rights of the parties interested in the proceeds of any such liquidation, which shall be governed by the provisions of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty.

PART V.

MILITARY, NAVAL AND AIR CLAUSES.

In order to render possible the initiation of a general limitation of the armaments of all nations, Austria undertakes strictly to observe the military, naval and air clauses which follow.

Section I.

MILITARY CLAUSES.

CHAPTER I.

GENERAL.

Article 118.

Within three months of the coming into force of the present Treaty, the military forces of Austria shall be demobolised to the extent prescribed hereinafter.

Article 119.

Universal compulsory military service shall be abolished in Austria. The Austrian Army shall in future only be constituted and recruited by means of voluntary enlistment.

CHAPTER II.

EFFECTIVES AND CADRES OF THE AUSTRIAN ARMY.

Article 120.

The total number of military forces in the Austrian army shall not exceed 30,000 men, including officers and depot troops.

Subject to the following limitations, the formations composing the Austrian Army shall be fixed in accordance with the wishes of Austria:

(1) The effectives of units must be fixed between the maximum and minimum figures shown in Table IV annexed to this Section.

(2) The proportion of officers, including the personnel of staffs and special services, shall not exceed one twentieth of the total effectives with the colours, and that of non-commissioned officers shall not exceed one fifteenth of the total effectives with the colours.

(3) The number of machine guns, guns and howitzers shall not exceed per thousand men of the total effectives with the colours those fixed in Table V annexed to this Section.

The Austrian Army shall be devoted exclusively to the maintenance of order within the territory of Austria, and to the control of her frontiers.

Article 121.

The maximum strength of the Staffs and of all formations which Austria may be permitted to raise are given in the Tables annexed to this Section; these figures need not be exactly followed, but must not be exceeded.

All other organisations for the command of troops or for preparation for war are forbidden.

Article 122.

All measures of mobilisation, or appertaining to mobilisation, are forbidden.

In no case must formations, administrative services or staffs include supplementary cadres.

The carrying out of any preparatory measures with a view to requisitioning animals or other means of military transport is forbidden.

Article 123.

The number of gendarmes, customs officers, foresters, members of the local or municipal police or other like officials may not exceed the number of men employed in a similar capacity in 1913 within the boundaries of Austria as fixed by the present Treaty.

The number of these officials shall not be increased in the future except as may be necessary to maintain the same proportion between the number of officials and the total population in the localities or municipalities which employ them.

These officials, as well as officials employed in the railway service, must not be assembled for the purpose of taking part in any military exercises.

Article 124.

Every formation of troops not included in the Tables annexed to this Section is forbidden. Such other formations as may exist in excess of the 30,000 effectives authorised shall be suppressed within the period laid down by Article 118.

CHAPTER III.

RECRUITING AND MILITARY TRAINING.

Article 125.

All officers must be regulars (officers de carrière). Officers now serving who are retained in the Army must undertake the obligation to serve in it up to the age of 40 years at least. Officers now serving who do not join the new army will be released from all military obligations; they must not take part in any military exercises, whether theoretical or practical.

Officers newly appointed must undertake to serve on the active list for 20 consecutive years at least.

The number of officers discharged for any reason before the expiration of their term of service must not exceed in any year one twentieth of the total of officers provided for in Article 120. If this proportion is unavoidably exceeded the resulting shortage must not be made good by fresh appointments.

Article 126.

The period of enlistment for non-commissioned officers and privates must be for a total period of not less than 12 consecutive years, including at least 6 years with the colours.

The proportion of men discharged before the expiration of the period of their enlistment for reasons of health or as a result of disciplinary measures or for any other reasons must not in any year exceed one twentieth of the total strength fixed by Article 120. If this proportion is unavoidably exceeded, the resulting shortage must not be made good by fresh enlistments.

CHAPTER IV.

SCHOOLS, EDUCATIONAL ESTABLISHMENTS, MILITARY CLUBS AND SOCIETIES.

Article 127.

The number of students admitted to attend the courses in military schools shall be strictly in proportion to the vacancies to be filled in the cadres of officers. The students and the cadres shall be included in the effectives fixed by Article 120 of the present Section.

Consequently all military schools not required for this purpose shall be abolished.

Article 128.

Educational establishments, other than those referred to in Article 127, as well as all sporting and other clubs, must not occupy themselves with any military matters.

CHAPTER V.

ARMAMENT, MUNITIONS AND MATERIAL, FORTIFICATIONS.

Article 129.

On the expiration of three months from the coming into force of the present Treaty, the armament of the Austrian Army shall not exceed the figures fixed per thousand men in Table V annexed to this Section. Any excess in relation to effectives shall only be used for such replacements as may eventually be necessary.

Article 130.

The stock of munitions at the disposal of the Austrian Army shall not exceed the amounts fixed in Table V annexed to this Section.

Within three months from the coming into force of the present Treaty the Austrian Government shall deposit any existing surplus of armament and munitions in such places as shall be notified to it by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers.

No other stock, depot or reserve of munitions shall be formed.

Article 131.

The number and calibre of guns constituting the fixed normal armament of fortified places existing at the present moment in Austria shall be immediately notified to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, and will constitute maximum amounts which must not be exceeded.

Within three months of the coming into force of the present Treaty the maximum stock of ammunition for these guns shall be reduced to and maintained at the following uniform rates:

1500 rounds per gun for those the calibre of which is 105 mm. and under;

500 rounds per gun for those of higher calibre.

Article 132.

The manufacture of arms, munitions and war material shall only be carried on in one single factory, which shall be controlled by and belong to the State, and whose output shall be strictly limited to the manufacture of such arms, munitions and war material as is necessary for the military forces and armaments referred to in Articles 120, 123, 129, 130 and 131.

The manufacture of sporting weapons is not forbidden, provided that sporting weapons manufactured in Austria taking ball cartridge are not of the same calibre as that of military weapons used in any European army.

Within three months from the coming into force of the present Treaty, all other establishments for the manufacture, preparation, storage or design of arms, munitions or any other war material shall be closed down or converted to purely commercial uses.

Within the same length of time, all arsenals shall also be closed down, except those to be used as depots for the authorised stocks of munitions, and their staffs discharged.

The plant of any establishments or arsenals in excess of the amount required for the manufacture authorised shall be rendered useless or converted to purely commercial purposes in accordance with the decisions of the Military Inter-Allied Commission of Control referred to in Article 153.

Article 133.

Within three months from the coming into force of the present Treaty, all arms, munitions and war material, including any kind of anti-aircraft material, of whatever origin, existing in Austria in excess of the quantity authorised shall be handed over to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers.

Delivery shall take place at such points in Austrian territory as may be appointed by the said Powers, who shall also decide on the disposal of such material.

Article 134.

The importation into Austria of arms, munitions and war material of all kinds is strictly forbidden.

The manufacture for foreign countries and the exportation of arms, munitions and war material shall also be forbidden.

Article 135.

The use of flame throwers, asphyxiating, poisonous or other gases, and all similar liquids, materials or devices being prohibited, their manufacture and importation are strictly forbidden in Austria.

Material specially intended for the manufacture, storage or use of the said products or devices is equally forbidden.

The manufacture and importation into Austria of armoured cars, tanks or any similar machines suitable for use in war are equally forbidden.

Section II.

NAVAL CLAUSES.

Article 136.

From the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty all Austro-Hungarian warships, submarines included, are declared to be finally surrendered to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers.

All the monitors, torpedo boats and armed vessels of the Danube Flotilla will be surrendered to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers.

Austria will, however, have the right to maintain on the Danube for the use of the river police three patrol boats to be selected by the Commission referred to in Article 154 of the present Treaty.

Article 137.

The Austro-Hungarian auxiliary cruisers and fleet auxiliaries enumerated below will be disarmed and treated as merchant ships:

Bosnia.
Gablonz.
Carolina.
Africa.
Tirol.
Argentina.
Lussin.

Article 138.

All warships, including submarines, now under construction in Austrian ports, or in ports which previously belonged to the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, shall be broken up.

The work of breaking up these vessels will be commenced as soon as possible after the coming into force of the present Treaty.

Article 139.

Articles, machinery and material arising from the breaking up of Austro-Hungarian warships of all kinds, whether surface vessels or submarines, may not be used except for purely industrial or commercial purposes.

They may not be sold or disposed of to foreign countries.

Article 140.

The construction or acquisition of any submarine, even for commercial purposes, shall be forbidden in Austria.

Article 141.

All arms, ammunition and other naval war material, including mines and torpedoes, which belonged to Austria-Hungary at the date of the signature of the Armistice of November 3, 1918, are declared to be finally surrendered to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers.

Article 142.

Austria is held responsible for the delivery (Articles 136 and 141), the disarmament (Article 137), the demolition (Article 138), as well as the disposal (Article 137) and the use (Article 139) of the objects mentioned in the preceding Articles only so far as these remain in her own territory.

Article 143.

During the three months following the coming into force of the present Treaty, the Austrian high-power wireless telegraphy station at Vienna shall not be used for the transmission of messages concerning naval, military or political questions of interest to Austria, or any State which has been allied to Austria-Hungary in the war, without the assent of Principal Allied and Associated Powers. This station may be used for commercial purposes, but only under the supervision of the said Powers, who will decide the wave-length to be used.

During the same period Austria shall not build any more high-power wireless telegraphy stations in her own territory or that of Hungary, Germany, Bulgaria or Turkey.

Section III.

AIR CLAUSES.

Article 144.

The armed forces of Austria must not include any military or naval air forces.

No dirigible shall be kept.

Article 145.

Within two months from the coming into force of the present Treaty, the personnel of the air forces on the rolls of the Austrian land and sea forces shall be demobilised.

Article 146.

Until the complete evacuation of Austrian territory by the Allied and Associated troops the aircraft of the Allied and Associated Powers shall enjoy in Austria freedom of passage through the air, freedom of transit and of landing.

Article 147.

During the six months following the coming into force of the present Treaty, the manufacture, importation and exportation of aircraft, parts of aircraft, engines for aircraft, and parts of engines for aircraft shall be forbidden in all Austrian territory.

Article 148.

On the coming into force of the present Treaty, all military and naval aeronautical material must be delivered by Austria and at her expense to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers.

Delivery must be effected at such places as the Governments of the said Powers may select, and must be completed within three months.

In particular, this material will include all items under the following heads which are or have been in use or were designed for warlike purposes:

Complete aeroplanes and seaplanes, as well as those being manufactured, repaired or assembled.

Dirigibles able to take the air, being manufactured, repaired or assembled.

Plant for the manufacture of hydrogen.

Dirigible sheds and shelters of every kind for aircraft.

Pending their delivery, dirigibles will, at the expense of Austria, be maintained inflated with hydrogen; the plant for the manufacture of hydrogen, as well as the sheds for dirigibles, may, at the discretion of the said Powers, be left to Austria until the time when the dirigibles are handed over.

Engines for aircraft.

Nacelles and fuselages.

Armament (guns, machine guns, light machine guns, bomb-dropping apparatus, torpedo apparatus, synchronisation apparatus, aiming apparatus).

Munitions (cartridges, shells, bombs loaded or unloaded, stocks of explosives or of material for their manufacture).

Instruments for use on aircraft.

Wireless apparatus and photographic or cinematograph apparatus for use on aircraft.

Component parts of any of the items under the preceding heads.

The material referred to above shall not be removed without special permission from the said Governments.

Section IV.

INTER-ALLIED COMMISSIONS OF CONTROL.

Article 149.

All the Military, Naval and Air Clauses contained in the present Treaty for the execution of which a time limit is prescribed shall be executed by Austria under the control of Inter-Allied Commissions specially appointed for this purpose by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers.

The above-mentioned Commissions will represent the Governments of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers in dealing with the Austrian Government in all matters concerning the execution of the Military, Naval and Air Clauses. They will communicate to the Austrian authorities the decisions which the Principal Allied and Associated Powers have reserved the right to take or which the execution of the said Clauses may necessitate.

Article 150.

The Inter-Allied Commissions of Control may establish their organisations at Vienna and shall be entitled, as often as they think desirable, to proceed to any point whatever in Austrian territory, or to send a sub-commission, or to authorise one or more of their members to go, to any such point.

Article 151.

The Austrian Government must furnish to the Inter-Allied Commissions of Control all such information and documents as the latter may deem necessary to insure the execution of their mission, and all means (both in personnel and in material) which the above-mentioned Commissions may need to ensure the complete execution of the Military, Naval or Air Clauses.

The Austrian Government must attach a qualified representative to each Inter-Allied Commission of Control with the duty of receiving from the latter any communications which it may have to address to the Austrian Government, and furnishing it with, or procuring, all information or documents demanded.

Article 152.

The upkeep and cost of the Commissions of Control and the expense involved by their work shall be borne by Austria.

Article 153.

It will be the special duty of the Military Inter-Allied Commission of Control to receive from the Austrian Government the notifications relating to the location of the stocks and depots of munitions, the armament of the fortified works, fortresses and forts, and the location of the works or factories for the production of arms, munitions, and war material and their operations.

It will take delivery of the arms, munitions, war material and plant intended for war construction, will select the points where such delivery is to be effected, and will supervise the works of destruction, and rendering things useless, or of transformation of material, which are to be carried out in accordance with the present Treaty.

Article 154.

It will be the special duty of the Naval Inter-Allied Commission of Control to proceed to the building yards and to supervise the breaking-up of the ships which are under construction there, to take delivery of arms, munitions and naval war material, and to supervise the destruction and breaking-up provided for.

The Austrian Government must furnish to the Naval Inter-Allied Commission of Control all such information and documents as the Commission may deem necessary to ensure the complete execution of the Naval Clauses, in particular the designs of the warships, the composition of their armaments, the details and models of the guns, munitions, torpedoes, mines, explosives, wireless telegraphic apparatus, and in general everything relating to naval war material, as well as all legislative or administrative documents or regulations.

Article 155.

It will be the special duty of the Aeronautical Inter-Allied Commission of Control to make an inventory of the aeronautical material which is actually in the possession of the Austrian Government, to inspect aeroplane, balloon and motor manufactories, and factories producing arms, munitions and explosives capable of being used by aircraft, to visit all aerodromes, sheds, landing grounds, parks and depots which are now in Austrian territory, and to authorise where necessary a removal of material and to take delivery of such material.

The Austrian Government must furnish to the Aeronautical Inter-Allied Commission of Control all such information and legislative, administrative or other documents which the Commission may consider necessary to ensure the complete execution of the Air Clauses, and, in particular, a list of the personnel belonging to all the air services of Austria and of the existing material, as well as of that in process of manufacture or on order, and a list of all establishments working for aviation, of their positions, and of all sheds and landing grounds.

Section V.

GENERAL ARTICLES.

Article 156.

After the expiration of a period of three months from the coming into force of the present Treaty, the Austrian laws must have been modified and shall be maintained by the Austrian Government in conformity with this Part of the present Treaty.

Within the same period all the administrative or other measures relating to the execution of this Part must have been taken by the Austrian Government.

Article 157.

The following portions of the Armistice of November 3, 1918: paragraphs 2 and 3 of Chapter I (Military Clauses), paragraphs 2, 3, 6 of Chapter I of the annexed Protocol (Military Clauses), remain in force so far as they are not inconsistent with the above stipulations.

Article 158.

Austria undertakes, from the coming into force of the present Treaty, not to accredit nor to send to any foreign country any military, naval or air mission, nor to allow any such mission to leave her territory; Austria further agrees to take the necessary measures to prevent Austrian nationals from leaving her territory to enlist in the Army, Navy or Air service of any foreign Power, or to be attached to such Army, Navy or Air service for the purpose of assisting in the military, naval or air training thereof, or generally for the purpose of giving military, naval or air instruction in any foreign country.

The Allied and Associated Powers undertake, so far as they are concerned, that from the coming into force of the present Treaty they will not enrol in nor attach to their armies or naval or air forces any Austrian national for the purpose of assisting in the military training of such armies or naval or air forces, or otherwise employ any such Austrian national as military, naval or aeronautic instructor.

The present provision does not, however, affect the right of France to recruit for the Foreign Legion in accordance with French military laws and regulations.

Article 159.

So long as the present Treaty remains in force, Austria undertakes to submit to any investigation which the Council of the League of Nations, acting if need be by a majority vote, may consider necessary.

PART VI.

PRISONERS OF WAR AND GRAVES.

Section I.

PRISONERS OF WAR.

Article 160.

The repatriation of Austrian prisoners of war and interned civilians shall take place as soon as possible after the coming into force of the present Treaty, and shall be carried out with the greatest rapidity.

Article 161.

The repatriation of Austrian prisoners of war and interned civilians shall, in accordance with Article 160, be carried out by a Commission composed of representatives of the Allied and Associated Powers on the one part and of the Austrian Government on the other part.

For each of the Allied and Associated Powers a Sub-Commission composed exclusively of representatives of the interested Power and of delegates of the Austrian Government shall regulate the details of carrying into effect the repatriation of prisoners of war.

Article 162.

From the time of their delivery into the hands of the Austrian authorities, the prisoners of war and interned civilians are to be returned without delay to their homes by the said Authorities.

Those among them who, before the war, were habitually resident in territory occupied by the troops of the Allied and Associated Powers are likewise to be sent to their homes, subject to the consent and control of the military authorities of the Allied and Associated armies of occupation.

Article 163.

The whole cost of repatriation from the moment of starting shall be borne by the Austrian Government, who shall also provide means of transport and working personnel as considered necessary by the Commission referred to in Article 161.

Article 164.

Prisoners of war and interned civilians awaiting disposal or undergoing sentence for offences against discipline shall be repatriated irrespective of the completion of their sentence or of the proceedings pending against them.

This stipulation shall not apply to prisoners of war and interned civilians punished for offences committed subsequent to June 1, 1919.

During the period pending their repatriation, all prisoners of war and interned civilians shall remain subject to the existing regulations, more especially as regards work and discipline.

Article 165.

Prisoners of war and interned civilians who are awaiting trial or undergoing sentence for offences other than those against discipline may be detained.

Article 166.

The Austrian Government undertakes to admit to its territory without distinction all persons liable to repatriation.

Prisoners of war or Austrian nationals who do not desire to be repatriated may be excluded from repatriation; but the Allied and Associated Governments reserve to themselves the right either to repatriate them or to take them to a neutral country or to allow them to reside in their own territories.

The Austrian Government undertakes not to institute any exceptional proceedings against these persons or their families nor to take any repressive or vexatious measures of any kind whatsoever against them on this account.

Article 167.

The Allied and Associated Governments reserve the right to make the repatriation of Austrian prisoners of war or Austrian nationals in their hands conditional upon the immediate notification and release by the Austrian Government of any prisoners of war and other nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers who are still held in Austria against their will.

Article 168.

The Austrian Government undertakes:

(1) To give every facility to Commissions to enquire into the cases of those who cannot be traced; to furnish such Commissions with all necessary means of transport; to allow them access to camps, prisons, hospitals and all other places; and to place at their diposal all documents whether public or private which would facilitate their enquiries;

(2) To impose penalties upon any Austrian officials or private persons who have concealed the presence of any nationals of any of the Allied or Associated Powers, or who have neglected to reveal the presence of any such after it had come to their knowledge.

Article 169.

The Austrian Government undertakes to restore without delay from the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty all articles, money, securities and documents which have belonged to nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers and which have been retained by the Austrian authorities.

Article 170.

The High Contracting Parties waive reciprocally all repayment of sums due for the maintenance of prisoners of war in their respective territories.

Section II.

GRAVES.

Article 171.

The Allied and Associated Governments and the Austrian Government will cause to be respected and maintained the graves of the soldiers and sailors buried in their respective territories.

They agree to recognise any Commission appointed by the several Governments for the purpose of identifying, registering, caring for or erecting suitable memorials over the said graves, and to facilitate the discharge of its duties.

Furthermore, they agree to afford, so far as the provisions of their laws and the requirements of public health allow, every facility for giving effect to requests that the bodies of their soldiers and sailors may be transferred to their own country.

Article 172.

The graves of prisoners of war and interned civilians who are nationals of the different belligerent States and have died in captivity shall be properly maintained in accordance with Article 171 of this Part of the present Treaty.

The Allied and Associated Powers on the one part and the Austrian Government on the other part reciprocally undertake also to furnish to each other:

(1) A complete list of those who have died, together with all information useful for identification;

(2) All information as to the number and positions of the graves of all those who have been buried without identification.

PART VII.

PENALTIES.

Article 173.

The Austrian Government recognises the right of the Allied and Associated Powers to bring before military tribunals persons accused of having committed acts in violation of the laws and customs of war. Such persons shall, if found guilty, be sentenced to punishments laid down by law. This provision will apply notwithstanding any proceedings or prosecutions before a tribunal in Austria or in the territory of her allies.

The Austrian Government shall hand over to the Allied and Associated Powers, or to such one of them as shall so request, all persons accused of having committed an act in violation of the laws and customs of war, who are specified either by name or by the rank, office or employment which they held under the Austrian authorities.

Article 174.

Persons guilty of criminal acts against the nationals of one of the Allied and Associated Powers will be brought before the military tribunals of that Power.

Persons guilty of criminal acts against the nationals of more than one of the Allied and Associated Powers will be brought before military tribunals composed of members of the military tribunals of the Powers concerned.

In every case the accused will be entitled to name his own counsel.

Article 175.

The Austrian Government undertakes to furnish all documents and information of every kind, the production of which may be considered necessary to ensure the full knowledge of the incriminating acts, the discovery of offenders and the just appreciation of responsibility.

Article 176.

The provisions of Articles 173 to 175 apply similarly to the Governments of the States to which territory belonging to the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy has been assigned, in so far as concerns persons accused of having committed acts contrary to the laws and customs of war who are in the territory or at the disposal of the said States.

If the persons in question have acquired the nationality of one of the said States, the Government of such State undertakes to take, at the request of the Power concerned and in agreement with it, all the measures necessary to ensure the prosecution and punishment of such persons.

Article 177.

The Allied and Associated Governments affirm and Austria accepts the responsibility of Austria and her allies for causing the loss and damage to which the Allied and Associated Governments and their nationals have been subjected as a consequence of the war imposed upon them by the aggression of Austria-Hungary and her allies.

Article 178.

The Allied and Associated Governments recognise that the resources of Austria are not adequate, after taking into account the permanent diminutions of such resources which will result from other provisions of the present Treaty, to make complete reparation for such loss and damage.

The Allied and Associated Governments however require, and Austria undertakes, that she will make compensation as hereinafter determined for damage done to the civilian population of the Allied and Associated Powers and to their property during the period of the belligerency of each as an Allied and Associated Power against Austria by the said aggression by land, by sea and from the air, and in general damage as defined in Annex I hereto.

Article 179.

The amount of such damage for which compensation is to be made by Austria shall be determined by an Inter-Allied Commission to be called the Reparation Commission and constituted in the form and with the powers set forth hereunder and in Annexes Nos. II–V inclusive hereto. The Commission is the same as that provided for under Article 233 of the Treaty with Germany, subject to any modifications resulting from the present Treaty. The Commission shall constitute a Section to consider the special questions raised by the application of the present Treaty: this Section shall have consultative power only, except in cases in which the Commission shall delegate to it such powers as may be deemed convenient.

The Reparation Commission shall consider the claims and give to the Austrian Government a just opportunity to be heard.

The Commission shall concurrently draw up a schedule of payments prescribing the time and manner for securing and discharging by Austria, within thirty years dating from May 1, 1921, that part of the debt which shall have been assigned to her after the Commission has decided whether Germany is in a position to pay the balance of the total amount of claims presented against Germany and her allies and approved by the Commission. If, however, within the period mentioned, Austria fails to discharge her obligations, any balance remaining unpaid may, within the discretion of the Commission, be postponed for settlement in subsequent years or may be handled otherwise in such manner as the Allied and Associated Governments acting in accordance with the procedure laid down in this Part of the present Treaty shall determine.

Article 180.

The Reparation Commission shall, after May 1, 1921, from time to time consider the resources and capacity of Austria, and, after giving her representatives a just opportunity to be heard, shall have discretion to extend the date and to modify the form of payments such as are to be provided for in accordance with Article 179, but not to cancel any part except with the specific authority of the several Governments represented on the Commission.

Article 181.

Austria shall pay in the course of the years 1919, 1920 and the first four months of 1921, in such instalments and in such manner (whether in gold, commodities, ships, securities or otherwise) as the Reparation Commission may lay down, a reasonable sum which shall be determined by the Commission.

Out of this sum the expenses of the armies of occupation subsequent to the Armistice of November 3, 1918, shall first be met, and such supplies of food and raw materials as may be judged by the Governments of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers essential to enable Austria to meet her obligations for reparation may also, with the approval of the said Governments, be paid for out of the above sum. The balance shall be reckoned towards the liquidation of the amount due for reparation.

* * * * * * *

ANNEX I.

Compensation may be claimed from Austria in accordance with Article 178 above in respect of the total damage under the following categories:

(1) Damage to injured persons and to surviving dependents by personal injury to or death of civilians caused by acts of war, including bombardment or other attacks on land, on sea or from the air, and of the direct consequences thereof and of all operations of war by the two groups or belligerents wherever arising;

(2) Damage caused by Austria or her allies to civilian victims of acts of cruelty, violence or maltreatment (including injuries to life or health as a consequence of imprisonment, deportation, internment or evacuation, of exposure at sea, or of being forced to labour) wherever arising, and to the surviving dependents of such victims;

(3) Damage caused by Austria or her allies in their own territory or in occupied or invaded territory to civilian victims of all acts injurious to health or capacity to work or to honour, as well as to the surviving dependents of such victims;

(4) Damage caused by any kind of maltreatment of prisoners of war;

(5) As damage caused to the peoples of the Allied and Associated Powers, all pensions or compensations in the way of pensions to naval and military victims of war, including members of the air force, whether mutilated, wounded, sick or invalided, and to the dependents of such victims, the amount due to the Allied and Associated Governments being calculated for each individual as being the capitalised cost of such pensions and compensations at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty on the basis of the scales in force in France on May 1, 1919;

(6) The cost of assistance by the Governments of the Allied and Associated Powers to prisoners of war, to their families and dependents;

(7) Allowances by the Governments of the Allied and Associated Powers to the families and dependents of mobilised persons or persons serving with the forces, the amount due to them for each calendar year in which hostilities occurred being calculated for each Government on the basis of the average scale for such payments in force in France during that year;

(8) Damage caused to civilians by being forced by Austria or her allies to labour without just remuneration;

(9) Damage in respect of all property, wherever situated, belonging to any of the Allied or Associated States or their nationals, with the exception of naval or military works or materials, which has been carried off, seized, injured, or destroyed by the acts of Austria or her allies on land, on sea, or from the air, or damage directly in consequence of hostilities or of any operations of war;

(10) Damage in the form of levies, fines and other similar exactions imposed by Austria or her allies upon the civilian population.

ANNEX II.

1.

The Commission referred to in Article 179 shall be called the "Reparation Commission" and is hereafter referred to as the "Commission."

2.

The Delegates to this Commission shall be appointed by the United States of America, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, Belgium, Greece, Poland, Roumania, the Serb-Croat-Slovene State and Czecho-Slovakia. The United States of America, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan and Belgium shall each appoint a Delegate. The other five Powers shall appoint a Delegate to represent them all under the conditions indicated in the third sub-paragraph of paragraph 3 hereafter. At the time when each Delegate is appointed there shall also be appointed an Assistant Delegate, who will take his place in case of illness or necessary absence, but at other times will only have the right to be present at the proceedings without taking any part therein.

On no occasion shall Delegates of more than five of the above Powers have the right to take part in the proceedings of the Commission and to record their votes. The Delegates of the United States, Great Britain, France and Italy shall have this right on all occasions other than those referred to below. The Delegate of Belgium shall have this right on all occasions other than those referred to below. The Delegate of Japan will have this right when questions relating to damage at sea are under consideration. The Delegate representing the five remaining Powers mentioned above shall have this right when questions relating to Austria, Hungary or Bulgaria are under consideration.

Each of the Governments represented on the Commission shall have the right to withdraw after giving twelve months' notice to the Commission and confirming it six months after the date of the original notification.

Such of the Allied and Associated Powers as may be interested shall have the right to name a Delegate to be present and act as assessor only while their respective claims and interests are under examination or discussion, but without the right to vote.

The Section to be established by the Commission under Article 179 of the present Part shall include representatives of the following Powers: the United States of America, Great Britain, France, Italy, Greece, Poland, Roumania, the Serb-Croat-Slovene State and Czecho-Slovakia. This composition of the Section shall in no way prejudge the admissibility of any claims. In voting, the representatives of the United States of America, Great Britain, France and Italy shall each have two votes.

The representatives of the five remaining Powers mentioned above shall appoint a Delegate to represent them all, who shall sit upon the Reparation Commission in the circumstances described in paragraph 2 of the present Annex. This delegate, who shall be appointed for one year, shall be chosen successively from the nationals of each of the said five Powers.

In the case of death, resignation, or recall of any Delegate, Assistant Delegate or Assessor, a successor to him shall be nominated as soon as possible.

5.

The Commission shall have its principal permanent bureau in Paris, and shall hold its first meeting in Paris as soon as practicable after the coming into force of the present Treaty, and thereafter will meet in such place or places and at such time as may deemed convenient and as may be necessary for the most expeditious discharge of its duties.

6.

At its first meeting the Commission shall elect from among the Delegates referred to above a Chairman and a Vice-Chairman, who shall hold office for a year and shall be eligible for re-election. If a vacancy in the chairmanship or vice-chairmanship should occur during the annual period, the Commission shall proceed to a new election for the remainder of the said period.

7.

The Commission is authorised to appoint all necessary officers, agents and employees who may be required for the execution of its functions, and to fix their remuneration; to constitute Sections or Committees, whose members need not necessarily be members of the Commission, and to take all executive steps necessary for the purpose of discharging its duties; and to delegate authority and discretion to officers, agents, Sections and Committees.

8.

All the proceedings of the Commission shall be private unless on particular occasions the Commission shall otherwise determine for special reasons.

9.

The Commission shall be required, if the Austrian Government so desire, to hear within a period which it will fix from time to time evidence and arguments on the part of Austria on any questions connected with her capacity to pay.

10.

The Commission shall consider the claims and give to the Austrian Government a just opportunity to be heard, but not to take any part whatever in the decisions of the Commission.

The Commission shall afford a similar opportunity to the allies of Austria when it shall consider that their interests are in question.

11.

The Commission shall not be bound by any particular code or rules of law or by any particular rule of evidence or of procedure, but shall be guided by justice, equity and good faith. Its decisions must follow the same principles and rules in all cases where they are applicable. It will establish rules relating to methods of proof of claims. It may act on any trustworthy modes of computation.

12.

The Commission shall have all the powers conferred upon it and shall exercise all the functions assigned to it by the present Treaty.

The Commission shall, in general, have wide latitude as to its control and handling of the whole reparation problem as dealt with in this Part, and shall have authority to interpret its provisions. Subject to the provisions of the present Treaty, the Commission is constituted by the several Allied and Associated Governments referred to in paragraphs 2 and 3 above as the exclusive agency of the said Governments respectively for receiving, selling, holding and distributing the reparation payments to be made by Austria. The Commission must comply with the following conditions and provisions:

(a) Whatever part of the full amount of the proved claims is not paid in gold or in ships, securities, commodities or otherwise, Austria shall be required, under such conditions as the Commission may determine, to cover by way of guarantee, by an equivalent issue of bonds, obligations or otherwise, in order to constitute an acknowledgment of the said part of the debt.

(b) In periodically estimating Austria's capacity to pay the Commission shall examine the Austrian system of taxation; first, to the end that the sums for reparation which Austria is required to pay shall become a charge upon all her revenues prior to that for the service or discharge of any domestic loan, and, secondly, so as to satisfy itself that in general the Austrian scheme of taxation is fully as heavy proportionately as that of any of the Powers represented on the Commission.

The Reparation Commission shall receive instructions to take account of:

(1) The actual economic and financial position of Austrian territory as delimited by the present Treaty; and

(2) The diminution of its resources and of its capacity for payment resulting from the clauses of the present Treaty.

As long as the position of Austria is not modified the Commission shall take account of these considerations in fixing the final amount of the obligations to be imposed on Austria, the payments by which these are to be discharged, and any postponement of payment of interest which may be asked for by Austria.

(c) The Commission shall, as provided in Article 181, take from Austria, by way of security for and acknowledgment of her debt, gold bearer bonds free of all taxes or charges of every description established or to be established by the Austrian Government or by any authorities subject to them. These bonds will be delivered at any time that may be judged expedient by the Commission, and in three portions, of which the respective amounts will be also fixed by the Commission, the crowns gold being payable in conformity with Article 213 of Part X (Financial Clauses) of the present treaty:

(1) A first issue in bearer bonds payable not later than May 1, 1921, without interest. There shall be specially applied to the amortisation of these bonds the payments which Austria is pledged to make in conformity with Article 181 of this Part, after deduction of the sums used for the reimbursement of the expenses of the armies of occupation and other payments for foodstuffs and raw materials. Such bonds as may not have been redeemed by May 1, 1921, shall then be exchanged for new bonds of the same type as those provided for below (paragraph 12, (c) 2).

(2) A second issue in bearer bonds bearing interest at 2½ per cent. between 1921 and 1926, and thereafter at 5 per cent. with an additional 1 per cent. for amortisation beginning in 1926 on the whole amount of the issue.

(3) An undertaking in writing to issue, when, but not until, the Commission is satisfied that Austria can meet the interest and sinking fund obligations, a further instalment of bearer bonds bearing interest at 5 per cent., the time and mode of payment of principal and interest to be determined by the Commission.

The dates for the payment of interest, the manner of employing the amortisation fund and all other questions relating to the issue, management and regulation of the bond issue shall be determined by the Commission from time to time.

Further issues by way of acknowledgment and security may be required as the Commission subsequently determines from time to time.

In case the Reparation Commission should proceed to fix definitely and no longer provisionally the sum of the common charges to be borne by Austria as a result of the claims of the Allied and Associated Powers, the Commission shall immediately annual all bonds which have been issued in access of this sum.

(d) In the event of bonds, obligations or other evidence of indebtedness issued by Austria by way of security for or acknowledgment of her reparation debt being disposed of outright, not by way of pledge, to persons other than the several Governments in whose favour Austria's original reparation indebtedness was created, an amount of such reparation indebtedness shall be deemed to be extinguished corresponding to the nominal value of the bonds, etc., so disposed of outright, and the obligation of Austria in respect of such bonds shall be confined to her liabilities to the holders of the bonds, as expressed upon their face.

(e) The damage for repairing, reconstructing and rebuilding property situated in the invaded and devastated districts, including re-installation of furniture, machinery and other equipment, will be calculated according to the cost at the date when the work is done.

(f) Decisions of the Commission relating to the total or partial cancellation of the capital or interest of any of the verified debt of Austria must be accompanied by a statement of its reasons.

As to voting the Commission will observe the following rules:

When a decision of the Commission is taken, the votes of all the Delegates entitled to vote, or in the absence of any of them, of their assistant Delegates, shall be recorded. Abstention from voting is to be treated as a vote against the proposal under discussion. Assessors shall have no vote.

On the following questions unanimity is necessary:

(a) Questions involving the sovereignty of any of the Allied and Associated Powers or the cancellation of the whole or any part of the debt or obligations of Austria;

(b) Questions of determining the amount and conditions of bonds or other obligations to be issued by the Austrian Government and of fixing the time and manner for selling, negotiating or distributing such bonds;

(c) Any postponement, total or partial, beyond the end of 1930, of the payment of instalments falling due between May 1, 1921, and the end of 1926 inclusive.

(d) Any postponement, total or partial, or any instalments falling due after 1926 for a period exceeding three years.

(e) Questions of applying in any particular case a method of measuring damages different from that which has been previously applied in a similar case.

(f) Questions of the interpretation of the provisions of this Part of the present Treaty.

All other questions shall be decided by the vote of the majority.

In the case of any difference of opinion among the Delegates, which cannot be solved by reference to their Governments, upon the question whether a given case is one which requires a unanimous vote for its decision or not, such difference shall be referred to the immediate arbitration of some impartial person to be agreed upon by their Governments, whose award the Allied and Associated Governments agree to accept.

14.

Decisions of the Commission, in accordance with the powers conferred upon it, shall forthwith become binding and may be put into immediate execution without further proceedings.

15.

The Commission shall issue to each of the interested Powers in such form as the Commission shall fix:

(1) A certificate stating that it holds for the account of the said Power bonds of the issues mentioned above, the said certificate on the demand of the Power concerned being divisible into a number of parts not exceeding five;

(2) From time to time certificates stating the goods delivered by Austria on account of her reparation debt which it holds for the account of the said Power.

Such certificates shall be registered and, upon notice to the Commission, may be transferred by endorsement.

When bonds are issued for sale or negotiation, and when goods are delivered by the Commission, certificates to an equivalent value must be withdrawn.

Interest shall be debited to Austria as from May 1, 1921, in respect of her debt as determined by the Commission after allowing for sums already covered by cash payments or their equivalent by bonds issued to the Commission or under Article 189. The rate of interest shall be 5 per cent. unless the Commission shall determine at some future time that circumstances justify a variation of this rate.

The Commission, in fixing on May 1, 1921, the total amount of the debt of Austria, may take account of interest due on sums arising out of reparation and of material damage as from November 11, 1918 up to May 1, 1921.

17.

In case of default by Austria in the performance of any obligation under this part of the present Treaty the Commission will forthwith give notice of such default to each of the interested Powers and may make such recommendations as to the action to be taken in consequence of such default as it may think necessary.

18.

The measures which the Allied and Associated Powers shall have the right to take, in the case of voluntary default by Austria, and which Austria agrees not to regard as acts of war, may include economic and financial prohibitions and reprisals and in general such other measures as the respective Governments may determine to be necessary in the circumstances.

19.

Payments required to be made in gold or its equivalent on account of the proved claims of the Allied and Associated Powers may at any time be accepted by the Commission in the form of chattels, properties, commodities, businesses, rights, concessions within or without Austrian territory, ships, bonds, shares or securities of any kind or currencies of Austria or other States, the value of such substitutes for gold being fixed at a fair and just amount by the Commission itself.

20.

The Commission in fixing or accepting payment in specified properties or rights shall have due regard for any legal or equitable interests of the Allied and Associated Powers or of their nationals therein.

21.

No member of the Commission shall be responsible, except to the Government appointing him, for any action or omission as such member. No one of the Allied and Associated Governments assumes any responsibility in respect of any other Government.

22.

Subject to the provisions of the present Treaty this Annex may be amended by the unanimous decision of the Governments represented from time to time upon the Commission.

23.

When all the amounts due from Austria and her allies under the present Treaty or the decisions of the Commission have been discharged, and all sums received, or their equivalents, have been distributed to the Powers interested, the Commission shall be dissolved.

ANNEX III.

Austria recognises the right of the Allied and Associated Powers to the replacement ton for ton (gross tonnage) and class for class of all merchant ships and fishing boats lost or damaged owing to the war.

Nevertheless and in spite of the fact that the tonnage of Austrian shipping at present in existence is much less than that lost by the Allied and Associated Powers in consequence of the aggression of Austria and her allies, the right thus recognised will be enforced on the Austrian ships and boats under the following conditions:

The Austrian Government on behalf of themselves, and so as to bind all other persons interested, cede to the Allied and Associated Governments the property in all merchant ships and fishing boats belonging to nationals of the former Austrian Empire.

The Austrian Government will, within two months of the coming into force of the present Treaty, deliver to the Reparation Commission all the ships and boats mentioned in paragraph 1.

3.

The ships and boats in paragraph 1 include all ships and boats which (a) fly or may be entitled to fly the Austro-Hungarian merchant flag and are registered in a port of the former Austrian Empire, or (b) are owned by any national, company or corporation of the former Austrian Empire or by any company or corporation belonging to a country other than an Allied or Associated country and under the control or direction of nationals of the former Austrian Empire: or (c) which are now under construction (1) in the former Austrian Empire (2) in other than Allied or Associated countries for the account of any national company or corporation of the former Austrian Empire.

For the purpose of providing documents of title for the ships and boats to be handed over as above mentioned, the Austrian Government will:

(a) Deliver to the Reparation Commission in respect of each vessel a bill of sale or other document of title evidencing the transfer to the Commission of the entire property in the vessel, free from all encumbrances, charges and liens of all kinds as the Commission may require;

(b) Take all measures that may be indicated by the Reparation Commission for ensuring that the ships themselves shall be placed at its disposal.

Austria undertakes to restore in kind and in normal condition of upkeep to the Allied and Associated Powers within two months of the coming into force of the present Treaty in accordance with procedure to be laid down by the Reparation Commission any boats and other movable appliances belonging to inland navigation which, since July 28, 1914, have by any means whatever come into her possession or into the possession of her nationals and which can be identified.

With a view to make good the loss in inland navigation tonnage from whatever cause arising which has been incurred during the war by the Allied and Associated Powers, and which cannot be made good by means of the restitution prescribed above, Austria agrees to cede to the Reparation Commission a portion of the Austrian river fleet up to the amount of the loss mentioned above, provided such cession shall not exceed 20 per cent. of the river fleet as it existed on November 3, 1918.

The conditions of this cession shall be settled by the arbitrators referred to in Article 300 of Part XII (Ports, Waterways and Railways) of the present Treaty, who are charged with the settlement of difficulties relating to the apportionment of river tonnage resulting from the new international régime applicable to certain river systems or from the territorial changes affecting those systems.

Austria agrees to take any measures that may be indicated to her by the Reparation Commission for obtaining a full title to the property in all ships which have, during the war, been transferred or are in process of transfer to neutral flags without the consent of the Allied and Associated Governments.

7.

Austria waives all claims of any description against the Allied and Associated Governments and their nationals in respect of the detention, employment, loss or damage of any Austrian ships or boats.

8.

Austria renounces all claims to vessels or cargoes sunk by or in consequence of naval action and subsequently salved in which any of the Allied or Associated Governments or their nationals may have any interest either as owners, charterers, insurers, or otherwise, notwithstanding any decree of condemnation which may have been made by a Prize Court of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy or of its allies.

ANNEX IV.

1.

The Allied and Associated Powers require and Austria undertakes that in part satisfaction of her obligations expressed in this Part she will, as hereinafter provided, devote her economic resources directly to the physical restoration of the invaded areas of the Allied and Associated Powers to the extent that these Powers may determine.

2.

The Allied and Associated Governments may file with the Reparation Commission lists showing:

(a) Animals, machinery, equipment, tools and like articles of a commercial character which have been seized, consumed or destroyed by Austria, or destroyed in direct consequence of military operations, and which such Governments, for the purpose of meeting immediate and urgent needs, desire to have replaced by animals and articles of the same nature which are in being in Austrian territory at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty;

(b) Reconstruction materials (stones, bricks, refractory bricks, tiles, wood, window glass, steel, lime, cement, etc.), machinery, heating apparatus, furniture and like articles of a commercial character, which the said Governments desire to have produced and manufactured in Austria and delivered to them to permit of the restoration of the invaded areas.

3.

The lists relating to the articles mentioned in 2 (a) above shall be filed within sixty days after the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty.

The lists relating to the articles in 2 (b) shall be filed on or before December 31, 1919.

The lists shall contain all such details as are customary in commercial contracts dealing with the subject-matter, including specifications, dates of delivery (but not extending over more than four years) and places of delivery, but not prices or value, which shall be fixed as hereinafter provided by the Commission.

Immediately upon the filing of such lists with the Commission, the Commission shall consider the amount and number of the materials and animals mentioned in the lists provided for above which are to be required of Austria. In reaching a decision on this matter the Commission shall take into account such domestic requirements of Austria as it deems essential for the maintenance of Austrian social and economic life, the prices and dates at which similar articles can be obtained in the Allied and Associated countries as compared with those to be fixed for Austrian articles, and the general interest of the Allied and Associated Governments that the industrial life of Austria be not so disorganised as to affect adversely the ability of Austria to perform the other acts of reparation stipulated for.

Machinery, equipment, tools and like articles of a commercial character in actual industrial use are not, however, to be demanded of Austria unless there is no free stock of such articles respectively which is not in use and is available, and then not in excess of 30 per cent. of the quantity of such articles in use in any one establishment or undertaking.

The Commission shall give representatives of the Austrian Government an opportunity and a time to be heard as to their capacity to furnish the said materials, articles and animals.

The decision of the Commission shall thereupon and at the earliest possible moment be communicated to the Austrian Government and to the several interested Allied and Associated Governments.

The Austrian Government undertakes to deliver the materials, articles and animals as specified in the said communication, and the interested Allied and Associated Governments severally agree to accept the same, provided they conform to the specification given or are not, in the judgment of the Commission, unfit to be utilised in the work of reparation.

The Commission shall determine the value to be attached to the materials, articles and animals to be delivered in accordance with the foregoing, and the Allied or Associated Power receiving the same agrees to be charged with such value, and the amount thereof shall be treated as a payment by Austria to be divided in accordance with Article 183 of this Part of the present Treaty.

In cases where the right to require physical restoration as above provided is exercised, the Commission shall ensure that the amount to be credited against the reparation obligations of Austria shall be fair value for work done or material supplied by Austria, and that the claim made by the interested Power in respect of the damage so repaired by physical restoration shall be discharged to the extent of the proportion which the damage thus repaired bears to the whole of the damage thus claimed for.

As an immediate advance on account of the animals referred to in paragraph 2 above, Austria undertakes to deliver in equal monthly instalments in the three months following the coming into force of the present Treaty the following quantities of live stock:

TO THE ITALIAN GOVERNMENT.

4,000 milch cows of from 3 to 5 years;
1,000 heifers;
50 bulls from 18 months to 3 years;
1,000 calves;
1,000 working bullocks;
2,000 sows.

TO THE SERB-CROAT-SLOVENE GOVERNMENT.

1,000 milch cows of from 3 to 5 years;
300 heifers;
25 bulls from 18 months to 3 years;
1,000 calves;
500 working bullocks;
1,000 draught horses;
1,000 sheep.

TO THE ROUMANIAN GOVERNMENT.

1,000 milch cows of from 3 to 5 years;
500 heifers;
25 bulls from 18 months to 3 years;
1,000 calves;
500 working bullocks;
1,000 draught horses;
1,000 sheep.

The animals delivered shall be of average health and condition.

If the animals so delivered cannot be identified as animals taken away or seized, the value of such animals shall be credited against the reparation obligations of Austria in accordance with paragraph 5 of this Annex.

7.

As an immediate advance on account of the articles referred to in paragraph 2 above, Austria undertakes to deliver during the six months following the coming into force of the present Treaty in equal monthly instalments such supplies of furniture in hard and soft wood intended for sale in Austria as the Allied and Associated Powers shall ask for month by month through the Reparation Commission and which the Commission shall consider justified on the one hand by the seizures and destruction carried out in the course of the war on the territory of the said Powers and on the other hand proportionate to the supplies at the disposal of Austria. The price of the articles so supplied shall be carried to the credit of Austria under the conditions provided for in paragraph 5 of this Annex.

ANNEX V.

Austria shall give, as partial reparation, to the Allied and Associated Governments severally an option during the five years following the coming into force of the present Treaty for the annual delivery of the raw materials hereinafter enumerated: the amounts delivered to bear the same relation to their annual importations of these materials before the war from Austria-Hungary as the resources of Austria as now delimited by the present Treaty bear to the resources before the war of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy.

Timber and timber manufactures;
Iron and iron alloys;
Magnesite.

2.

The price paid for the products referred to in the preceding paragraph shall be the same as the price paid by Austrian nationals under the same conditions of shipment to the Austrian frontier and shall be subject to any advantages which may be accorded similar products furnished to Austrian nationals.

3.

The foregoing options shall be exercised through the intervention of the Reparation Commission, which subject to the specific provisions hereof shall have power to determine all questions relative to procedure and qualities and quantities of products and the times and modes of delivery and payment. In giving notice to the Austrian Government of the foregoing options, the Commission shall give at least 120 days' notice of deliveries to be made after January 1, 1920, and at least 30 days' notice of deliveries to be made between the coming into force of the present Treaty and January 1, 1920. If the Commission shall determine that the full exercise of the foregoing options would interfere unduly with the industrial requirements of Austria, the Commission is authorised to postpone or to cancel deliveries and in so doing to settle all questions of priority.

ANNEX VI.

Austria renounces on her own behalf and on behalf of her nationals in favour of Italy all rights, titles or privileges of whatever nature in any submarine cables or portions of cables connecting Italian territory, including the territories which are assigned to Italy under the present Treaty.

Austria also renounces on her own behalf and on behalf of her nationals in favour of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers all rights, titles and privileges of whatever nature in the submarine cables, or portions thereof, connecting the territories ceded by Austria under the terms of the present Treaty to the various Allied and Associated Powers.

The States concerned shall provide for the upkeep of the installations and the proper working of the said cables.

As regards the cable from Trieste to Corfu, the Italian Government shall enjoy in its relations with the company owning this cable the same position as that held by the Austro-Hungarian Government.

The value of the cables or portions of cables referred to in the two first paragraphs of the present Annex, calculated on the basis of the original cost, less a suitable allowance for depreciation, shall be credited to Austria in the reparation account.

Section II.

SPECIAL PROVISIONS.

Article 191.

In carrying out the provisions of Article 184 of this Part Austria undertakes to surrender to each of the Allied and Associated Powers respectively all records, documents, objects of antiquity and of art, and all scientific and bibliographical material taken away from the invaded territories, whether they belong to the State or to provincial, communal, charitable or ecclesiastical administrations or other public or private institutions.

Article 192.

Austria shall in the same manner restore objects of the same nature as those referred to in the preceding Article which may have been taken away since June 1, 1914, from the ceded territories, with the exception of objects bought from private owners.

The Reparation Commission will apply to these objects the provisions of Article 208 of Part IX (Financial Clauses) of the present Treaty, if these are appropriate.

Article 193.

Austria will give up to each of the Allied and Associated Governments respectively all the records, documents and historical material possessed by public institutions which may have a direct bearing on the history of the ceded territories and which have been removed during the last ten years. This last-mentioned period, as far as concerns Italy, shall be extended to the date of the proclamation of the Kingdom (1861).

The new States arising out of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy and the States which receive part of the territory of that Monarchy undertake on their part to hand over to Austria the records, documents and material dating from a period not exceeding twenty years which have a direct bearing on the history or administration of the territory of Austria and which may be found in the territories transferred.

Article 194.

Austria acknowledges that she remains bound, as regards Italy, to execute the obligations referred to in Article 5 of the Treaty of Zurich of November 10, 1859, in Article 18 of the Treaty of Vienna of October 3, 1866, and in the Convention of Florence of July 14, 1868, concluded between Italy and Austria-Hungary, in so far as the Articles referred to have not in fact been executed in their entirety and in so far as the documents and objects in question are situated in the territory of Austria or her allies.

Article 195.

Within a period of twelve months after the coming into force of the present Treaty a Committee of three jurists appointed by the Reparation Commission shall examine the conditions under which the objects or manuscripts in possession of Austria, enumerated in Annex I hereto, were carried off by the House of Hapsburg and by the other Houses which have reigned in Italy. If it is found that the said objects or manuscripts were carried off in violation of the rights of the Italian provinces the Reparation Commission, on the report of the Committee referred to, shall order their restitution. Italy and Austria agree to accept the decisions of the Commission.

Belgium, Poland and Czecho-Slovakia may also submit claims for restitution, to be examined by the same Committee of three jurists, relating to the objects and documents enumerated in Annexes II, III and IV hereto. Belgium, Poland, Czecho-Slovakia and Austria undertake to accept the decisions taken by the Reparation Commission as the result of the report of the said Committee.

Article 196.

With regard to all objects of artistic, archæological, scientific, or historic character forming part of collections which formerly belonged to the Government or the Crown of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy and are not otherwise provided for in this present Treaty, Austria undertakes:

(a) to negotiate, when required, with the States concerned for an amicable arrangement whereby any portion thereof or any objects belonging thereto which ought to form part of the intellectual patrimony of the ceded districts may be returned to their districts of origin on terms of reciprocity, and

(b) For twenty years, unless a special arrangement is previously arrived at, not to alienate or disperse any of the said collections or to dispose of any of the above objects but at all times to ensure their safety and good condition and to make them available, together with inventories, catalogues and administrative documents relating to the said collection, at all reasonable times to students who are nationals of any of the Allied and Associated Powers.

ANNEX I.

TUSCANY.

The Crown jewels (such part as remains after their dispersion); the private jewels of the Princess Electress of Medici; the medals which form part of the Medici heirlooms and other precious objects—all being domanial property according to contractual agreements and testamentary dispositions—removed to Vienna during the eighteenth century.

Furniture and silver plate belonging to the House of Medici and the "jewel of Aspasios" in payment of debts owed by the House of Austria to the Crown of Tuscany.

The ancient instruments of astronomy and physics belonging to the Academy of Cimento removed by the House of Lorraine and sent as a present to the cousins of the Imperial House of Vienna.

MODENA.

A "Virgin" by Andrea del Sarto and four drawings by Correggio belonging to the Pinacothek of Modena and removed in 1859 by Duke Francis V.

The three following MSS. belonging to the library of Modena:

Biblia vulgata (Cod. Lat. 422/23),

Brevarium Romanum (Cod. Lat. 424) and

Officium Beatæ Virginis (Cod. Lat. 262), carried off by Duke Francis V in 1859.

The bronzes carried off under the same circumstances in 1859.

Certain objects (among others two pictures by Salvator Rosa and a portrait by Dosso Dossi) claimed by the Duke of Modena in 1868 as a condition of the execution of the Convention of June 20, 1868, and other objects given up in 1872 in the same circumstances.

PALERMO.

Objects made in Palermo in the twelfth century for the Norman kings and employed in the coronation of the Emperors, which were carried off from Palermo and are now in Vienna.

NAPLES.

Ninety-eight MSS. carried off from the Library of S. Giovanni a Carbonara and other libraries at Naples in 1718 under the orders of Austria and sent to Vienna.

Various documents carried off at different times from the State Archives of Milan, Mantua, Vienna, Modena and Florence.

ANNEX II.

I. The Triptych of S. Ildephonse, by Rubens, from the Abbey of Saint-Jacques sur Cowdenberg at Brussels, bought in 1777 and removed to Vienna.

II. Objects and documents removed for safety from Belgium to Austria in 1794:

(a) Arms, armour and other objects from the old Arsenal of Brussels.

(b) The Treasure of the "Toison d'or" preserved in previous times in the "Chapelle de la Cour" at Brussels.

(c) Coinage, stamps, medals, and counters by Theodore van Berckel which were an essential feature in the archives of the "Chambre des Comptes" at Brussels.

(d) The original manuscript copies of the "carte chorographique" of the Austrian Low Countries drawn up by Lieut.-General Comte Jas de Ferraris between 1770 and 1777, and the documents relating thereto.

ANNEX III.

Object removed from the territory forming part of Poland subsequent to the first partition in 1772:

The gold cup of King Ladislas IV, No. 1,114 of the Court Museum at Vienna.

ANNEX IV.

(1) Documents, historical memoirs, manuscripts, maps, etc., claimed by the present State of Czecho-Slovakia, which Thaulaw von Rosenthal removed by order of Maria Theresa.

(2) The documents originally belonging to the Royal Aulic Chancellory of Bohemia and the Aulic Chamber of Accounts of Bohemia, and the works of art which formed part of the installation of the Royal Chateau of Prague and other royal castles in Bohemia, which were removed by the Emperors Mathias, Ferdinand II, Charles VI (about 1718, 1723 and 1737) and Francis Joseph I; all of which are now in the archives, Imperial castles, museums and other central public institutions at Vienna.

PART IX.

FINANCIAL CLAUSES.

Article 197.

Subject to such exceptions as the Reparation Commission may make, the first charge upon all the assets and revenues of Austria shall be the cost of reparation and all other costs arising under the present Treaty or any treaties or agreements supplementary thereto, or under arrangements concluded between Austria and the Allied and Associated Powers during the Armistice signed on November 3, 1918.

Up to May 1, 1921, the Austrian Government shall not export or dispose of, and shall forbid the export or disposal of, gold without the previous approval of the Allied and Associated Powers acting through the Reparation Commission.

Article 198.

There shall be paid by the Government of Austria the total cost of all armies of the Allied and Associated Governments occupying territory within the boundaries of Austria as defined by the present Treaty from the date of the signature of the Armistice of November 3, 1918, including the keep of men and beasts, lodging and billeting, pay and allowances, salaries and wages, bedding, heating, lighting, clothing, equipment, harness and saddlery, armament and rolling-stock, air services, treatment of sick and wounded, veterinary and remount services, transport services of all sorts (such as by rail, sea, or river, motor-lorries), communications and correspondence, and, in general, the cost of all administrative or technical services the working of which is necessary for the training of troops and for keeping their numbers up to strength and preserving their military efficiency.

The cost of such liabilities under the above heads, so far as they relate to purchases or requisitions by the Allied and Associated Governments in the occupied territory, shall be paid by the Austrian Government to the Allied and Associated Governments in crowns or any legal currency of Austria which may be substituted for crowns at the current or agreed rate of exchange.

All other of the above costs shall be paid in the currency of the country to which the payment is due.

Article 199.

Austria confirms the surrender of all material handed over or to be handed over to the Allied and Associated Powers in accordance with the Armistice of November 3, 1918, and subsequent Armistice Agreements, and recognises the title of the Allied and Associated Powers to such material.

There shall be credited to the Government of Austria, against the sums due from it to the Allied and Associated Powers for reparation, the value, as assessed by the Reparation Commision, of such of the above material for which, as having nonmilitary value, credit should, in the judgment of the Reparation Commission, be allowed to the Government of Austria.

Property belonging to the Allied and Associated Governments or their nationals restored or surrendered under the Armistice agreements in specie shall not be credited to the Government of Austria.

Article 200.

The priority of the charges established by Article 197 shall, subject to the qualifications made in the last paragraph of this Article, be as follows:

(a) The cost of the armies of occupation, as defined under Article 198, during the armistice;

(b) The cost of any armies of occupation, as defined under Article 198, after the coming into force of the present Treaty;

(c) The cost of reparation arising out of the present Treaty or any treaties or conventions supplementary thereto;

(d) The cost of all other obligations incumbent on Austria under the Armistice Conventions or under this Treaty or any treaties or conventions supplementary thereto.

The payment for such supplies of food and raw material for Austria and such other payments as may be judged by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers to be essential to enable Austria to meet her obligations in respect of reparation shall have priority to the extent and upon the conditions which have been or may be determined by the Governments of the said Powers.

Article 201.

The right of each of the Allied and Associated Powers to dispose of enemy assets and property within its jurisdiction at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty is not affected by the foregoing provisions.

Article 202.

Nothing in the foregoing provisions shall prejudice in any manner charges or mortgages lawfully effected in favour of the Allied and Associated Powers or their nationals respectively before the date at which a state of war existed between Austria-Hungary and the Allied or Associated Power concerned by the former Austrian Government or by nationals of the former Austrian Empire on assets in their ownership at that date, except in so far as variations of such charges or mortgages are specifically provided for under the terms of the present Treaty or conventions supplementary thereto.

Article 203.

1. Each of the States to which territory of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy is transferred, and each of the States arising from the dismemberment of that Monarchy, including Austria, shall assume responsibility for a portion of the debt of the former Austrian Government which is specifically secured on railways, salt mines or other property, and which was in existence on July 28, 1914. The portion to be so assumed by each State shall be such portion as in the opinion of the Reparation Commission represents the secured debt in respect of the railways, salt mines, and other properties transferred to that State under the terms of this Treaty or conventions supplementary thereto.

The amount of the liability in respect of secured debt so assumed by each State, other than Austria, shall be valued by the Reparation Commission, on such basis as the Commission may consider equitable, and the value so ascertained shall be deducted from the amount payable by the State in question to Austria in respect of property of the former or existing Austrian Government which the State acquires with the territory. Each State shall be solely responsible in respect of that portion of the secured debt for which it assumes responsibility under the terms of this Article, and holders of the debt for which responsibility is assumed by States other than Austria shall have no recourse against the Government of any other State.

Any property which was specifically pledged to secure any debt referred to in this Article shall remain specifically pledged to secure the new debt. But in case the property so pledged is situated as the result of the present Treaty in more than one State, that portion of the property which is situated in a particular State shall constitute the security only for that part of the debt which is apportioned to that State, and not for any other part of the debt.

For the purposes of the present Article there shall be regarded as secured debt payments due by the former Austrian Government in connection with the purchase of railways or similar property; the distribution of the liability for such payments will be determined by the Reparation Commission in the same manner as in the case of secured debt.

Debts for which the responsibility is transferred under the terms of this Article shall be expressed in terms of the currency of the State assuming the responsibility, if the original debt was expressed in terms of Austro-Hungarian paper currency. For the purposes of this conversion the currency of the assuming State shall be valued in terms of Austro-Hungarian paper kronen at the rate at which those kronen were exchanged into the currency of the assuming State by that State when it first substituted its own currency for Austro-Hungarian kronen. The basis of this conversion of the currency unit in which the bonds are expressed shall be subject to the approval of the Reparation Commission, which shall, if it thinks fit, require the State effecting the conversion to modify the terms thereof. Such modification shall only be required if, in the opinion of the Commission, the foreign exchange value of the currency unit or units substituted for the currency unit in which the old bonds are expressed is substantially less at the date of the conversion than the foreign exchange value of the original currency unit.

If the original Austrian debt was expressed in terms of a foreign currency or foreign currencies, the new debt shall be expressed in terms of the same currency or currencies.

If the original Austrian debt was expressed in terms of Austro-Hungarian gold coin, the new debt shall be expressed in terms of equivalent amounts of pounds sterling and gold dollars of the United States of America, the equivalents being calculated on the basis of the weight and the fineness of gold of the three coins as enacted by law on January 1, 1914.

Any foreign exchange options, whether at fixed rates or otherwise, embodied explicitly or implicitly in the old bonds shall be embodied in the new bonds also.

2. Each of the States to which territory of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy is transferred, and each of the States arising from the dismemberment of that Monarchy, including Austria, shall assume responsibility for a portion of the unsecured bonded debt of the former Austrian Government which was in existence on July 28, 1914, calculated on the basis of the ratio between the average for the three financial years 1911, 1912, 1913, of such revenues of the distributed territory and the average for the same years of such revenues of the whole of the former Austrian territories as in the judgment of the Reparation Commission are best calculated to represent the financial capacity of the respective territories. In making the above calculation, the revenues of Bosnia and Herzegovina shall not be included.

The responsibilities in respect of bonded debt to be assumed under the terms of this Article shall be discharged in the manner laid down in the Annex hereto.

The Austrian Government shall be solely responsible for all the liabilities of the former Austrian Government incurred prior to July 28, 1914, other than those evidenced by the bonds, bills, securities and currency notes which are specifically provided for under the terms of the present Treaty.

Neither the provisions of this Article nor the provisions of the Annex hereto shall apply to securities of the former Austrian Government deposited with the Austro-Hungarian Bank as security for the currency notes issued by that bank.

ANNEX.

The amount of the former unsecured Austrian Government Bonded Debt, the responsibility for which is to be distributed under the provisions of Article 203, shall be the amount that debt as it stood on July 28, 1914, after deducting that portion which represents of the liability of the former Hungarian Government for that debt as provided by the additional Convention relating to the contribution of the countries of the Sacred Hungarian Crown to the charges of the general debt of the Austro-Hungarian State approved by the Austro-Hungarian Law of December 30, 1907, B. L. I. No. 278.

Each State assuming responsibility for the old unsecured Austrian Government debt shall, within three months of the coming into force of the present Treaty, if it has not already done so, stamp with the stamp of its own Government all the Bonds of that debt existing in its own territory. The distinguishing numbers of the Bonds so stamped shall be recorded and shall be furnished, together with the other records of the stamping, to the Reparation Commission.

Holders of Bonds within the territory of a State which is required to stamp old Austrian Bonds under the terms of this Annex shall, from the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty, be creditors in respect of these Bonds of that State only, and they shall have no recourse against the Government of any other State.

Each State which, under the terms of Article 203, is required to assume responsibility for a portion of the old unsecured Austrian Government Debt, and which has ascertained by means of stamping the old Austrian Bonds that the Bonds of any particular issue of such old Austrian Bonds held within its territory were smaller in amount than the amount of that issue for which, in accordance with the assessment of the Reparation Commission, it is held responsible, shall deliver to the Reparation Commission new Bonds equal in amount to the difference between the amount of the issue for which it is responsible and the amount of the same issue recorded as held within its own territory. Such new Bonds shall be of such denominations as the Reparation Commission may require. They shall carry the same rights as regards interest and amortisation as the old Bonds for which they are substituted, and in all other respects the conditions of the new Bonds shall be fixed subject to the approval of the Reparation Commission.

If the original Bonds was expressed in terms of Austro-Hungarian paper currency, the new Bond by which it is replaced shall be expressed in terms of the currency of the State issuing the new Bond, and for the purpose of this currency conversion, the currency of the new State shall be valued in terms of Austro-Hungarian paper kronen at the rate at which those kronen were exchanged for the currency of the new State by that State when it first substituted its own currency for Austro-Hungarian paper kronen. The basis of this conversion of the currency unit in which the Bonds are expressed shall be subject to the approval of the Reparation Commission, which shall, if it thinks fit, require the State effecting the conversion to modify the terms thereof. Such modification shall only be required if, in the opinion of the Commission, the foreign exchange value of the currency unit or units substituted for the currency unit in which the old Bonds are expressed is substantially less at the date of the conversion than the foreign exchange value of the original currency unit.

If the original Bond was expressed in terms of a foreign currency or foreign currencies, the new Bond shall be expressed in terms of the same currency or currencies. If the original Bond was expressed in terms of Austro-Hungarian gold coin, the new Bond shall be expressed in terms of equivalent amounts of pounds sterling and gold dollars of the United States of America, the equivalents being calculated on the basis of the weight and fineness of gold of the three coins as enacted by law on January 1, 1914.

Any foreign exchange options, whether at fixed rates or otherwise, embodied explicitly or implicitly in the old Bonds shall be embodied in the new Bonds also.

Each State which under the terms of Article 203 is required to assume responsibility for a portion of the old unsecured Austrian Government Debt, which has ascertained by means of stamping the old Austrian Bonds that the Bonds of any particular issue of such old Austrian Bonds held within its territory were larger in amount than the amount of that issue for which it is held responsible in accordance with the assessment of the Reparation Commission, shall receive from the Reparation Commission its due proportionate share of each of the new issues of Bonds issued in accordance with the provisions of this Annex.

Holders of unsecured Bonds of the old Austrian Government Debt held outside the boundaries of the States to which territory of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy is transferred, or of States arising from the dismemberment of that Monarchy, including Austria, shall deliver through the agency of their respective Governments to the Reparation Commission the Bonds which they hold, and in exchange therefor the Reparation Commission shall deliver to them certificates entitling them to their due proportionate share of each of the new issues of Bonds corresponding to and issued in exchange for their surrendered Bonds under the provisions of this Annex.

The share of each State or private holder entitled to a share in any new issue of Bonds issued in accordance with the provisions of this Annex shall bear such proportion to the total amount of Bonds of that new issue as the holding of the State or private owner in question of the old issue of Bonds bears to the total amount of the old issue presented to the Reparation Commission for exchange into new Bonds in accordance with the provisions of this Annex. Each such participating State or private holder will also be entitled to its or his due proportionate share of the new Bonds issued under the terms of the Treaty with Hungary in exchange for that portion of the former Austrian Government Debt for which Hungary accepted liability under the Agreement of 1907.

The Reparation Commission shall, if it think fit, arrange with the holders of the new Bonds provided for by this Annex a consolidation loan of each debtor State, the Bonds of which loan shall be substituted for the various different issues of new Bonds on such terms as may be agreed upon by the Commission and the bondholders.

The State assuming liability for any Bond of the former Austrian Government shall assume any liability attaching to the Bond in respect of unpaid coupons or sinking fund instalments accrued since the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty.

Article 204.

1. In case the new boundaries of any States, as laid down by the present Treaty, shall divide any local area which was a single unit for borrowing purposes and which had a legally constituted public debt, such debt shall be divided between the new divisions of the area in a proportion to be determined by the Reparation Commission in accordance with the principles laid down for the reapportionment of Government Debts under Article 203, and the responsibility so assumed shall be discharged in such a manner as the Reparation Commission shall determine.

2. The public debt of Bosnia and Herzegovina shall be regarded as the debt of a local area and not as part of the public debt of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy.

Article 205.

Within two months of the coming into force of the present Treaty, each one of the States to which territory of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy is transferred and each one of the States arising from the dismemberment of that Monarchy, including Austria, shall, if it has not already done so, stamp with the stamp of its own Government the securities of various kinds which are separately provided for, representing the bonded war debt of the former Austrian Government as legally constituted prior to October 27, 1918, and existing in their respective territories.

The securities thus stamped shall be withdrawn and replaced by certificates, their distinguishing numbers shall be recorded, and any securities withdrawn, together with the documents recording the transaction, shall be sent to the Reparation Commission.

The stamping and replacement of a security by a certificate under the provisions of this Article shall not imply that the State so stamping and replacing a security thereby assumes or recognizes any obligation in respect of it, unless the State in question desires that the stamping and replacement should have this implication.

The aforementioned States, with the exception of Austria, shall be free from any obligation in respect of the war debt of the former Austrian Government, wherever that debt may be held, but neither the Governments of those States nor their nationals shall have recourse under any circumstances whatever against any other States including Austria in respect of the war debt bonds of which they or their nationals are the beneficial owners.

The war debt of the former Austrian Government which was prior to the signature of the present Treaty in the beneficial ownership of nationals or Governments or States other than those to which territory of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy is assigned shall be a charge upon the Government of Austria only, and no one of the other States aforementioned shall be held responsible for any part thereof.

The provisions of this Article shall not apply to the securities of the former Austrian Government deposited by that Government with the Austro-Hungarian Bank as security for the currency notes of the said bank.

The existing Austrian Government shall be solely responsible for all the liabilities of the former Austrian Government incurred during the war, other than those evidenced by the bonds, bills, securities and currency notes which are specifically provided for under the terms of the present Treaty.

Article 206.

1. Within two months of the coming into force of the present Treaty, each one of the States to which territory of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy is transferred, and each one of the States arising from the dismemberment of that Monarchy, including Austria and the present Hungary, shall, if it has not already done so, stamp with the stamp of its own Government the currency notes of the Austro-Hungarian Bank existing in its territory.

2. Within twelve months of the coming into force of the present Treaty, each one of the States to which territory of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy is transferred, and each one of the States arising from the dismemberment of that Monarchy, including Austria and the present Hungary, shall replace, as it may think fit, the stamped notes referred to above by its own or a new currency.

3. The Governments of such States as have already converted the currency notes of the Austro-Hungarian Bank by stamping or by the issue of their own or a new currency, and in carrying out this operation have withdrawn, without stamping them, a portion or all of the currency notes circulating in their territory, shall either stamp the notes so withdrawn or hold them at the disposal of the Reparation Commission.

4. Within fourteen months of the coming into force of the present Treaty, those Governments which have replaced notes of the bank by their own or new currency, in accordance with the provisions of this Article, shall transfer to the Reparation Commission all the notes, stamped or unstamped, of the bank which have been withdrawn in the course of this replacement.

5. All notes transferred to the Reparation Commission under the provisions of this Article shall be dealt with by that Commission in accordance with the provisions of the Annex hereto.

6. The Austro-Hungarian Bank shall be liquidated as from the day succeeding the day of the signature of this Treaty.

7. The liquidation shall be conducted by receivers specially appointed for that purpose by the Reparation Commission. In conducting the liquidation of the bank, the receivers shall follow the rules laid down in the Statutes or other valid instruments regulating the constitution of the bank, subject however to the special provisions of this Article. In the case of any doubt arising as to the interpretation of the rules concerning the liquidation of the bank, whether laid down in these Articles and Annexes or in the Statutes of the bank, the decision of the Reparation Commission or any arbitrator appointed by it for that purpose shall be final.

8. The currency notes issued by the bank subsequent to October 27, 1918, shall have a claim on the securities issued by the Austrian and Hungarian Governments, both former and existing, and deposited with the bank by those Governments as security for these notes, but they shall not have a claim on any other assets of the bank.

9. The currency notes issued by the bank on or prior to October 27, 1918, (in so far as they are entitled to rank at all in conformity with these Articles), shall all rank equally as claims against all the assets of the bank, other than the Austrian and Hungarian Government securities deposited as security for the various note issues.

10. The securities deposited by the Austrian and Hungarian Governments, both former and existing, with the bank as security for the currency notes issued on or prior to October 27, 1918, shall be cancelled in so far as they represent the notes converted in the territory of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy as it existed on July 28, 1914, by States to which territory of that Monarchy is transferred or by States arising from the dismemberment of that Monarchy, including Austria and the present Hungary.

11. The remainder of the securities deposited by the Austrian and Hungarian Governments, both former and existing, with the bank as security for the currency notes issued on or prior to October 27, 1918, shall be retained in force as security for, and in so far as they represent, the notes issued on or prior to October 27, 1918, which on June 15, 1919, were outside the limits of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy as it existed on July 28, 1914, that is to say, firstly, all notes of this description which are presented to the Reparation Commission in accordance with paragraph 4 of this Article, and secondly all notes of this description which may be held elsewhere and are presented to the receivers of the bank in accordance with the Annex hereto.

12. No claims on account of any other currency notes issued on or prior to October 27, 1918, shall rank either against the general assets of the bank or against the securities deposited by the Austrian and Hungarian Governments, both former and existing, as security for the notes, and any balance of such securities remaining after the amount of securities mentioned in paragraphs 10 and 11 has been calculated and deducted shall be cancelled.

13. All securities deposited by the Austrian and Hungarian Governments, both former and existing, with the bank as security for currency note issues and which are maintained in force shall be the obligations respectively of the Governments of Austria and the present Hungary only and not of any other States.

14. The holders of currency notes of the Austro-Hungarian Bank shall have no recourse against the Governments of Austria or the present Hungary or any other Government in respect of any loss which they may suffer as the result of the liquidation of the bank.

ANNEX.

1.

The respective Governments, when transmitting to the Reparation Commission all the currency notes of the Austro-Hungarian Bank withdrawn by them from circulation in accordance with the terms of Article 206, shall also deliver to the Commission all the records showing the nature and amounts of the conversions which they have effected.

2.

The Reparation Commission, after examining the records, shall deliver to the said Governments separate certificates stating the total amount of currency notes which the Governments have converted:

(a) within the limits of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy as they existed on July 28, 1914;

(b) elsewhere.

These certificates will entitle the bearer to lodge a claim with the receivers of the bank for currency notes thus converted which are entitled to share in the assets of the bank.

3.

After the liquidation of the bank is completed, the Reparation Commission shall destroy the notes thus withdrawn.

4.

No notes issued on or prior to October 27, 1918, wherever they may be held, will rank as claims against the bank unless they are presented through the Government of the country in which they are held.

Article 207.

Each one of the States to which territory of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy is transferred, and each one of the States arising from the dismemberment of that Monarchy, including Austria, shall deal as it thinks fit with the petty or token coinage of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy existing in its territory.

No such State shall have any recourse under any circumstances, on behalf either of itself or of its nationals, against any other State with regard to such petty or token coinage.

Article 208.

States to which territory of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy is transferred and States arising from the dismemberment of that Monarchy shall acquire all property and possessions situated within their territories belonging to the former or existing Austrian Government.

For the purposes of this Article, the property and possessions of the former or existing Austrian Government shall be deemed to include the property of the former Austrian Empire and the interests of that Empire in the joint property of the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, as well as all the property of the Crown, and the private property of members of the former Royal Family of Austria-Hungary.

These States shall, however, have no claim to any property of the former or existing Government of Austria situated outside their own respective territories.

The value of such property and possessions acquired by States other than Austria shall be fixed by the Reparation Commission and placed by that Commission to the credit of Austria and to the debit of the State acquiring such property on account of the sums due for reparation. The Reparation Commission shall deduct from the value of the public property thus acquired an amount proportionate to the contribution in money, land or material made directly by any province or commune or other autonomous local authority towards the cost of such property.

Without prejudice to Article 203 relating to secured Debt, in the case of each State acquiring property under the provisions of this Article, the amount placed to the credit of Austria and to the debit of the said State in accordance with the preceding paragraph shall be reduced by the value of the amount of the liability in respect of the unsecured Debt of the former Austrian Government assumed by that State under the provisions of Article 203 which, in the opinion of the Reparation Commission, represents expenditure upon the property so acquired. The value shall be fixed by the Reparation Commission on such basis as the Commission may consider equitable.

Property of the former and existing Austrian Governments shall be deemed to include a share of the real property in Bosnia-Herzegovina of all descriptions for which, under Article 5 of the Convention of February 26, 1909, the Government of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy paid £ T. 2,500,000 to the Ottoman Government. Such share shall be proportionate to the share which the former Austrian Empire contributed to the above payment, and the value of this share, as assessed by the Reparation Commission, shall be credited to Austria on account of reparation.

As exception to the above there shall be transferred without payment:

(1) The property and possessions of provinces, communes and other local autonomous institutions of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, including those in Bosnia-Herzegovina which did not belong to the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy;

(2) Schools and hospitals the property of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy;

(3) Forests which belonged to the former Kingdom of Poland.

Further, any building or other property situated in the respective territories transferred to the States referred to in the first paragraph whose principal value lies in its historic interest and associations, and which formerly belonged to the Kingdom of Bohemia, the Kingdom of Poland, the Kingdom of Croatia-Slavonia-Dalmatia, Bosnia-Herzegovina, the Republic of Ragusa, the Venetian Republic or the Episcopal Principalities of Trient and Bressanone, may, subject to the approval of the Reparation Commission, be transferred to the Government entitled thereto without payment.

Article 209.

Austria renounces, so far as she is concerned, all rights accorded to her or her nationals by Treaties, Conventions or Agreements, of whatsoever kind, to representation upon or participation in the control or administration of Commissions, State Banks, Agencies or other financial or economic organisations of an international character exercising powers of control or administration and operating in any of the Allied or Associated States, or in Germany, Hungary, Bulgaria or Turkey, or in the dependencies of these States, or in the former Russian Empire.

Article 210.

1. The Austrian Government agrees to deliver within one month from the coming into force of the present Treaty to such authority as the Principal Allied and Associated Powers may designate the sum in gold deposited in the Austro-Hungarian Bank in the name of the Council of the Administration of the Ottoman Public Debt as security for the first issue of Turkish Government currency notes.

2. Without prejudice to Article 244 of Part X of the present Treaty, Austria renounces so far as she is concerned any benefit disclosed by the Treaties of Bucharest and Brest-Litovsk and by the Treaties supplementary thereto.

Austria undertakes to transfer either to Roumania or to the Principal Allied and Associated Powers, as the case may be, all monetary instruments, specie, securities and negotiable instruments or goods which she has received under the aforesaid Treaties.

3. The sums of money and all securities, instruments and goods, of whatsoever nature, to be delivered, paid or transferred under the provisions of this Article, shall be disposed of by the Principal Allied and Associated Powers in a manner hereafter to be determined by those Powers.

4. Austria recognises any transfer of gold provided for by Article 259 (5) of the Treaty of Peace concluded at Versailles on June 28, 1919, between the Allied and Associated Powers and Germany, and any transfer of claims provided for by Article 261 of that Treaty.

Article 211.

Without prejudice to the renunciation of any rights by Austria on behalf of herself or of her nationals in the other provisions of the present Treaty, the Reparation Commission may, within one year from the coming into force of the present Treaty, demand that Austria become possessed of any rights and interests of her nationals in any public utility undertaking or in any concession operating in Russia, Turkey, Germany, Hungary or Bulgaria, or in the possessions or dependencies of these States, or in any territory formerly belonging to Austria or her allies to be transferred by Austria or her allies to any State, or to be administered by a mandatory under any Treaty entered into with the Allied and Associated Powers, and may require that the Austrian Government transfer, within six months of the date of demand, to the Reparation Commission all such rights and interests and any similar rights and interests owned by the former or existing Austrian Government.

Austria shall be responsible for indemnifying her nationals so dispossessed, and the Reparation Commission shall credit Austria on account of sums due for reparation with such sums in respect of the value of the transferred rights and interests as may be assessed by the Reparation Commission, and the Austrian Government shall, within six months from the coming into force of the present Treaty, communicate to the Reparation Commission all such rights and interests, whether already granted, contingent or not yet exercised, and shall renounce on behalf of itself and its nationals in favour of the Allied and Associated Powers all such rights and interests which have not been so communicated.

Article 212.

The Austrian Government undertakes to refrain from preventing or impeding such acquisition by the German, Hungarian, Bulgarian or Turkish Governments of any rights and interests of German, Hungarian, Bulgarian or Turkish nationals in public utility undertakings or concessions operating in Austria as may be required by the Reparation Commission under the terms of the Treaties of Peace or supplementary Treaties or Conventions concluded between the Allied and Associated Powers and the German, Hungarian, Bulgarian or Turkish Governments respectively.

Article 213.

Austria undertakes to transfer to the Allied and Associated Powers all claims in favour of the former or existing Austrian Governments to payment or reparation by the Governments of Germany, Hungary, Bulgaria or Turkey, and in particular all claims which may arise now or hereafter in the fulfillment of undertakings made after July 28, 1914, until the coming into force of the present Treaty.

The value of such claims shall be assessed by the Reparation Commission, and shall be transferred to the Reparation Commission for the credit of Austria on account of the sums due for reparation.

Article 214.

Any monetary obligation arising out of the present Treaty and expressed in terms of gold kronen shall, unless some other arrangement is specifically provided for in any particular case under the terms of this Treaty or conventions supplementary thereto, be payable at the option of the creditors in pounds sterling payable in London, gold dollars of the United States of America payable in New York, gold francs payable in Paris, or gold lire payable in Rome.

For the purposes of this Article, the gold coins mentioned above shall be defined as being of the weight and fineness of gold as enacted by law on January 1, 1914.

Article 215.

Any financial adjustments, such as those relating to any banking and insurance companies, savings banks, postal savings banks, land banks, mortgage companies or other similar institutions, operating within the territory of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, necessitated by the partition of that Monarchy and the resettlement of public debts and currency provided for by these Articles, shall be regulated by agreement between the various Governments concerned in such a manner as shall best secure equitable treatment to all the parties interested. In case the Governments concerned are unable to come to an agreement on any question arising out of this financial adjustment, or in case any Government is of opinion that its nationals have not received equitable treatment, the Reparation Commission shall, on the application of any one of the Governments concerned, appoint an arbitrator or arbitrators, whose decision shall be final.

Article 216.

The Government of Austria shall be under no liability in respect of civil or military pensions granted to nationals of the former Austrian Empire who have been recognized as nationals of other States or who become so under the provisions of the present Treaty.

PART X.

ECONOMIC CLAUSES.

Section I.

COMMERCIAL RELATIONS.

CHAPTER I.

CUSTOMS REGULATIONS, DUTIES AND RESTRICTIONS.

Article 217.

Austria undertakes that goods the produce or manufacture of any one of the Allied or Associated States imported into Austrian territory, from whatsoever place arriving, shall not be subjected to other or higher duties or charges (including internal charges) than those to which the like goods the produce or manufacture of any other such State or of any other foreign country are subject.

Austria will not maintain or impose any prohibition or restriction on the importation into Austrian territory of any goods the produce or manufacture of the territories of any one of the Allied or Associated States, from whatsoever place arriving, which shall not equally extend to the importation of the like goods the produce or manufacture of any other such State or of any foreign country.

Article 218.

Austria further undertakes that, in the matter of the régime applicable on importation, no discrimination against the commerce of any of the Allied and Associated States as compared with any other of the said States or any other foreign country shall be made, even by indirect means, such as customs regulations or procedure, methods of verification or analysis, conditions of payment of duties, tariff classification or interpretation, or the operation of monopolies.

Article 219.

In all that concerns exportation, Austria undertakes that goods, natural products or manufactured articles, exported from Austrian territory to the territories of any one of the Allied or Associated States, shall not be subjected to other or higher duties or charges (including internal charges) than those paid on the like goods exported to any other such State or to any other foreign country.

Austria will not maintain or impose any prohibition or restriction on the exportation of any goods sent from her territory to any one of the Allied or Associated States which shall not equally extend to the exportation of the like goods, natural products or manufactured articles, sent to any other such State or to any other foreign country.

Article 220.

Every favour, immunity, or privilege in regard to the importation, exportation or transit of goods granted by Austria to any Allied or Associated States or to any other foreign country whatever shall simultaneously and unconditionally, without request and without compensation, be extended to all the Allied and Associated States.

Article 221.

By way of exception to the provisions of Article 286 of Part XII (Ports, Waterways and Railways), products in transit by the ports which before the war were situated in territory of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy shall, for a period of three years from the coming into force of the present Treaty, enjoy on importation into Austria reductions of duty corresponding with and in proportion to those applied to such products under the Austro-Hungarian Customs Tariff of February 13, 1906, when imported by such ports.

Article 222.

Notwithstanding the provisions of Articles 217 to 220, the Allied and Associated Powers agree that they will not invoke these provisions to secure the advantage of any arrangements which may be made by the Austrian Government with the Governments of Hungary or of the Czecho-Slovak State for the accord of a special customs régime to certain natural or manufactured products which both originate in and come from those countries, and which shall be specified in the arrangements, provided that the duration of these arrangements does not exceed a period of five years from the coming into force of the present Treaty.

Article 223.

During the first six months after the coming into force of the present Treaty, the duties imposed by Austria on imports from Allied and Associated States shall not be higher than the most favourable duties which were applied to imports into the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy on July 28, 1914.

During a further period of thirty months after the expiration of the first six months this provision shall continue to be applied exclusively with regard to the importation of fruits (fresh and dried), fresh vegetables, olive oil, eggs, pigs and pork products, and live poultry, in so far as such products enjoyed at the above mentioned date (July 28, 1914) rates conventionalised by Treaties with the Allied or Associated Powers.

Article 224.

(1) The Czecho-Slovak State and Poland undertake that for a period of fifteen years from the coming into force of the present Treaty they will not impose on the exportation to Austria of the products of coal mines in their territories any export duties or other charges or restrictions on exportation different from or more onerous than those imposed on such exportation to any other country.

(2) Special agreements shall be made between Poland and the Czecho-Slovak State and Austria as to the supply of coal and of raw materials reciprocally.

(3) Pending the conclusion of such agreements, but in no case during more than three years from the coming into force of the present Treaty, the Czecho-Slovak State and Poland undertake that no export duty or other restrictions of any kind shall be imposed on the export to Austria of coal or lignite up to a reasonable quantity to be fixed, failing agreement between the States concerned, by the Reparation Commission. In fixing this quantity the Reparation Commission shall take into account all the circumstances, including the quantities both of coal and of lignite supplied before the war to present Austrian territory from Upper Silesia and from the territory of the former Austrian Empire transferred to the Czecho-Slovak State and Poland in accordance with the present Treaty, and the quantities now available for export from those countries. Austria shall in return furnish to the Czecho-Slovak State and Poland supplies of the raw materials referred to in paragraph (2) in accordance with the decisions of the Reparation Commission.

(4) The Czecho-Slovak State and Poland further undertake during the same period to take such steps as may be necessary to ensure that any such products shall be available for sale to purchasers in Austria on terms as favourable as are applicable to like products sold under similar conditions to purchasers in the Czecho-Slovak State or Poland respectively or in any other country.

(5) In case of disagreement in the execution or interpretation of any of the above provisions the Reparation Commission shall decide.

CHAPTER II.

SHIPPING.

Article 225.

The High Contracting Parties agree to recognise the flag flown by the vessels of any Contracting Party having no seacoast, which are registered at some one specified place situated in its territory; such place shall serve as the port of registry of such vessels.

CHAPTER III.

UNFAIR COMPETITION.

Article 226.

Austria undertakes to adopt all the necessary legislative and administrative measures to protect goods the produce or manufacture of any one of the Allied and Associated Powers from all forms of unfair competition in commercial transactions.

Austria undertakes to prohibit and repress by seizure and by other appropriate remedies the importation, exportation, manufacture, distribution, sale or offering for sale in her territory of all goods bearing upon themselves or their usual get-up or wrappings any marks, names, devices, or descriptions whatsoever which are calculated to convey directly or indirectly a false indication of the origin, type, nature or special characteristics of such goods.

Article 227.

Austria undertakes, on condition that reciprocity is accorded in these matters, to respect any law, or any administrative or judicial decision given in conformity with such law, in force in any Allied or Associated State and duly communicated to her by the proper authorities, defining or regulating the right to any regional appellation in respect of wine or spirits produced in the State to which the region belongs or the conditions under which the use of any such appellation may be permitted; and the importation, exportation, manufacture, distribution, sale or offering for sale of products or articles bearing regional appellations inconsistent with such law or order shall be prohibited by the Austrian Government and repressed by the measures prescribed in the preceding Article.

CHAPTER IV.

TREATMENT OF NATIONALS OF ALLIED AND ASSOCIATED POWERS.

Article 228.

Austria undertakes:—

(a) not to subject the nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers to any prohibition in regard to the exercise of occupations, professions, trade and industry, which shall not be equally appliable to all aliens without exception;

(b) not to subject the nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers in regard to the rights referred to in paragraph (a) to any regulation or restriction which might contravene directly or indirectly the stipulations of the said paragraph, or which shall be other or more disadvantageous than those which are applicable to nationals of the most favoured nation;

(c) not to subject the nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers, their property, rights or interests, including companies and associations in which they are interested, to any charge, tax or impost, direct or indirect, other or higher than those which are or may be imposed on her own nationals or their property, rights or interests;

(d) Not to subject the nationals of any one of the Allied and Associated Powers to any restriction which was not applicable on July 1, 1914, to the nationals of such Powers unless such restriction is likewise imposed on her own nationals.

Article 229.

The nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers shall enjoy in Austrian territory a constant protection for their persons and for their property, rights and interests, and shall have free access to the courts of law.

Article 230.

Austria undertakes to recognise any new nationality which has been or may be acquired by her nationals under the laws of the Allied and Associated Powers, and in accordance with the decisions of the competent authorities of these Powers pursuant to naturalisation laws or under treaty stipulations, and to regard such persons as having, in consequence of the acquisition of such new nationality, in all respects severed their allegiance to their country of origin.

Article 231.

The Allied and Associated Powers may appoint consuls-generals, consuls, vice-consuls and consular agents in Austrian towns and ports. Austria undertakes to approve the designation of the consuls-general, consuls, vice-consuls and consular agents, whose names shall be notified to her, and to admit them to the exercise of their functions in conformity with the usual rules and customs.

CHAPTER V.

GENERAL ARTICLES.

Article 232.

The obligations imposed by Austria by Chapter I above shall cease to have effect five years from the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty, unless otherwise provided in the text, or unless the Council of the League of Nations shall, at least twelve months before the expiration of that period, decide that these obligations shall be maintained for a further period with or without amendment.

Nevertheless it is agreed that unless the League of Nations decides otherwise an Allied or Associated Power shall not after the expiration of three years from the coming into force of the present Treaty be entitled to require the fulfilment by Austria of the provisions of Articles 217, 218, 219 or 220 unless that Power accords correlative treatment to Austria.

Article 228 of Chapter IV shall remain in operation, with or without amendment, after the period of five years for such further period, if any, not exceeding five years, as may be determined by a majority of the Council of the League of Nations.

Article 233.

If the Austrian Government engages in international trade, it shall not in respect thereof have or be deemed to have any rights, privileges or immunities of sovereignty.

Section II.

TREATIES.

Article 234.

From the coming into force of the present Treaty and subject to the provisions thereof the multilateral Treaties, Conventions and Agreements of an economic or technical character concluded by the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy and enumerated below and in the subsequent Articles shall alone be applied as between Austria and those of the Allied and Associated Powers party thereto:

(1) Conventions of March 14, 1884, December 1, 1886, and March 23, 1887, and Final Protocol of July 7, 1887, regarding the protection of submarine cables.

(2) Convention of October 11, 1909, regarding the international circulation of motor-cars.

(3) Agreement of May 15, 1886, regarding the sealing of railway trucks subject to customs inspection, and Protocol of May 18, 1907.

(4) Agreement of May 15, 1886, regarding the technical standardisation of railways.

(5) Convention of July 5, 1890, regarding the publication of customs tariffs and the organisation of an International Union for the publication of customs tariffs.

(6) Convention of April 25, 1907, regarding the raising of the Turkish customs tariff.

(7) Convention of March 14, 1857, for the redemption of toll dues on the Sound and Belts.

(8) Convention of June 22, 1861, for the redemption of the Stade Toll on the Elbe.

(9) Convention of July 16, 1863, for the redemption of the Toll dues on the Scheldt.

(10) Convention of October 29, 1888, regarding the establishment of a definite arrangement guaranteeing the free use of the Suez Canal.

(11) Conventions of September 23, 1910, respecting the unification of certain regulations regarding collisions and salvage at sea.

(12) Convention of December 21, 1904, regarding the exemption of hospital ships from dues and charges in ports.

(13) Convention of September 26, 1906, for the suppression of nightwork for women.

(14) Conventions of May 18, 1904, and May 4, 1910, regarding the suppression of the White Slave Traffic.

(15) Convention of May 4, 1910, regarding the suppression of obscene publications.

(16) Sanitary Convention of December 3, 1903, and the preceding Conventions signed on January 30, 1892, April 15, 1893, April 3, 1894, and March 19, 1897.

(17) Convention of May 20, 1875, regarding the unification and improvement of the metric system.

(18) Convention of November 29, 1906, regarding the unification of pharmacopœial formulæ for potent drugs.

(19) Convention of November 16 and 19, 1885, regarding the establishment of a concert pitch.

(20) Convention of June 7, 1905, regarding the creation of an International Agricultural Institute at Rome.

(21) Conventions of November 3, 1881, and April 15, 1889, regarding precautionary measures against phylloxera.

(22) Convention of March 19, 1902, regarding the protection of birds useful to agriculture.

(23) Convention of June 12, 1902, regarding the guardianship of minors.

Article 235.

From the coming into force of the present Treaty the High Contracting Parties shall apply the conventions and agreements hereinafter mentioned, in so far as concerns them, Austria undertaking to comply with the special stipulations contained in this Article.

Postal Conventions:

Conventions and agreements of the Universal Postal Union concluded at Vienna, July 4, 1891.

Conventions and agreements of the Postal Union signed at Washington, June 15, 1897.

Conventions and agreements of the Postal Union signed at Rome, May 26, 1906.

Telegraphic Conventions:

International Telegraphic Conventions signed at St. Petersburg July 10/22, 1875.

Regulations and Tariffs drawn up by the International Telegraphic Conference, Lisbon, June 11, 1908.

Austria undertakes not to refuse her assent to the conclusion by the new States of the special arrangements referred to in the Conventions and Agreements relating to the Universal Postal Union and to the International Telegraphic Union, to which the said new States have adhered or may adhere.

Article 236.

From the coming into force of the present Treaty the High Contracting Parties shall apply, in so far as concerns them, the International Radio-Telegraphic Convention of July 5, 1912, Austria undertaking to comply with the provisional regulations which will be indicated to her by the Allied and Associated Powers.

If within five years after the coming into force after the present Treaty a new convention regulating international radio-telegraphic communications should have been concluded to take the place of the Convention of July 5, 1912, this new convention shall bind Austria, even if Austria should refuse either to take part in drawing up the convention, or to subscribe thereto.

This new convention will likewise replace the provisional regulations in force.

Article 237.

The International Convention of Paris of March 20, 1883, for the protection of industrial property, revised at Washington on June 2, 1911, and the agreement of April 14, 1891, concerning the international registration of trade marks shall be applied as from the coming into force of the present Treaty, in so far as they are not affected or modified by the exceptions and restrictions resulting therefrom.

Article 238.

From the coming into force of the present Treaty the High Contracting Parties shall apply, in so far as concerns them, the Convention of the Hague of July 17, 1905, relating to civil procedure. This provision, however, will not apply to France, Portugal and Roumania.

Article 239.

Austria undertakes, within twelve months of the coming into force of the present Treaty, to adhere in the prescribed form to the International Convention of Berne of September 9, 1886, for the protection of literary and artistic works, revised at Berlin in 1908, and the Act and Protocol of March 20, 1914, relating to the protection of literary and artistic works.

Until her adherence, Austria undertakes to recognise and protect by effective measures and in accordance with the principles of the said Convention the literary and artistic works of nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers.

In addition, and irrespective of the above-mentioned adherence, Austria undertakes to continue to assure such recognition and such protection to all literary and artistic works of the nationals of each of the Allied and Associated Powers to an extent at least as great as upon July 28, 1914, and upon the same conditions.

Article 240.

Austria undertakes to adhere to the following Conventions:

(1) Convention of September 26, 1906, for the suppression of the use of white phosphorus in the manufacture of matches.

(2) Convention of December 31, 1913, regarding the unification of commercial statistics.

Article 241.

Each of the Allied or Associated Powers, being guided by the general principles or special provisions of the present Treaty, shall notify to Austria the bilateral agreements of all kinds which were in force between her and the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, and which she wishes should be in force as between her and Austria.

The notification referred to in the present Article shall be made either directly or through the intermediary of another Power. Receipt thereof shall be acknowledged in writing by Austria. The date of the coming into force shall be that of the notification.

The Allied and Associated Powers undertake among themselves not to apply as between themselves and Austria any agreements which are not in accordance with the terms of the present Treaty.

The notification shall mention any provisions of the said agreements which, not being in accordance with the terms of the present Treaty, shall not be considered as coming into force.

In case of any difference of opinion, the League of Nations will be called on to decide.

A period of six months from the coming into force of the present Treaty is allowed to the Allied and Associated Powers within which to make the notification.

Only those bilateral agreements which have been the subject of such a notification shall be put in force between the Allied and Associated Powers and Austria.

The above rules apply to all bilateral agreements existing between any Allied and Associated Powers signatories to the present Treaty and Austria, even if the said Allied and Associated Powers have not been in a state of war with Austria.

Article 242.

Austria hereby recognizes that all treaties, conventions or agreements concluded by her, or by the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, with Germany, Hungary, Bulgaria or Turkey since August 1, 1914, until the coming into force of the present Treaty are of no effect.

Article 243.

Austria undertakes to secure to the Allied and Associated Powers, and to the officials and nationals of the said Powers, the enjoyment of all the rights and advantages of any kind which she, or the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, may have granted to Germany, Hungary, Bulgaria or Turkey, or to the officials and nationals of these States by treaties, conventions or arrangements concluded before August 1, 1914, so long as those treaties, conventions or arrangements are in force.

The Allied and Associated Powers reserves the right to accept or not the enjoyment of these rights and advantages.

Article 244.

Austria recognises that all treaties, conventions or arrangements which she, or the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, concluded with Russia, or with any State or Government of which the territory previously formed a part of Russia, or with Roumania, before July 28, 1914, or after that date until the coming into force of the present Treaty, are of no effect.

Article 245.

Should an Allied or Associated Power, Russia, or a State or Government of which the territory formerly constituted a part of Russia, have been forced since July 28, 1914, by reason of military occupation or by any other means or for any other cause, to grant or to allow to be granted by the act of any public authority, concessions, privileges and favours of any kind to the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, or to Austria or to an Austrian national, such concessions, privileges and favours are ipso facto annulled by the present Treaty.

No claims or indemnities which may result from this annulment shall be charged against the Allied or Associated Powers or the Powers, States, Governments or public authorities which are released from their engagements by the present Article.

Article 246.

From the coming into force of the present Treaty Austria undertakes, so far as she is concerned, to give the Allied and Associated Powers and their nationals the benefit ipso facto of the rights and advantages of any kind which she or the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy has granted by treaties, conventions, or arrangements to non-belligerent States or their nationals since July 28, 1914, until the coming into force of the present Treaty, so long as those treaties, conventions or arrangements are in force for Austria.

Article 247.

Those of the High Contracting Parties who have not yet signed, or who have signed but not yet ratified, the Opium Convention signed at The Hague on January 23, 1912, agree to bring the said Convention into force, and for this purpose to enact the necessary legislation without delay and in any case within a period of twelve months from the coming into force of the present Treaty.

Furthermore, they agree that ratification of the present Treaty should in the case of Powers which have not yet ratified the Opium Convention be deemed in all respects equivalent to the ratification of that Convention and to the signature of the Special Protocol which was opened at The Hague in accordance with the resolutions adopted by the Third Opium Conference in 1914 for bringing the said Convention into force.

For this purpose the Government of the French Republic will communicate to the Government of the Netherlands a certified copy of the protocol of the deposit of ratifications of the present Treaty, and will invite the Government of the Netherlands to accept and deposit the said certified copy as if it were a deposit of ratifications of the Opium Convention and a signature of the Additional Protocol of 1914.

Section III.

DEBTS.

Article 248.

There shall be settled through the intervention of Clearing Offices to be established by each of the High Contracting Parties within three months of the notification referred to in paragraph (e) hereafter the following classes of pecuniary obligations:

(1) Debts payable before the war and due by a national of one of the Contracting Powers, residing within its territory, to a national of an Opposing Power, residing within its territory;

(2) Debts which became payable during the war to nationals of one Contracting Power residing within its territory and arose out of transactions or contracts with the nationals of an Opposing Power, resident within its territory, of which the total or partial execution was suspended on account of the existence of a state of war;

(3) Interest which has accrued due before and during the war to a national of one of the Contracting Powers in respect of securities issued or taken over by an Opposing Power, provided that the payment of interest on such securities to the nationals of that Power or to neutrals has not been suspended during the war;

(4) Capital sums which have become payable before and during the war to nationals of one of the Contracting Powers in respect of securities issued by one of the Opposing Powers, provided that the payment of such capital sums to nationals of that Power or to neutrals has not been suspended during the war.

In the case of interest or capital sums payable in respect of securities issued or taken over by the former Autro-Hungarian Government the amount to be credited and paid by Austria will be the interest or capital in respect only of the debt for which Austria is liable in accordance with the Financial Clauses of the present Treaty, and the principles laid down by the Reparation Commission.

The proceeds of liquidation of enemy property, rights, and interests mentioned in Section IV and in the Annex thereto will be accounted for through the Clearing Offices, in the currency and at the rate of exchange hereinafter provided in paragraph (d), and disposed of by them under the conditions provided by the said Section and Annex.

The settlements provided for in this Article shall be effected according to the following principles and in accordance with the Annex to this Section:

(a) Each of the High Contracting Parties shall prohibit, as from the coming into force of the present Treaty, both the payment and the acceptance of payment of such debts, and also all communications between the interested parties with regard to the settlement of the said debts otherwise than through the Clearing Offices.

(b) Each of he High Contracting Parties shall be respectively responsible for the payment of such debts due by its nationals, except in the cases where before the war the debtor was in a state of bankruptcy or failure, or had given formal indication of insolvency, or where the debt was due by a company whose business has been liquidated under emergency legislation during the war.

(c) The sums due to the nationals of one of the High Contracting Parties by the nationals of an Opposing State will be debited to the Clearing Office of the country of the debtor, and paid to the creditor by the Clearing Office of the country of the creditor.

(d) Debts shall be paid or credited in the currency of such one of the Allied and Associated Powers, their colonies or protectorates, or the British Dominions or India, as may be concerned. If the debts are payable in some other currency they shall be paid or credited in the currency of the country concerned, whether an Allied or Associated Power, Colony, Protectorate, British Dominion or India, at the pre-war rate of exchange.

For the purpose of this provision the pre-war rate of exchange shall be defined as the average cable transfer rate prevailing in the Allied or Associated country concerned during the month immediately preceding the outbreak of war between the said country concerned and Austria-Hungary.

If a contract provides for a fixed rate of exchange governing the conversion of the currency in which the debt is stated into the currency of the Allied or Associated country concerned, then the above provisions concerning the rate of exchange shall not apply.

In the case of the new States of Poland and the Czecho-Slovak State the currency in which and the rate of exchange at which debts shall be paid or credited shall be determined by the Reparation Commission provided for in Part VIII, unless they shall have been previously settled by agreement between the States interested.

(e) The provisions of this Article and of the Annex hereto shall not apply as between Austria on the one hand and any one of the Allied and Associated Powers, their colonies or protectorates, or any one of the British Dominions or India on the other hand, unless within a period of one month from the deposit of the ratification of the present Treaty by the Power in question, or of the ratification on behalf of such Dominion or of India, notice to that effect is given to Austria by the Government of such Allied or Associated Power or of such Dominion or of India as the case may be.

(f) The Allied and Associated Powers which have adopted this Article and the Annex hereto may agree between themselves to apply them to their respective nationals established in their territory so far as regards matters between their nationals and Austrian nationals. In this case the payments made by application of this provision will be subject to arrangements between the Allied and Associated Clearing Offices concerned.

ANNEX.

1.

Each of the High Contracting Parties will, within three months from the notification provided for in Article 248, paragraph (c), establish a Clearing Office for the collection and payment of enemy debts.

Local Clearing Offices may be established for any particular portion of the territories of the High Contracting Parties. Such local Clearing Offices may perform all the functions of a central Clearing Office in their respective districts, except that all transactions with the clearing office in the Opposing State must be effected through the central Clearing Office.

2.

In this Annex the pecuniary obligations referred to in the first paragraph of Article 248 are described as "enemy debts," the persons from whom the same are due as "enemy debtors," the persons to whom they are due as "enemy creditors," the Clearing Office in the country of the creditor is called the "Creditor Clearing Office," and the Clearing Office in the country of the debtor is called the "Debtor Clearing Office."

3.

The High Contracting Parties will subject contraventions of paragraph (a) of Article 248 to the same penalties as are at present provided by their legislation for trading with the enemy. They will similarly prohibit within their territory all legal process relating to payment of enemy debts, except in accordance with the provisions of this Annex.

4.

The Government guarantee specified in paragraph (b) of Article 248 shall take effect whenever, for any reason, a debt shall not be recoverable, except in a case where at the date of the outbreak of war the debt was barred by the laws of prescription in force in the country of the debtor, or where the debtor was at that time in a state of bankruptcy or failure or had given formal indication of insolvency, or where the debt was due by a company whose business has been liquidated under emergency legislation during the war. In such case the procedure specified by this Annex shall apply to payment of the dividends.

The terms "bankruptcy" and "failure" refer to the application of legislation providing for such juridical conditions. The expression "formal indication of insolvency" bears the same meaning as it has in English law.

Creditors shall give notice to the Creditor Clearing Office within six months of its establishment of debts due to them, and shall furnish the Clearing Office with any documents and information required of them.

The High Contracting Parties will take all suitable measures to trace and punish collusion between enemy creditors and debtors. The Clearing Offices will communicate to one another any evidence and information which might help the discovery and punishment of such collusion.

The High Contracting Parties will facilitate as much as possible postal and telegraphic communication at the expense of the parties concerned and through the intervention of the Clearing Offices between debtors and creditors desirous of coming to an agreement as to the amount of their debt.

The Creditor Clearing Office will notify the Debtor Clearing Office of all debts declared to it. The Debtor Clearing Office will, in due course, inform the Creditor Clearing Office which debts are admitted and which debts are contested. In the latter case, the Debtor Clearing Office will give the grounds for the non-admission of debt.

6.

When a debt has been admitted, in whole or in part, the Debtor Clearing Office will at once credit the Creditor Clearing Office with the amount admitted, and at the same time notify it of such credit.

7.

The debt shall be deemed to be admitted in full and shall be credited forthwith to the Creditor Clearing Office unless within three months from the receipt of the notification or such longer time as may be agreed to by the Creditor Clearing Office notice has been given by the Debtor Clearing Office that it is not admitted.

8.

When the whole or part of a debt is not admitted the two Clearing Offices will examine into the matter jointly and will endeavour to bring the parties to an agreement.

9.

The Creditor Clearing Office will pay to the individual creditor the sums credited to it out of the funds placed at its disposal by the Government of its country and in accordance with the conditions fixed by the said Government, retaining any sums considered necessary to cover risks, expenses or commissions.

10.

Any person having claimed payment of an enemy debt which is not admitted in whole or in part shall pay to the Clearing Office, by way of fine, interest at 5 per cent. on the part not admitted. Any person having unduly refused to admit the whole or part of a debt claimed from him shall pay, by way of fine, interest at 5 per cent. on the amount with regard to which his refusal shall be disallowed.

Such interest shall run from the date of expiration of the period provided for in paragraph 7 until the date on which the claim shall have been disallowed or the debt paid.

Each Clearing Office shall in so far as it is concerned take steps to collect the fines above provided for, and will be responsible if such fines cannot be collected.

The fines will be credited to the other Clearing Office, which shall retain them as a contribution towards the cost of carrying out the present provisions.

11.

The balance between the Clearing Offices shall be struck monthly and the credit balance paid in cash by the debtor State within a week.

Nevertheless, any credit balances which may be due by one or more of the Allied and Associated Powers shall be retained until complete payment shall have been effected of the sums due to the Allied or Associated Powers or their nationals on account of the war.

12.

To facilitate discussion between the Clearing Offices each of them shall have a representative at the place where the other is established.

13.

Except for special reasons all discussions in regard to claims will, so far as possible, take place at the Debtor Clearing Office.

14.

In conformity with Article 248, paragraph (b), the High Contracting Parties are responsible for the payment of the enemy debts owing by their nationals.

The Debtor Clearing Office will therefore credit the Creditor Clearing Office with all debts admitted, even in case of inability to collect them from the individual debtor. The Governments concerned will, nevertheless, invest their respective Clearing Offices with all necessary powers for the recovery of debts which have been admitted.

15.

Each Government will defray the expenses of the Clearing Office set up in its territory, including the salaries of the staff.

16.

Where the two Clearing Offices are unable to agree whether a debt claimed is due, or in case of a difference between an enemy debtor and an enemy creditor or between the Clearing Offices, the dispute shall either be referred to arbitration if the parties so agree under conditions fixed by agreement between them, or referred to the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for in Section VI hereafter.

At the request of the Creditor Clearing Office the dispute may, however, be submitted to the jurisdiction of the Courts of the place of domicile of the debtor.

17.

Recovery of sums found by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal, the Court, or the Arbitration Tribunal to be due shall be effected through the Clearing Offices as if these sums were debts admitted by the Debtor Clearing Office.

18.

Each of the Governments concerned shall appoint an agent who will be responsible for the preservation of the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal of the cases conducted on behalf of its Clearing Office. This agent will exercise a general control over the representatives or counsel employed by its nationals.

Decisions will be arrived at on documentary evidence, but it will be open to the Tribunal to hear the parties in person, or according to their preference by their representatives approved by the two Governments, or by the agent referred to above, who shall be competent to intervene along with the party or to reopen and maintain a claim abandoned by the same.

The Clearing Offices concerned will lay before the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal all the information and documents in their possession, so as to enable the Tribunal to decide rapidly on the cases which are brought before it.

20.

Where one of the parties concerned appeals against the joint decision of the two Clearing Offices he shall make a deposit against the costs, which deposit shall only be refunded when the first judgment is modified in favour of the appellant and in proportion to the success he may attain, his opponent in case of such a refund being required to pay an equivalent proportion of the costs and expenses. Security accepted by the Tribunal may be substituted for a deposit.

A fee of 5 per cent. of the amount in dispute shall be charged in respect of all cases brought before the Tribunal. This fee shall, unless the Tribunal directs otherwise, be borne by the unsuccessful party. Such fee shall be added to the deposit referred to. It is also independent of the security.

The Tribunal may award to one of the parties a sum in respect of the expenses of the proceedings.

Any sum payable under this paragraph shall be credited to the Clearing Office of the successful party as a separate item.

21.

With a view to the rapid settlement of claims, due regard shall be paid in the appointment of all persons connected with the Clearing Offices or with the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal to their knowledge of the language of the other country concerned. Each of the Clearing Offices will be at liberty to correspond with the other and to forward documents in its own language.

22.

Subject to any special agreement to the contrary between the Governments concerned, debts shall carry interest in accordance with the following provisions:

Interest shall not be payable on sums of money due by way of dividend, interest, or other periodical payments which themselves represent interest on capital.

The rate of interest shall be 5 per cent. per annum, except in cases where, by contract, law, or custom, the creditor is entitled to payment of interest at a different rate. In such cases the rate to which he is entitled shall prevail.

Interest shall run from the date of commencement of hostilities (or, if the sum of money to be recovered fell due during the war, from the date at which it fell due) until the sum is credited to the Clearing Office of the creditor.

Sums due by way of interest shall be treated as debts admitted by the Clearing Office and shall be credited to the Creditor Clearing Office in the same way as such debts.

23.

Where by decision of the Clearing Offices or the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal a claim is held not to fall within Article 248, the creditor shall be at liberty to prosecute the claim before the Courts or to take such other proceedings as may be open to him.

The presentation of a claim to the Clearing Office suspends the operation of any period of prescription.

24.

The High Contracting Parties agree to regard the decisions of the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal as final and conclusive, and to render them binding upon their nationals.

25.

In any case where a Creditor Clearing Office declines to notify a claim to the Debtor Clearing Office, or to take any step provided for in this Annex intended to make effective in whole or in part a request of which it has received due notice, the enemy creditor shall be entitled to receive from the Clearing Office a certificate setting out the amount of the claim, and shall then be entitled to prosecute the claim before the courts or to take such other proceedings as may be open to him.

Section IV.

PROPERTY, RIGHTS AND INTERESTS.

Article 249.

The question of private property, rights and interests in an enemy country shall be settled according to the principles laid down in this Section and to the provisions of the Annex hereto:

(a) The exceptional war measures and measures of transfer (defined in paragraph 3 of the Annex hereto) taken in the territory of the former Austrian Empire with respect to the property, rights and interests of nationals of Allied or Associated Powers, including companies and associations in which they are interested, when liquidation has not been completed, shall be immediately discontinued or stayed and the property, rights and interests concerned restored to their owners.

(b) Subject to any contrary stipulations which may be provided for in the present Treaty, the Allied and Associated Powers reserve the right to retain and liquidate all property, rights and interests which belong at the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty to nationals of the former Austrian Empire, or companies controlled by them, and are within the territories, colonies, possessions and protectorates of such Powers (including territories ceded to them by the present Treaty) or are under the control of those Powers.

The liquidation shall be carried out in accordance with the laws of the Allied or Associated State concerned, and the owner shall not be able to dispose of such property, rights or interests nor to subject them to any charge without the consent of that State.

Persons who within six months of the coming into force of the present Treaty show that they have acquired ipso facto in accordance with its provisions the nationality of an Allied or Associated Power, including those who under Article 72 or 76 obtain such nationality with the consent of the competent authorities, or who under Articles 74 or 77 acquire such nationality in virtue of previous rights of citizenship (pertinenza) will not be considered as nationals of the former Austrian Empire within the meaning of this paragraph.

(c) The price or the amount of compensation in respect of the exercise of the right referred to in paragraph (b) will be fixed in accordance with the methods of sale or valuation adopted by the laws of the country in which the property has been retained or liquidated.

(d) As between the Allied and Associated Powers and their nationals on the one hand and nationals of the former Austrian Empire on the other hand, as also between Austria on the one hand and the Allied and Associated Powers and their nationals on the other hand, all the exceptional war measures, or measures of transfer, or acts done or to be done in execution of such measures as defined in paragraphs 1 and 3 of the Annex hereto shall be considered as final and binding upon all persons except as regards the reservations laid down in the present Treaty.

(e) The nationals of Allied and Associated Powers shall be entitled to compensation in respect of damage or injury inflicted upon their property, rights or interests, including any company or association in which they are interested, in the territory of the former Austrian Empire, by the application either of the exceptional war measures or measures of transfer mentioned in paragraphs 1 and 3 of the Annex hereto. The claims made in this respect by such nationals shall be investigated, and the total of the compensation shall be determined by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for in Section VI or by an arbitrator appointed by that Tribunal. This compensation shall be borne by Austria, and may be charged upon the property of nationals of the former Austrian Empire, or companies controlled by them, as defined in paragraph (b), within the territory or under the control of the claimant's State. This property may be constituted as a pledge for enemy liabilities under the conditions fixed by paragraph 4 of the Annex hereto. The payment of this compensation may be made by the Allied or Associated State, and the amount will be debited to Austria.

(f) Whenever a national of an Allied or Associated Power is entitled to property which has been subjected to a measure of transfer in the territory of the former Austrian Empire and expresses a desire for its restitution, his claim for compensation in accordance with paragraph (e) shall be satisfied by the restitution of the said property if it still exists in specie.

In such case Austria shall take all necessary steps to restore the evicted owner to the possession of his property, free from all encumbrances or burdens with which it may have been charged after the liquidation, and to indemnify all third parties injured by the restitution.

If the restitution provided for in this paragraph cannot be effected, private agreements arranged by the intermediation of the Powers concerned or the Clearing Offices provided for in the Annex to Section III may be made, in order to secure that the national of the Allied or Associated Power may secure compensation for the injury referred to in paragraph (e) by the grant of advantages or equivalents which he agrees to accept in place of the property, rights or interests of which he was deprived.

Through restitution in accordance with this Article, the price or the amount of compensation fixed by the application of paragraph (e) will be reduced by the actual value of the property restored, account being taken of compensation in respect of loss of use or deterioration.

(g) The rights conferred by paragraph (f) are reserved to owners who are nationals of Allied or Associated Powers within whose territory legislative measures prescribing the general liquidation of enemy property, rights or interests were not applied before the signature of the Armistice.

(h) Except in cases where, by application of paragraph (f), restitutions in specie have been made, the net proceeds of sales of enemy property, rights or interests wherever situated carried out either by virtue of war legislation, or by application of this Article, and in general all cash assets of enemies, other than proceeds of sales of property or cash assets in Allied or Associated countries belonging to persons covered by the last sentence of paragraph (b) above, shall be dealt with as follows:

(1) As regards Powers adopting Section III and the Annex thereto, the said proceeds and cash assets shall be credited to the Power of which the owner is a national, through the Clearing Office established thereunder; any credit balance in favour of Austria resulting therefrom shall be dealt with as provided in Article 189 of Part VIII (Reparation) of the present Treaty.

(2) As regards Powers not adopting Section III and the Annex thereto, the proceeds of the property, rights and interests, and the cash assets, of the nationals of Allied or Associated Powers held by Austria shall be paid immediately to the person entitled thereto or to his Government; the proceeds of the property, rights and interests, and the cash assets, of nationals of the former Austrian Empire, or companies controlled by them, as defined in paragraph (b), received by an Allied or Associated Power shall be subject to disposal by such Power in accordance with its laws and regulations and may be applied in payment of the claims and debts defined by this Article or paragraph 4 of the Annex hereto. Any such property, rights and interests or proceeds thereof or cash assets not used as above provided may be retained by the said Allied or Associated Power, and if retained, the cash value thereof shall be dealt with as provided in Article 189 of Part VIII (Reparation) of the present Treaty.

(i) Subject to the provisions of Article 267, in the case of liquidations effected in new States, which are signatories of the present Treaty as Allied and Associated Powers, or in States which are not entitled to share in the reparation payments to be made by Austria, the proceeds of liquidations effected by such States shall, subject to the rights of the Reparation Commission under the present Treaty, particularly under Articles 181 (Part VIII) and 211 (Part IX), be paid direct to the owner. If, on the application of that owner, the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for by Section VI of this Part, or an arbitrator appointed by that Tribunal, is satisfied that the conditions of the sale or measures taken by the Government of the State in question outside its general legislation were unfairly prejudicial to the price obtained, they shall have discretion to award to the owner equitable compensation to be paid by that State.

(j) Austria undertakes to compensate her nationals in respect of the sale or retention of their property, rights or interests in Allied or Associated States.

(k) The amount of all taxes or imposts on capital levied or to be levied by Austria on the property, rights and interests of the nationals of the Allied or Associated Powers from November 3, 1918, until three months from the coming into force of the present Treaty, or, in the case of property, rights or interests which have been subjected to exceptional measures of war, until restitution in accordance with the present Treaty, shall be restored to the owners.

Article 250.

Austria undertakes, with regard to the property, rights and interests, including companies and associations in which they were interested, restored to nationals of Allied and Associated Powers in accordance with the provisions of Article 249, paragraph (a) or (f):

(a) to restore and maintain, except as expressly provided in the present Treaty, the property, rights and interests of the nationals of Allied or Associated Powers in the legal position obtaining in respect of the property, rights and interests of nationals of the former Austrian Empire under the laws in force before the war;

(b) not to subject the property, rights or interests of the nationals of the Allied or Associated Powers to any measures in derogation of property rights which are not applied equally to the property, rights and interests of Austrian nationals, and to pay adequate compensation in the event of the application of these measures.

ANNEX.

In accordance with the provisions of Article 249, paragraph (d), the validity of vesting orders and of orders for the winding up of businesses or companies, and of any other orders, directions, decisions or instructions of any court or any department of the Government of any of the High Contracting Parties made or given, or purporting to be made or given, in pursuance of war legislation with regard to enemy property, rights and interests is confirmed. The interests of all persons shall be regarded as having been effectively dealt with by any order, direction, decision or instruction dealing with property in which they may be interested, whether or not such interests are specifically mentioned in the order, direction, decision, or instruction. No question shall be raised as to the regularity of a transfer of any property, rights or interests dealt with in pursuance of any such order, direction, decision or instruction. Every action taken with regard to any property, business or company, whether as regards its investigation, sequestration, compulsory administration, use, requistion, supervision or winding up, the sale or management of property, rights or interests, the collection or discharge of debts, the payment of costs, charges or expenses, or any other matter whatsoever, in pursuance of orders, directions, decisions or instructions of any court or of any department of the Government of any of the High Contracting Parties, made or given, or purporting to be made or given, in pursuance of war legislation with regard to enemy property, rights or interests, is confirmed. Provided that the provisions of this paragraph shall not be held to prejudice the titles to property heretofore acquired in good faith and for value and in accordance with the laws of the country in which the property is situated by nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers.

The provisions of this paragraph do not apply to such of the above-mentioned measures as have been taken by the former Austro-Hungarian Government in invaded or occupied territory, nor to such of the above-mentioned measures as have been taken by Austria or the Austrian authorities since November 3, 1918, all of which measures shall be void.

No claim shall be made or brought against any Allied or Associated Power or against any person acting on behalf of or under the direction of any legal authority or department of the Government of such a Power by Austria or by any Austrian national or by or on behalf of any national of the former Austrian Empire wherever resident in respect of any act or omission with regard to his property, rights or interests during the war or in preparation for the war. Similarly no claim or action shall be made or brought against any person in respect of any act or omission under or in accordance with the exceptional war measures, laws or regulations of any Allied or Associated Power.

In Article 249 and this Annex the expression "exceptional war measures" includes measures of all kinds, legislative, administrative, judicial or others, that have been taken or will be taken hereafter with regard to enemy property, and which have had or will have the effect of removing from the proprietors the power of disposition over their property, though without affecting the ownership, such as measures of supervision, of compulsory administration, and of sequestration; or measures which have had or will have as an object the seizure of, the use of, or the interference with enemy assets, for whatsoever motive, under whatsoever form or in whatsoever place. Acts in the execution of these measures include all detentions, instructions, orders or decrees of Government departments or courts applying these measures to enemy property, as well as acts performed by any person connected with the administration or the supervision of enemy property, such as the payment of debts, the collecting of credits, the payment of any costs, charges or expenses, or the collecting of fees.

Measures of transfer are those which have affected or will affect the ownership of enemy property by transferring it in whole or in part to a person other than the enemy owner, and without his consent, such as measures directing the sale, liquidation, or devolution of ownership in enemy property, or the cancelling of titles or securities.

All property, rights and interests of nationals of the former Austrian Empire within the territory of any Allied or Associated Power and the net proceeds of their sale, liquidation or other dealing therewith may be charged by that Allied or Associated Power in the first place with payment of amounts due in respect of claims by the nationals of that Allied or Associated Power with regard to their property, rights and interests, including companies and associations in which they are interested, in territory of the former Austrian Empire, or debts owing to them by Austrian nationals, and with payment of claims growing out of acts committed by the former Austro-Hungarian Government or by any Austrian authorities since July 28, 1914, and before that Allied or Associated Power entered into the war. The amount of such claims may be assessed by an arbitrator appointed by M. Gustave Ador, if he is willing, or if no such appointment is made by him, by an arbitrator appointed by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for in Section VI. They may be charged in the second place with payment of the amounts due in respect of claims by the nationals of such Allied or Associated Power with regard to their property, rights and interests in the territory of other enemy Powers, in so far as those claims are otherwise unsatisfied.

Nothwithstanding the provisions of Article 249, where immediately before the outbreak of war a company incorporated in an Allied or Associated State had rights in common with a company controlled by it and incorporated in Austria to the use of trade-marks in third countries, or enjoyed the use in common with such company of unique means of reproduction of goods or articles for sale in third countries, the former company shall alone have the right to use these trade-marks in third countries to the exclusion of the Austrian company, and these unique means of reproduction shall be handed over to the former company, notwithstanding any action taken under war legislation in force in the Austro-Hungarian Monarchy with regard to the latter company or its business, industrial property or shares. Nevertheless, the former company, if requested, shall deliver to the latter company derivative copies permitting the continuation of reproduction of articles for use within Austrian territory.

6.

Up to the time when restitution is carried out in accordance with Article 249, Austria is responsible for the conservation of property, rights and interests of the nationals of Allied or Associated Powers, including companies and associations in which they are interested, that have been subjected by her to exceptional war measures.

7.

Within one year from the coming into force of the present Treaty the Allied or Associated Powers will specify the property, rights and interests over which they intend to exercise the right provided in Article 249, paragraph (f).

8.

The restitution provided in Article 249 will be carried out by order of the Austrian Government or of the authorities which have been substituted for it. Detailed accounts of the action of administrators shall be furnished to the interested persons by the Austrian authorities upon request, which may be made at any time after the coming into force of the present Treaty.

9.

Until completion of the liquidation provided for by Article 249, paragraph (b), the property, rights and interests of the persons referred to in that paragraph will continue to be subject to exceptional war measures that have been or will be taken with regard to them.

10.

Austria will, within six months from the coming into force of the present Treaty, deliver to each Allied or Associated Power all securities, certificates, deeds, or other documents of title held by its nationals and relating to property, rights or interests situated in the territory of that Allied or Associated Power, including any shares, stock, debentures, debenture stock, or other obligations of any company incorporated in accordance with the laws of that Power.

Austria will at any time on demand of any Allied or Associated Power furnish such information as may be required with regard to the property, rights and interests of Austrian nationals within the territory of such Allied or Associated Power, or with regard to any transactions concerning such property, rights or interests effected since July 1, 1914.

The expression "cash assets" includes all deposits or funds established before or after the existence of a state of war, as well as all assets coming from deposits, revenues, or profits collected by administrators, sequestrators, or others from funds placed on deposit or otherwise, but does not include sums belonging to the Allied or Associated Powers or to their component States, Provinces, or Municipalities.

12.

All investments wheresoever effected with the cash assets of nationals of the High Contracting Parties, including companies and associations in which such nationals were interested, by persons responsible for the administration of enemy properties or having control over such administration, or by order of such persons or of any authority whatsoever, shall be annulled. These cash assets shall be accounted for irrespective of any such investment.

13.

Within one month from the coming into force of the present Treaty, or on demand at any time, Austria will deliver to the Allied and Associated Powers all accounts, vouchers, records, documents, and information of any kind which may be within

Austrian territory, and which concern the property, rights and interests of the nationals of those Powers, including companies and associations in which they are interested, that have been subjected to an exceptional war measure, or to a measure of transfer either in the territory of the former Austrian Empire or in territory occupied by that Empire or its allies.

The controllers, supervisors, managers, administrators, sequestrators, liquidators, and receivers shall be personally responsible under guarantee of the Austrian Government for the immediate delivery in full of these accounts and documents, and for their accuracy.

The provisions of Article 249 and this Annex relating to property, rights and interests in an enemy country, and the proceeds of the liquidation thereof, apply to debts, credits and accounts. Section III regulating only the method of payment.

In the settlement of matters provided for in Article 249 between Austria and the Allied or Associated Powers, their colonies or protectorates, or any one of the British Dominions or India, in respect of any of which a declaration shall not have been made that they adopt Section III, and between their respective nationals, the provisions of Section III respecting the currency in which payment is to be made and the rate of exchange and of interest shall apply unless the Government of the Allied or Associated Power concerned shall within six months of the coming into force of the present Treaty notify Austria that one or more of the said provisions are not to be applied.

The provisions of Article 249 and this Annex apply to industrial, literary and artistic property which has been or will be dealt with in the liquidation of property, rights, interests, companies or businesses under war legislation by the Allied or Associated Powers, or in accordance with the stipulations of Article 249, paragraph (b).

Section V.

CONTRACTS, PRESCRIPTIONS, JUDGMENTS.

Article 251.

(a) Any contract concluded between enemies shall be regarded as having been dissolved as from the time when any two of the parties became enemies, except in respect of any debt or other pecuniary obligation arising out of any act done or money paid thereunder, and subject to the exceptions and special rules with regard to particular contracts or classes of contracts contained herein or in the Annex hereto.

(b) Any contract of which the execution shall be required in the general interest, within six months from the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty, by the Government of the Allied or Associated Power of which one of the parties is a national, shall be excepted from dissolution under this Article.

When the execution of the contract thus kept alive would, owing to the alteration of trade conditions, cause one of the parties substantial prejudice the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for by Section VI shall be empowered to grant to the prejudiced party equitable compensation.

(c) Having regard to the provisions of the constitution and law of the United States of America, of Brazil, and of Japan, neither the present Article, nor Article 252, nor the Annex hereto shall apply to contracts made between nationals of these States and nationals of the former Austrian Empire; nor shall Article 257 apply to the United States of America or its nationals.

(d) The present Article and the Annex hereto shall not apply to contracts the parties to which became enemies by reason of one of them being an inhabitant of territory of which the sovereignty has been transferred, if such party shall acquire under the present Treaty the nationality of an Allied or Associated Power, nor shall they apply to contracts between nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers between whom trading has been prohibited by reason of one of the parties being in Allied or Associated territory in the occupation of the enemy.

(e) Nothing in the present Article or the Annex hereto shall be deemed to invalidate a transaction lawfully carried out in accordance with a contract between enemies if it has been carried out with the authority of one of the belligerent Powers.

Article 252.

(a) All periods of prescription, or limitation of right of action, whether they began to run before or after the outbreak of war, shall be treated in the territory of the High Contracting Parties, so far as regards relations between enemies, as having been suspended for the duration of the war. They shall begin to run again at earliest three months after the coming into force of the present Treaty. This provision shall apply to the period prescribed for the presentation of interest or dividend coupons or for the presentation for repayment of securities drawn for repayment or repayable on any other ground.

(b) Where, on account of failure to perform any act or comply with any formality during the war, measures of execution have been taken in the territory of the former Austrian Empire to the prejudice of a national of an Allied or Associated Power, the claim of such national shall, if the matter does not fall within the competence of the Courts of an Allied or Associated Power, be heard by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for by Section VI.

(c) Upon the application of any interested person who is a national of an Allied or Associated Power the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal shall order the restoration of the rights which have been prejudiced by the measures of execution referred to in paragraph (b), wherever, having regard to the particular circumstances of the case, such restoration is equitable and possible.

If such restoration is inequitable or impossible the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal may grant compensation to the prejudiced party to be paid by the Austrian Government.

(d) Where a contract between enemies has been dissolved by reason either of failure on the part of either party to carry out its provisions or of the exercise of a right stipulated in the contract itself the party prejudiced may apply to the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal for relief. The Tribunal will have the powers provided for in paragraph (c).

(e) The provisions of the preceding paragraphs of this Article shall apply to the nationals of Allied and Associated Powers who have been prejudiced by reason of measures referred to above taken by the authorities of the former Austrian Government in invaded or occupied territory, if they have not been otherwise compensated.

(f) Austria shall compensate any third party who may be prejudiced by any restitution or restoration ordered by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal under the provisions of the preceding paragraphs of this Article.

(g) As regards negotiable instruments, the period of three months provided under paragraph (a) shall commence as from the date on which any exceptional regulations applied in the territories of the interested Power with regard to negotiable instruments shall have definitely ceased to have force.

Article 253.

As between enemies no negotiable instrument made before the war shall be deemed to have become invalid by reason only of failure within the required time to present the instrument for acceptance or payment or to give notice of non-acceptance or non-payment to drawers or indorsers or to protest the instrument, nor by reason of failure to complete any formality during the war.

Where the period within which a negotiable instrument should have been presented for acceptance or for payment, or within which notice of non-acceptance or non-payment should have been given to the drawer or indorser, or within which the instrument should have been protested, has elapsed during the war, and the party who should have presented or protested the instrument or have given notice of non-acceptance or non-payment has failed to do so during the war, a period of not less than three months from the coming into force of the present Treaty shall be allowed within which presentation, notice of non-acceptance or non-payment or protest may be made.

Article 254.

Judgments given by the Courts of an Allied or Associated Power in all cases which, under the present Treaty, they are competent to decide, shall be recognised in Austria as final, and shall be enforced without it being necessary to have them declared executory.

If a judgment or measure of execution in respect of any dispute which may have arisen has been given during the war by a judicial authority of the former Austrian Empire against a national of an Allied or Associated Power, or a company or association in which one of such nationals was interested, in a case in which either such national or such company or association was not able to make their defence, the Allied and Associated national who has suffered prejudice thereby shall be entitled to recover compensation to be fixed by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal provided for in Section VI.

At the instance of the national of the Allied or Associated Power the compensation above-mentioned may, upon order to that effect of the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal, be effected where it is possible by replacing the parties in the situation which they occupied before the judgment was given by the Austrian Court.

The above compensation may likewise be obtained before the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal by the nationals of Allied or Associated Powers who have suffered prejudice by judicial measures taken in invaded or occupied territories, if they have not been otherwise compensated.

Article 255.

For the purpose of Sections III, IV, V and VII, the expression "during the war" means for each Allied or Associated Power the period between the commencement of the state of war between that Power and the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy and the coming into force of the present Treaty.

ANNEX.

I.—General Provisions.

1.

Within the meaning of Articles 251, 252, and 253, the parties to a contract shall be regarded as enemies when trading between them shall have been prohibited by or otherwise became unlawful under laws, orders or regulations to which one of those parties was subject. They shall be deemed to have become enemies from the date when such trading was prohibited or otherwise became unlawful.

2.

The following classes of contracts are excepted from dissolution by Article 251 and, without prejudice to the rights contained in Article 249(b) of Section IV, remain in force subject to the application of domestic laws, orders or regulations made during the war by the Allied and Associated Powers and subject to the terms of the contracts:

(a) Contracts having for their object the transfer of estates or of real or personal property where the property therein had passed or the object had been delivered before the parties became enemies;

(b) Leases and agreements for leases of land and houses;

(c) Contracts of mortgage, pledge, or lien;

(d) Concessions concerning mines, quarries or deposits;

(e) Contracts between individuals or companies and States, provinces, municipalities, or other similar juridical persons charged with administrative functions, and concessions granted by States, provinces, municipalities, or other similar juridical persons charged with administrative functions.

3.

If the provisions of a contract are in part dissolved under Article 251, the remaining provisions of that contract shall, subject to the same application of domestic laws as is provided for in paragraph 2, continue in force if they are severable, but where they are not severable the contract shall be deemed to have been dissolved in its entirety.

II.—Provisions relating to certain classes of Contracts.

STOCK EXCHANGE AND COMMERCIAL EXCHANGE CONTRACTS.

4.

(a) Rules made during the war by any recognised Exchange or Commercial Association providing for the closure of contracts entered into before the war by an enemy are confirmed by the High Contracting Parties, as also any action taken thereunder, provided:

(i.) That the contract was expressed to be made subject to the rules of the Exchange or Association in question;

(ii.) That the rules applied to all persons concerned;

(iii.) That the conditions attaching to the closure were fair and reasonable.

(b) The preceding paragraph shall not apply to rules made during the occupation by Exchanges or Commercial Associations in the districts occupied by the enemy.

(c) The closure of contracts relating to cotton "futures," which were closed as on July 31, 1914, under the decision of the Liverpool Cotton Association, is also confirmed.

SECURITY.

5.

The sale of a security held for an unpaid debt owing by an enemy shall be deemed to have been valid irrespective of notice to the owner if the creditor acted in good faith and with reasonable care and prudence, and no claim by the debtor on the ground of such sale shall be admitted.

This stipulation shall not apply to any sale of securities effected by an enemy during the occupation in regions invaded or occupied by the enemy.

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS.

6.

As regards Powers which adopt Section III and the Annex thereto the pecuniary obligations existing between enemies and resulting from the issue of negotiable instruments shall be adjusted in conformity with the said Annex by the instrumentality of the Clearing Offices, which shall assume the rights of the holder as regards the various remedies open to him.

7.

If a person has either before or during the war become liable upon a negotiable instrument in accordance with an undertaking given to him by a person who has subsequently become an enemy, the latter shall remain liable to indemnify the former in respect of his liability notwithstanding the outbreak of war.

III.—Contracts of Insurance.

8.

Contracts of insurance entered into by any person with another person who subsequently became an enemy will be dealt with in accordance with the following paragraphs.

FIRE INSURANCE.

9.

Contracts for the insurance of property against fire entered into by a person interested in such property with another person who subsequently became an enemy shall not be deemed to have been dissolved by the outbreak of war, or by the fact of the person becoming an enemy, or on account of the failure during the war and for a period of three months thereafter to perform his obligations under the contract, but they shall be dissolved at the date when the annual premium becomes payable for the first time after the expiration of a period of three months after the coming into force of the present Treaty.

A settlement shall be effected of unpaid premiums which became due during the war or of claims for losses which occurred during the war.

Where by administrative or legislative action an insurance against fire effected before the war has been transferred during the war from the original to another insurer, the transfer will be recognised and the liability of the original insurer will be deemed to have ceased as from the date of the transfer. The original insurer will, however, be entitled to receive on demand full information as to the terms of the transfer, and if it should appear that these terms were not equitable they shall be amended so far as may be necessary to render them equitable.

Furthermore, the insured shall, subject to the concurrence of the original insurer, be entitled to retransfer the contract to the original insurer as from the date of the demand.

LIFE INSURANCE.

11.

Contracts of life insurance entered into between an insurer and a person who subsequently became an enemy shall not be deemed to have been dissolved by the outbreak of war, or by the fact of the person becoming an enemy.

Any sum which during the war became due upon a contract deemed not to have been dissolved under the preceding provision shall be recoverable after the war with the addition of interest at 5 per cent. per annum from the date of its becoming due up to the day of payment.

Where the contract has lapsed during the war owing to non-payment of premiums, or has become void from breach of the conditions of the contract, the assured or his representatives or the persons entitled shall have the right at any time within twelve months of the coming into force of the present Treaty to claim from the insurer the surrender value of the policy at the date of its lapse or avoidance.

Where the contract has lapsed during the war owing to non-payment of premiums the payment of which has been prevented by the enforcement of measures of war, the assured or his representative or the persons entitled shall have the right to restore the contract on payment of the premiums with interest at five per cent per annum within three month from the coming into force of the present Treaty.

Where contracts of life insurance have been entered into by a local branch of an insurance company established in a country which subsequently became an enemy country, the contract shall, in the absence of any stipulation to the contrary in the contract itself, be governed by the local law, but the insurer shall be entitled to demand from the insured or his representatives the refund of sums paid on claims made or enforced under measures taken during the war, if the making or enforcement of such claims was not in accordance with the terms of the contract itself or was not consistent with the laws or treaties existing at the time when it was entered into.

13.

In any case where by the law applicable to the contract the insurer remains bound by the contract notwithstanding the non-payment of premiums until notice is given to the insured of the termination of the contract, he shall be entitled, where the giving of such notice was prevented by the war, to recover the unpaid premiums with interest at five per cent. per annum from the insured.

14.

Insurance contracts shall be considered as contracts of life assurance for the purpose of paragraphs 11 to 13 when they depend on the probabilities of human life combined with the rate of interest for the calculation of the reciprocal engagements between the two parties.

MARINE INSURANCE.

15.

Contracts of marine insurance including time policies and voyage policies entered into between an insurer and a person who subsequently became an enemy shall be deemed to have been dissolved on his becoming an enemy, except in cases where the risk undertaken in the contract had attached before he became an enemy.

Where the risk had not attached, money paid by way of premium or otherwise shall be recoverable from the insurer.

Where the risk had attached effect shall be given to the contract notwithstanding the party becoming an enemy, and sums due under the contract either by way of premiums or in respect of losses shall be recoverable after the coming into force of the present Treaty.

In the event of any agreement being come to for the payment of interest on sums due before the war to or by the nationals of States which have been at war and recovered after the war, such interest shall in the case of losses recoverable under contracts of marine insurance run from the expiration of a period of one year from the date of the loss.

16.

No contract of marine insurance with an insured person who subsequently became an enemy shall be deemed to cover losses due to belligerent action by the Power of which the insurer was a national or by the Allies or Associates of such Power.

17.

Where it is shown that a person who had before the war entered into a contract of marine insurance with an insurer who subsequently became an enemy entered after the outbreak of war into a new contract covering the same risk with an insurer who was not an enemy, the new contract shall be deemed to be substituted for the original contract as from the date when it was entered into, and the premiums payable shall be adjusted on the basis of the original insurer having remained liable on the contract only up till the time when the new contract was entered into.

OTHER INSURANCES.

18.

Contracts of insurance entered into before the war between an insurer and a person who subsequently became an enemy, other than contracts dealt with in paragraphs 9 to 17, shall be treated in all respects on the same footing as contracts of fire insurance between the same persons would be dealt with under the said paragraphs.

RE-INSURANCE.

All treaties of re-insurance with a person who became an enemy shall be regarded as having been abrogated by the person becoming an enemy, but without prejudice in the case of life or marine risks which had attached before the war to the right to recover payment after the war for sums due in respect of such risks.

Nevertheless if, owing to invasion, it has been impossible for the re-insured to find another re-insurer, the treaty shall remain in force until three months after the coming into force of the present Treaty.

Where a re-insurance treaty becomes void under this paragraph, there shall be an adjustment of accounts between the parties in respect both of premiums paid and payable and of liabilities for losses in respect of life or marine risks which had attached before the war. In the case of risks other than those mentioned in paragraphs 11 to 17 the adjustment of accounts shall be made as at the date of the parties becoming enemies without regard to claims for losses which may have occurred since that date.

20.

The provisions of the preceding paragraph will extend equally to re-insurances, existing at the date of the parties becoming enemies, of particular risks undertaken by the insurer in a contract of insurance against any risks other than life or marine risks.

21.

Re-insurance of life risks effected by particular contracts and not under any general treaty remain in force.

22.

In case of a re-insurance effected before the war of a contract of marine insurance, the cession of a risk which had been ceded to the re-insurer shall, if it had attached before the outbreak of war, remain valid and effect be given to the contract notwithstanding the outbreak of war; sums due under the contract of re-insurance in respect either of premiums or of losses shall be recoverable after the war.

23.

The provisions of paragraphs 16 and 17 and the last part of paragraph 15 shall apply to contracts for the re-insurance of marine risks.

Section VI.

MIXED ARBITRAL TRIBUNAL.

Article 256.

(a) Within three months from the coming into force of the present Treaty, a Mixed Arbitral Tribunal shall be established between each of the Allied and Associated Powers on the one hand and Austria on the other hand. Each such Tribunal shall consist of three members. Each of the Governments concerned shall appoint one of these members. The President shall be chosen by agreement between the two Governments concerned.

In case of failure to reach agreement, the President of the Tribunal and two other persons, either of whom may in case of need take his place, shall be chosen by the Council of the League of Nations, or, until this is set up, by M. Gustave Ador if he is willing. These persons shall be nationals of Powers that have remained neutral during the war.

If in case there is a vacancy a Government does not proceed within a period of one month to appoint as provided above a member of the Tribunal, such member shall be chosen by the other Government from the two persons mentioned above other than the President.

The decision of the majority of the members of the Tribunal shall be the decision of the Tribunal.

(b) The Mixed Arbitral Tribunals established pursuant to paragraph (a) shall decide all questions within their competence under Sections III, IV, V and VII.

In addition, all questions, whatsoever their nature, relating to contracts concluded before the coming into force of the present Treaty between nationals of the Allied and Associated Powers and Austrian nationals shall be decided by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal, always excepting questions which, under the laws of the Allied, Associated or Neutral Powers, are within the jurisdiction of the National Courts of those Powers. Such questions shall be decided by the National Courts in question, to the exclusion of the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal. The party who is a national of an Allied or Associated Power may nevertheless bring the case before the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal if this is not prohibited by the laws of his country.

(c) If the number of cases justifies it, additional members shall be appointed and each Mixed Arbitral Tribunal shall sit in divisions. Each of these divisions will be constituted as above.

(d) Each Mixed Arbitral Tribunal will settle its own procedure except in so far as it is provided in the following Annex, and is empowered to award the sums to be paid by the loser in respect of the costs and expenses of the proceedings.

(e) Each Government will pay the remuneration of the member of the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal appointed by it and of any agent whom it may appoint to represent it before the Tribunal. The remuneration of the President will be determined by special agreement between the Governments concerned; and this remuneration and the joint expenses of each Tribunal will be paid by the two Governments in equal moieties.

(f) The High Contracting Parties agree that their courts and authorities shall render to the Mixed Arbitral Tribunals direct all the assistance in their power, particularly as regards transmitting notices and collecting evidence.

(g) The High Contracting Parties agree to regard the decisions of the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal as final and conclusive, and to render them binding upon their nationals.

ANNEX.

1.

Should one of the members of the Tribunal either die, retire, or be unable for any reason whatever to discharge his functions, the same procedure will be followed for filling the vacancy as was followed for appointing him.

2.

The Tribunal may adopt such rules of procedure as shall be in accordance with justice and equity and decide the order and time at which each party must conclude its arguments, and may arrange all formalities required for dealing with the evidence.

3.

The agent and counsel of the parties on each side are authorized to present orally and in writing to the Tribunal arguments in support or in defence of each case.

4.

The Tribunal shall keep record of the questions and cases submitted and the proceedings hereon, with the dates of such proceedings.

5.

Each of the Powers concerned may appoint a secretary. These secretaries shall act together as joint secretaries of the Tribunal and shall be subject to its direction. The tribunal may appoint and employ any other necessary officer or officers to assist in the performance of its duties.

6.

The Tribunal shall decide all questions and matters submitted upon such evidence and information as may be furnished by the parties concerned.

7.

The High Contracting Parties agree to give the Tribunal all facilities and information required by it for carrying out its investigations.

8.

The language in which the proceedings shall be conducted shall, unless otherwise agreed, be English, French, Italian or Japanese, as may be determined by the Allied or Associated Power concerned.

9.

The place and time for the meetings of each Tribunal shall be determined by the President of the Tribunal.

Article 257.

Whenever a competent court has given or gives a decision in a case covered by Sections III, IV, V or VII, and such decision is inconsistent with the provisions of such Sections, the party who is prejudiced by the decision shall be entitled to obtain redress which shall be fixed by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal. At the request of the national of an Allied or Associated Power, the redress may, whenever possible, be effected by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal directing the replacement of the parties in the position occupied by them before the judgment was given by the court of the former Austrian Empire.

Section VII.

INDUSTRIAL PROPERTY.

Article 258.

Subject to the stipulations of the present Treaty, rights of industrial, literary and artistic property, as such property is defined by the International Conventions of Paris and of Berne, mentioned in Articles 237 and 239, shall be re-established or restored, as from the coming into force of the present Treaty, in the Territories of the High Contracting Parties, in favour of the persons entitled to the benefit of them at the moment when the state of war commenced, or their legal representatives. Equally, rights which, except for the war, would have been acquired during the war in consequence of an application made for the protection of industrial property, or the publication of a literary or artistic work, shall be recognised and established in favour of those persons who would have been entitled thereto, from the coming into force of the present Treaty.

Nevertheless, all acts done by virtue of the special measures taken during the war under legislative, executive or administrative authority of any Allied or Associated Power in regard to the rights of nationals of the former Austrian Empire in industrial, literary or artistic property shall remain in force and shall continue to maintain their full effect.

No claim shall be made or action brought by Austria or Austrian nationals or by or on behalf of nationals of the former Austrian Empire in respect of the use during the war by the Government of any Allied or Associated Power, or by any persons acting on behalf or with the assent of such Government of any rights in industrial, literary or artistic property, nor in respect of the sale, offering for sale, or use of any products, articles or apparatus whatsoever to which such rights applied.

Unless the legislation of any one of the Allied or Associated Powers in force at the moment of the signature of the present Treaty otherwise directs, sums due or paid in respect of the property of persons referred to in Article 249 (b) and in virtue of any act or operation resulting from the execution of the special measures mentioned in the second paragraph of this Article shall be dealt with in the same way as other sums due to such persons are directed to be dealt with by the present Treaty; and sums produced by any special measures taken by the Government of the former Austrian Empire in respect of rights in industrial, literary or artistic property belonging to the nationals of the Allied or Associated Powers shall be considered and treated in the same way as other debts due from Austrian nationals.

Each of the Allied and Associated Powers reserves to itself the right to impose such limitations, conditions, or restrictions on rights of industrial, literary or artistic property (with the exception of trade-marks) acquired before or during the war, or which may be subsequently acquired in accordance with its legislation, by Austrian nationals, whether by granting licences, or by the working, or by preserving control over their exploitation, or in any other way, as may be considered necessary for national defence, or in the public interest, or for assuring the fair treatment by Austria of the rights of industrial, literary and artistic property held in Austrian territory by its nationals, or for securing the due fulfilment of all obligations undertaken by Austria in the present Treaty. As regards rights of industrial, literary and artistic property acquired after the coming into force of the present Treaty, the right so reserved by the Allied and Associated Powers shall only be exercised in cases where these limitations, conditions or restrictions may be considered necessary for national defence or in the public interest.

In the event of the application of the provisions of the preceding paragraph by any Allied or Associated Power, there shall be paid reasonable indemnities or royalties, which shall be dealt with in the same way as other sums due to Austrian nationals are directed to be dealt with by the present Treaty.

Each of the Allied or Associated Powers reserves the right to treat as void and of no effect any transfer in whole or in part of or other dealing with rights of or in respect of industrial, literary, or artistic property effected after July 28, 1914, or in future which would have the result of defeating the objects of the provisions of this Article.

The provisions of this Article shall not apply to rights in industrial, literary or artistic property which have been dealt with in the liquidation of businesses or companies under war legislation by the Allied or Associated Powers, or which may be so dealt with by virtue of Article 249, paragraph (b).

Article 259.

A minimum of one year after the coming into force of the present Treaty shall be accorded to the nationals of the High Contracting Parties, without extension fees or other penalty, in order to enable such persons to accomplish any act, fulfil any formality, pay any fees, and generally satisfy any obligation prescribed by the laws or regulations of the respective States relating to the obtaining, preserving, or opposing rights to, or in respect of, industrial property either acquired before July 28, 1914, or which, except for the war, might have been acquired since that date as a result of an application made before the war or during its continuance, but nothing in this Article shall give any right to reopen interference proceedings in the United States of America where a final hearing has taken place.

All rights in, or in respect of, such property which may have lapsed by reason of any failure to accomplish any act, fulfil any formality, or make any payment, shall revive, but subject in the case of patents and designs to the imposition of such conditions as each Allied or Associated Power may deem reasonably necessary for the protection of persons who have manufactured or made use of the subject matter of such property while the rights had lapsed. Further, where rights to patents or designs belonging to Austrian nationals are revived under this Article, they shall be subject in respect of the grant of licences to the same provisions as would have been applicable to them during the war, as well as to all the provisions of the present Treaty.

The period from July 28, 1914, until the coming into force of the present Treaty shall be excluded in considering the time within which a patent should be worked or a trade mark or design used, and it is further agreed that no patent, registered trade mark or design in force on July 28, 1914, shall be subject to revocation or cancellation by reason only of the failure to work such patent or use such trade mark or design for two years after the coming into force of the present Treaty.

Article 260.

The rights of priority provided by Article IV of the International Convention for the Protection of Industrial Property of Paris of March 20, 1883, revised at Washington in 1911, or by any other Convention or Statute, for the filing or registration of applications for patents or models of utility, and for the registration of trade marks, designs and models which had not expired on July 28, 1914, and those which have arisen during the war, or would have arisen but for the war, shall be extended by each of the High Contracting Parties in favour of all nationals of the other High Contracting Parties for a period of six months after the coming into force of the present Treaty.

Nevertheless, such extension shall in no way affect the right of any of the High Contracting Parties or of any person who before the coming into force of the present Treaty was bona fide in possession of any rights of industrial property conflicting with rights applied for by another who claims rights of priority in respect of them, to exercise such rights by itself or himself personally, or by such agents or licensees as derived their rights from it or him before the coming into force of the present Treaty; and such persons shall not be amenable to any action or other process of law in respect of infringement.

Article 261.

No action shall be brought and no claim made by nationals of the former Austrian Empire, or by persons residing or carrying on business within the territory of that Empire on the one part, and on the other part by persons residing or carrying on business in the territory of the Allied or Associated Powers, or persons who are nationals of such Powers respectively, or by any one deriving title during the war from such persons, by reason of any action which has taken place within the territory of the other party between the date of the existence of a state of war and that of the coming into force of the present Treaty, which might constitute an infringement of the rights of industrial property or rights of literary and artistic property, either existing at any time during the war or revived under the provisions of Articles 259 and 260.

Equally, no action for infringement of industrial, literary or artistic property rights by such persons shall at any time be permissible in respect of the sale or offering for sale for a period of one year after the signature of the present Treaty in the territories of the Allied or Associated Powers on the one hand or Austria on the other, of products or articles manufactured, or of literary or artistic works published, during the period between the existence of a state of war and the signature of the present Treaty, or against those who have acquired and continue to use them. It is understood, nevertheless, that this provision shall not apply when the possessor of the rights was domiciled or had an industrial or commercial establishment in the districts occupied by the Austro-Hungarian armies during the war.

This Article shall not apply as between the United States of America on the one hand and Austria on the other.

Article 262.

Licences in respect of industrial, literary or artistic property concluded before the war betwen nationals of the Allied or Associated Powers or persons residing in their territory or carrying on business therein, on the one part, and nationals of the former Austrian Empire, on the other part, shall be considered as cancelled as from the date of the existence of a state of war between the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy and the Allied or Associated Powers. But, in any case, the former beneficiary of a contract of this kind shall have the right, within a period of six months after the coming into force of the present Treaty, to demand from the proprietor of the rights the grant of a new licence, the conditions of which, in default of agreement betwen the parties, shall be fixed by the duly qualified tribunal in the country under whose legislation the rights had been acquired, except in the case of licences held in respect of rights acquired under the law of the former Austrian Empire. In such cases the conditions shall be fixed by the Mixed Arbitral Tribunal referred to in Section VI of this Part. The Tribunal may, if necessary, fix also the amount which it may deem just should be paid by reason of the use of the rights during the war.

No licence in respect of industrial, literary or artistic property, granted under the special war legislation of any Allied or Associated Power, shall be affected by the continued existence of any licence entered into before the war, but shall remain valid and of full effect, and a licence so granted to the former beneficiary of a licence entered into before the war shall be considered as substituted for such licence.

Where sums have been paid during the war in respect of the rights of persons referred to in Article 249 (b) and by virtue of a licence or agreement concluded before the war in respect of rights of industrial property or for the reproduction or the representation of literary, dramatic or artistic works, these sums shall be dealt with in the same manner as other debts or credits of such persons as provided by the present Treaty.

This Article shall not apply as between the United States of America on the one hand and Austria on the other.

Section VIII.

SPECIAL PROVISIONS RELATING TO TRANSFERRED TERRITORY.

Article 263.

Of the individuals and juridical persons previously nationals of the former Austrian Empire, including Bosnia-Herzegovinians, those who acquire ipso facto under the present Treaty the nationality of an Allied or Associated Power are designated in the provisions which follow by the expression "nationals of the former Austrian Empire"; the remainder are designated by the expression "Austrian nationals."

Article 264.

The inhabitants of territories transferred by virtue of the present Treaty shall, notwithstanding this transfer and the change of nationality consequent thereon, continue to enjoy in Austria all the rights in industrial, literary and artistic property to which they were entitled under the legislation in force at the time of the transfer.

Article 265.

The questions concerning the nationals of the former Austrian Empire, as well as Austrian nationals, their rights, privileges and property, which are not dealt with in the present Treaty, or in the Treaty prepared for the purpose of regulating certain immediate relations between the States to which territory of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy has been transferred, or arising from the dismemberment of that Monarchy, shall form the subject of special conventions between the States concerned, including Austria; such conventions shall not in any way conflict with the provisions of the present Treaty. For this purpose it is agreed that three months from the coming into force of the present Treaty a Conference of delegates of the States in question shall take place.

Article 266.

The Austrian Government shall without delay restore to nationals of the former Austrian Empire their property, rights and interests situated in Austrian territory.

The amount of taxes and imposts on capital which have been levied or increased on the property, rights and interests of nationals of the former Austrian Empire since November 3, 1918, or which shall be levied or increased until restitution in accordance with the provisions of the present Treaty, or, in the case of property, rights and interests which have not been subjected to exceptional measures of war, until three months from the coming into force of the present Treaty, shall be returned to the owners.

The property, rights, and interests restored shall not be subject to any tax levied in respect of any other property or any other business owned by the same person after such property had been removed from Austria, or such business had ceased to be carried on therein. If taxes of any kind have been paid in anticipation in respect of property, rights and interests removed from Austria, the proportion of such taxes paid for any period subsequent to the removal of the property, rights and interests in question shall be returned of the owners.

Cash assets shall be paid in the currency and at the rate of exchange provided for the case of debts under Articles 248 (d) and 271.

Legacies, donations and funds given or established in the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy for the benefit of nationals of the former Austrian Empire shall be placed by Austria, so far as the funds in question are in her territory, at the disposition of the Allied or Associated Power of which the person in question are now nationals, in the condition in which these funds were on July 28, 1914, taking account of payments properly made for the purpose of the Trust.

Article 267.

Notwithstanding the provisions of Article 249 and the Annex to Section IV the property, rights and interests of Austrian nationals or companies controlled by them situated in the territories which formed part of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy shall not be subject to retention or liquidation in accordance with these provisions. Such property, rights and interests shall be restored to their owners freed from any measure of this kind, or from any other measure of transfer, compulsory administration or sequestration, taken since November 3, 1918, until the coming into force of the present Treaty, in the condition in which they were before the application of the measures in question.

The property, rights and interests here referred to do not include property which is the subject of Article 208 of Part IX (Financial Clauses).

Nothing in this Article shall affect the provisions laid down in Part VIII (Reparation) Section I. Annex III, as the property of Austrian nationals in ships and boats.

Article 268.

All contracts for the sale of goods for delivery by sea concluded before January 1, 1917, between nationals of the former Austrian Empire on the one part and the administrations of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, Austria, or Bosnia-Herzegovina, or Austrian nationals of the other part shall be annulled, except in respect of any debt or other pecuniary obligation arising out of any act done or money paid thereunder.

All other contracts between such parties which were made before November 1, 1918, and were in force at that date shall be maintained.

Article 269.

With regard to prescriptions, limitations, and forfeitures in the transferred territories, the provisions of Articles 252 and 253 shall be applied with substitution for the expression "outbreak of war" of the expression "date, which shall be fixed by administrative decision of each Allied or Associated Power, at which relations between the parties became impossible in fact or in law," and for the expression "duration of the war" of the expression "period between the date above indicated and that of the coming into force of the present Treaty."

Article 270.

Austria undertakes not to impede in any way the transfer of property, rights or interests belonging to a company incorporated in accordance with the laws of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, in which Allied or Associated nationals are interested, to a company incorporated in accordance with the laws of any other power, to facilitate all measures necessary for giving effect to such transfer, and to render any assistance which may be required for effecting the restoration to Allied or Associated nationals, or to companies in which they are interested, of their property, rights or interests whether in Austria or in transferred territory.

Article 271.

Section III, except Article 248 (d), shall not apply to debts contracted between Austrian nationals and nationals of the former Austrian Empire.

Subject to the special provisions laid down in Article 248 (d) for the case of the new States, these debts shall be paid in the legal currency at the time of payment of the State of which the national of the former Austrian Empire has become a national, and the rate of exchange applicable shall be the average rate quoted on the Geneva Exchange during the two months preceding November 1, 1918.

Article 272.

Insurance companies whose principal place of business was in territory which previously formed part of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy shall have the right to carry on their business in Austrian territory for a period of ten years from the coming into force of the present Treaty, without the rights which they previously enjoyed being affected in any way by the change of nationality.

During the above period the operations of such companies shall not be subjected by Austria to any higher tax or charge than shall be imposed on the operations of national companies. No measure in derogation of their rights of property shall be imposed upon them which is not equally applied to the property, rights or interests of Austrian insurance companies; adequate compensation shall be paid in the event of the application of any such measures.

These provisions shall only apply so long as Austrian insurance companies previously carrying on business in the transferred territories, even if their principal place of business was outside such territories, are reciprocally accorded a similar right to carry on their business therein.

After the period of ten years above referred to, the provisions of Article 228 of this Part of the present Treaty shall apply in regard to the Allied and Associated companies in question.

Article 273.

Special agreements will determine the division of the property of associations or public corporations carrying on their functions in territory which is divided in consequence of the present Treaty.

Article 274.

A special convention shall determine all questions relative to the records, registers and copies in connection with the protection of industrial, literary or artistic property, and fix their eventual transmission or communication by the Offices of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy to the Offices of the States to which are transferred territory of the said Monarchy and to the Offices of new States.

States to which territory of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy is transferred, and States arising from the dismemberment of that Monarchy, shall recognize and give effect to rights of industrial, literary and artistic property in force in the territory at the time when it passes to the State in question, or re-established or restored in accordance with the provisions of Article 258. These rights shall remain in force in that territory for the same period as that for which they would have remained in force under the law of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy.

Article 275.

Without prejudice to other provisions of the present Treaty, the Austrian Government undertakes so far as it is concerned to hand over to any Power to which territory of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy is transferred, or which arises from the dismemberment of that Monarchy, such portion of the reserves accumulated by the Governments or the administrations of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy, or by public or private organisations under their control, as is attributable to the carrying on of Social or State Insurance in such territory.

The Powers to which these funds are handed over must apply them to the performance of the obligations arising from such insurances.

The conditions of the delivery will be determined by special conventions to be concluded between the Austrian Government and the Governments concerned.

In case these special conventions are not concluded in accordance with the above paragraph within three months after the coming into force of the present Treaty, the conditions of transfer shall in each case be referred to a Commission of five members, one of whom shall be appointed by the Austrian Government, one by the other interested Government and three by the Governing Body of the International Labour Office from the nationals of other States. This Commission shall by majority vote within three months after appointment adopt recommendations for submission to the Council of the League of Nations, and the decisions of the Council shall forthwith be accepted as final by Austria and the other Government concerned.

PART XI.

AERIAL NAVIGATION.

Article 276.

The aircraft of the Allied and Associated Powers shall have full liberty of passage and landing over and in the territory of Austria and shall enjoy the same privileges as Austrian aircraft, particularly in case of distress.

Article 277.

The aircraft of the Allied and Associated Powers shall, while in transit to any foreign country whatever, enjoy the right of flying over the territory of Austria without landing, subject always to any regulations which may be made by Austria, and which shall be applicable equally to the aircraft of Austria and to those of the Allied and Associated countries.

Article 278.

All aerodomes in Austria open to national public traffic shall be open for the aircraft of the Allied and Associated Powers, and in any such aerodome such aircraft shall be treated on a footing of equality with Austrian aircraft as regards charges of every description, including charges for landing and accommodation.

Article 279.

Subject to the present provisions, the rights of passage, transit and landing provided for in Articles 276, 277 and 278 are subject to the observance of such regulations as Austria may consider it necessary to enact, but such regulations shall be applied without distinction to Austrian aircraft and to those of the Allied and Associated countries.

Article 280.

Certificates of nationality, airworthiness, or competency and licences issued or recognised as valid by any of the Allied or Associated Powers, shall be recognised in Austria as valid and as equivalent to the certificates and licences issued by Austria.

Article 281.

As regards internal commercial air traffic, the aircraft of the Allied and Associated Powers shall enjoy in Austria most favoured nation treatment.

Article 282.

Austria undertakes to enforce the necessary measures to ensure that all Austrian aircraft flying over her territory shall comply with the Rules as to lights and signals, Rules of the Air and Rules for Air Traffic on and in the neighbourhood of aerodromes, which have been laid down in the Convention relative to Aerial Navigation concluded between the Allied and Associated Powers.

Article 283.

The obligations imposed by the preceding provisions shall remain in force until January 1, 1923, unless before that date Austria shall have been admitted into the League of Nations or shall have been authorised by consent of the Allied and Associated Powers to adhere to the Convention relative to Aerial Navigation concluded between those Powers.

PART XII.

PORTS, WATERWAYS AND RAILWAYS.

Section I.

GENERAL PROVISIONS.

Article 284.

Austria undertakes to grant freedom of transit through her territories on the routes most convenient for international transit, either by rail, navigable waterway or canal, to persons, goods, vessels, carriages, wagons and mails coming from or going to the territories of any of the Allied and Associated Powers, whether contiguous or not.

Such persons, goods, vessels, carriages, wagons and mails shall not be subjected to any transit duty or to any undue delays or restriction, and shall be entitled in Austria to national treatment as regards charges, facilities and all other matters.

Goods in transit shall be exempt from all customs or other similar duties.

All charges imposed on transport in transit shall be reasonable, having regard to the conditions of the traffic. No charge facility or restriction shall depend directly or indirectly on the ownership or on the nationality of the ship or other means of transport on which any part of the through journey has been, or is to be, accomplished.

Article 285.

Austria undertakes neither to impose nor to maintain any control over transmigration traffic through her territories beyond measures necessary to ensure that passengers are bona fide in transit; nor to allow any shipping company or any other private body, corporation or person interested in the traffic to take any part whatever in, or to exercise any direct or indirect influence over, any administrative service that may be necessary for this purpose.

Article 286.

Austria undertakes to make no discrimination or preference, direct or indirect, in the duties, charges and prohibitions relating to importations into or exportations from her territories, or, subject to the special engagements contained in the present Treaty, in the charges and conditions of transport of goods or persons entering or leaving her territories based on the frontier crossed; or on the kind, ownership, or flag of the means of transport (including aircraft) employed; or on the original or immediate place of departure of the vessel, wagon or aircraft or other means of transport employed, or its ultimate or intermediate destination; or on the route of or places of transshipment on the journey; or on whether the goods are imported or exported directly through an Austrian port or indirectly through a foreign port; or on whether the goods are imported or exported by land or by air.

Austria particularly undertakes not to establish against the ports and vessels of any of the Allied and Associated Powers any surtax or any direct or indirect bounty for export or import by Austrian ports or ships, or by those of another Power, for example by means of combined tariffs. She further undertakes that persons or goods passing through a port or using a vessel of any of the Allied and Associated Powers shall not be subjected to any formality or delay whatever to which such persons or goods would not be subjected if they passed through an Austrian port or a port of any other Power, or used an Austrian vessel or a vessel of any other Power.

Article 287.

All necessary administrative and technical measures shall be taken to expedite, as much as possible, the transmission of goods across the Austrian frontiers and to ensure their forwarding and transport from such frontiers, irrespective of whether such goods are coming from or going to the territories of the Allied and Associated Powers or are in transit from or to those territories, under the same material conditions in such matters as rapidity of carriage and care en route as are enjoyed by other goods of the same kind carried on Austrian territory under similar conditions of transport.

In particular, the transport of perishable goods shall be promptly and regularly carried out, and the customs formalities shall be effected in such a way as to allow the goods to be carried straight through by trains which make connection.

Article 288.

The seaports of the Allied and Associated Powers are entitled to all favours and to all reduced tariffs granted on Austrian railways or navigable waterways for the benefit of any port of another Power.

Article 289.

Austria may not refuse to participate in the tariffs or combinations of tariffs intended to secure for ports of any of the Allied and Associated Powers advantages similar to those granted by Austria to the ports of any other Power.

Section II.

NAVIGATION.

CHAPTER 1.

FREEDOM OF NAVIGATION.

Article 290.

The nationals of any of the Allied and Associated Powers as well as their vessels and property shall enjoy in all Austrian ports and on the inland navigation routes of Austria the same treatment in all respects as Austrian nationals, vessels and property.

In particular the vessels of any one of the Allied or Associated Powers shall be entitled to transport goods of any description, and passengers, to or from any ports or places in Austrian territory to which Austrian vessels may have access, under conditions which shall not be more onerous than those applied in the case of national vessels; they shall be treated on a footing of equality with national vessels as regards port and harbour facilities and charges of every description, including facilities for stationing, loading and unloading, and duties and charges of tonnage, harbour, pilotage, lighthouse, quarantine, and all analogous duties and charges of whatsoever nature, levied in the name of or for the profit of the Government, public functionaries, private individuals, corporations or establishments of any kind.

In the event of Austria granting a preferential régime to any of the Allied or Associated Powers or to any other foreign Power, this régime shall be extended immediately and unconditionally to all the Allied and Associated Powers.

There shall be no impediment to the movement of persons or vessels other than those arising from prescriptions concerning customs, police, sanitation, emigration and immigration, and those relating to the import and export of prohibited goods. Such regulations must be reasonable and uniform and must not impede traffic unnecessarily.

CHAPTER 2.

CLAUSES RELATING TO THE DANUBE.

1. GENERAL CLAUSES RELATING TO RIVER SYSTEMS DECLARED INTERNATIONAL.

Article 291.

The following river is declared international: the Danube from Ulm; together with all navigable parts of this river system which naturally provide more than one State with access to the sea, with or without transhipment from one vessel to another, as well as the portion of the course of the Morava (March) and the Thaya (Theiss) forming the frontier between Czecho-Slovakia and Austria, and lateral canals and channels constructed either to duplicate or to improve naturally navigable sections of the specified river system or to connect two naturally navigable sections of the same river.

The same shall apply to the Rhine-Danube navigable waterway, should such a waterway be constructed, under the conditions laid down in Article 308.

Any part of the above-mentioned river system which is not included in the general definition may be declared international by an agreement between the riparian States.

Article 292.

On the waterways declared to be international in the preceding Article, the nationals, property and flags of all Powers shall be treated on a footing of perfect equality, no distinction being made to the detriment of the nationals, property or flag of any Power between them and the nationals, property or flag of the riparian State itself or of the most favoured nation.

Article 293.

Austrian vessels shall not be entitled to carry passengers or goods by regular services between the ports of any Allied or Associated Power, without special authority from such Power.

Article 294.

Where such charges are not precluded by any existing convention, charges varying on different sections of a river may be levied on vessels using the navigable channels or their approaches, provided that they are intended solely to cover equitably the cost of maintaining in a navigable condition, or of improving, the river and its approaches, or to meet expenditure incurred in the interests of navigation. The schedule of such charges shall be calculated on the basis of such expenditure and shall be posted up in the ports. These charges shall be levied in such a manner as to render any detailed examination of cargoes unnecessary, except in cases of suspected fraud or contravention.

Article 295.

The transit of vessels, passengers and goods on these waterways shall be effected in accordance with the general conditions prescribed for transit in Section I above.

When the two banks of an international river are within the same State goods in transit may be placed under seal or in the custody of customs agents. When the river forms a frontier goods and passengers in transit shall be exempt from all customs formalities; the loading and unloading of goods, and the embarkation and disembarkation of passengers, shall only take place in the ports specified by the riparian State.

Article 296.

No dues of any kind other than those provided for in this Part shall be levied along the course or at the mouth of these waterways.

This provision shall not prevent the fixing by the riparian States of customs, local octroi or consumption duties, or the creation of reasonable and uniform charges levied in the ports, in accordance with public tariffs, for the use of cranes, elevators, quays, warehouses, and other similar constructions.

Article 297.

In default of any special organisation for carrying out the works connected with the upkeep and improvement of the international portion of a navigable system, each riparian State shall be bound to take the necessary measures to remove any obstacle or danger to navigation and to ensure the maintenance of good conditions of navigation.

If a State neglects to comply with this obligation any riparian State, or any State represented on the International Commission, may appeal to the tribunal instituted for this purpose by the League of Nations.

Article 298.

The same procedure shall be followed in the case of a riparian State undertaking any works of a nature to impede navigation in the international section. The tribunal mentioned in the preceding Article shall be entitled to enforce the suspension or suppression of such works, making due allowance in its decisions for all rights in connection with irrigation, water-power, fisheries, and other national interests, which, with the consent of all the riparian States or of all the States represented on the International Commission, shall be given priority over the requirements of navigation.

Appeal to the tribunal of the League of Nations does not require the suspension of the works.

Article 299.

The régime set out in Articles 292 and 294 to 298 above shall be superseded by one to be laid down in a General Convention drawn up by the Allied and Associated Powers, and approved by the League of Nations, relating to the waterways recognised in such Convention as having an international character. This Convention shall apply in particular to the whole or part of the above-mentioned river system of the Danube, and such other parts of that river system as may be covered by a general definition.

Austria undertakes, in accordance with the provisions of Article 331, to adhere to the said General Convention.

Article 300.

Austria shall cede to the Allied and Associated Powers concerned, within a maximum period of three months from the date on which notification shall be given her, a proportion of the tugs and vessels remaining registered in the ports of the river system referred to in Article 291 after the deduction of those surrendered by way of restitution or reparation. Austria shall in the same way cede material of all kinds necessary to the Allied and Associated Powers concerned for the utilisation of that river system.

The number of the tugs and boats, and the amount of the material so ceded, and their distribution, shall be determined by an arbitrator or arbitrators nominated by the United States of America, due regard being had to the legitimate needs of the parties concerned, and particularly to the shipping traffic during the five years preceding the war.

All craft so ceded shall be provided with their fittings and gear, shall be in a good state of repair and in condition to carry goods, and shall be selected from among those most recently built.

Wherever the cessions made under the present Article involve a change of ownership, the arbitrator or arbitrators shall determine the rights of the fomer owners as they stood on October 15, 1918, and the amount of the compensation to be paid to them, and shall also direct the manner in which such payment is to be effected in each case. If the arbitrator or arbitrators find that the whole or part of this sum will revert directly or indirectly to States from whom reparation is due, they shall decide the sum to be placed under this head to the credit of the said States.

As regards the Danube the arbitrator or arbitrators referred to in this Article will also decide all questions as to the permanent allocation and the conditions thereof of the vessels whose ownership or nationality is in dispute between States. Pending final allocation the control of these vessels shall be vested in a Commission consisting of Representatives of the United States of America, the British Empire, France and Italy, who will be empowered to make provisional arrangements for the working of these vessels in the general interest by any local organisation, or failing such arrangements by themselves, without prejudice to the final allocation.

As far as possible these provisional arrangements will be on a commercial basis, the net receipts by the Commission for the hire of these vessels being disposed of as directed by the Reparation Commission.

2. SPECIAL CLAUSES RELATING TO THE DANUBE.

Article 301.

The European Commission of the Danube reassumes the powers it possessed before the war. Nevertheless, as a provisional measure, only representatives of Great Britain, France, Italy and Roumania shall constitute this Commission.

Article 302.

From the point where the competence of the European Commission ceases, the Danube system referred to in Article 291 shall be placed under the administration of an International Commission composed as follows:

2 representatives of German riparian States;

1 representative of each other riparian State;

1 representative of each non-riparian State represented in the future on the European Commission of the Danube.

If certain of these representatives cannot be appointed at the time of the coming into force of the present Treaty, the decisions of the Commission shall nevertheless be valid.

Article 303.

The International Commission provided for in the preceding Article shall meet as soon as possible after the coming into force of the present Treaty, and shall undertake provisionally the administration of the river in conformity with the provisions of Articles 292 and 294 to 298, until such time as a definitive statute regarding the Danube is concluded by the Powers nominated by the Allied and Associated Powers.

The decisions of this International Commission shall be taken by a majority vote. The salaries of the Commissioners shall be fixed and paid by their respective countries.

As a provisional measure any deficit in the administrative expense of this International Commission shall be borne equally by the States represented on the Commission.

In particular this Commission shall regulate the licensing of pilots, charges for pilotage and the administration of the pilot service.

Article 304.

Austria agrees to accept the régime which shall be laid down for the Danube by a Conference of the Powers nominated by the Allied and Associated Powers, which shall meet within one year after the coming into force of the present Treaty, and at which Austrian representatives may be present.

Article 305.

The mandate given by Article 57 of the Treaty of Berlin of July 13, 1878, to Austria-Hungary, and transferred by her to Hungary, to carry out works at the Iron Gates, is abrogated. The Commission entrusted with the administration of this part of the river shall lay down provisions for the settlement of accounts subject to the financial provisions of the present Treaty. Charges which may be necessary shall in no case be levied by Hungary.

Article 306.

Should the Czecho-Slovak State, the Serb-Croat-Slovene State, or Roumania, with the authorisation of or under mandate from the International Commission, undertake maintenance, improvement, weir, or other works on a part of the river system which forms a frontier, these States shall enjoy on the opposite bank, and also on the part of the bed which is outside their territory, all necessary facilities for the survey, execution and maintenance of such works.

Article 307.

Austria shall be obliged to make to the European Commission of the Danube all restitutions, reparations and indemnities for damages inflicted on the Commission during the war.

Article 308.

Should a deep-draught Rhine-Danube navigable waterway be constructed, Austria hereby undertakes to accept the application to the said navigable waterway of the same régime as that prescribed in Articles 292 and 294 to 299 of the present Treaty.

CHAPTER 3.

HYDRAULIC SYSTEM.

Article 309.

In default of any provisions to the contrary, when as the result of the fixing of a new frontier the hydraulic system (canalisation, inundations, irrigation, drainage, or similar matters) in a State is dependent on works executed within the territory of another State, or when use is made on the territory of a State, in virtue of pre-war usage, of water or hydraulic power, the source of which is on the territory of another State, an agreement shall be made between the States concerned to safeguard the interests and rights acquired by each of them.

Failing an agreement, the matter shall be regulated by an arbitrator appointed by the Council of the League of Nations.

Article 310.

Unless otherwise provided, when use is made for municipal or domestic purposes in one State of electricity or water, the source of which as the result of the fixing of a new frontier is on the territory of another State, an agreement shall be made between the States concerned to safeguard the interests and rights acquired by each of them.

Pending an agreement, central electric stations and waterworks shall be required to continue the supply up to an amount corresponding to the undertakings and contracts in force on November 3, 1918.

Failing an agreement, the matter shall be regulated by an Arbitrator appointed by the Council of the League of Nations.

Section III.

RAILWAYS.

CHAPTER 1.

FREEDOM OF TRANSIT TO THE ADRIATIC FOR AUSTRIA.

Article 311.

Free access to the Adriatic Sea is accorded to Austria, who with this object will enjoy freedom of transit over the territories and in the ports severed from the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy.

Freedom of transit is the freedom defined in Article 284 until such time as a General Convention on the subject shall have been concluded between the Allied and Associated Powers, whereupon the dispositions of the new Convention shall be substituted therefor.

Special Conventions between the States or Administrations concerned will lay down the conditions of the exercise of the right accorded above, and will settle in particular the method of using the ports and the free zones existing in them, the establishment of international (joint) services and tariffs including through tickets and waybills, and the maintenance of the Convention of Berne of October 14, 1890 and its supplementary provisions until its replacement by a new Convention.

Freedom of transit will extend to postal, telegraphic, and telephonic services.

CHAPTER 2.

CLAUSES RELATING TO INTERNATIONAL TRANSPORT.

Article 312.

Goods coming from the territories of the Allied and Associated Powers, and going to Austria, or in transit through Austria from or to the territories of the Allied and Associated Powers, shall enjoy on the Austrian railways as regards charges to be collected (rebates and drawbacks being taken into account), facilities, and all other matters, the most favourable treatment applied to goods of the same kind carried on any Austrian lines, either in internal traffic, or for export, import or in transit, under similar conditions of transport, for example as regards length of route. The same rule shall be applied, on the request of one or more of the Allied and Associated Powers, to goods specially designated by such Power or Powers coming from Austria and going to their territories.

International tariffs established in accordance with the rates referred to in the preceding paragraph and involving through way-bills shall be established when one of the Allied and Associated Powers shall require it from Austria.

However, without prejudice to the provisions of Article 288 and 289, Austria undertakes to maintain on her own lines the régime of tariffs existing before the war as regards traffic to Adriatic and Black Sea ports, from the point of view of competition with North German ports.

Article 313.

From the coming into force of the present Treaty the High Contracting Parties shall renew, in so far as concerns them and under the reserves indicated in the second paragraph of the present Article, the Conventions and Arrangements signed at Berne on October 14, 1890, September 20, 1893, July 16, 1895, June 16, 1898, and September 19, 1906, regarding the transportation of goods by rail.

If within five years from the date of the coming into force of the present Treaty a new Convention for the transportation of passengers, luggage and goods by rail shall have been concluded to replace the Berne Convention of October 14, 1890, and the subsequent additions referred to above, this new Convention and the supplementary provisions for international transport by rail which may be based on it shall bind Austria, even if she shall have refused to take part in the preparation of the Convention or to subscribe to it. Until a new Convention shall have been concluded, Austria shall conform to the provisions of the Berne Convention and the subsequent additions referred to above, and to the current supplementary provisions.

Article 314.

Austria shall be bound to co-operate in the establishment of through ticket services (for passengers and their luggage) which shall be required by any of the Allied and Associated Powers to ensure their communication by rail with each other and with all other countries by transit across the territories of Austria; in particular Austria shall, for this purpose, accept trains and carriages coming from the territories of the Allied and Associated Powers and shall forward them with a speed at least equal to that of her best long-distance trains on the same lines. The rates applicable to such through services shall not in any case be higher than the rates collected on Austrian internal services for the same distance, under the same conditions of speed and comfort.

The tariffs applicable under the same conditions of speed and comfort to the transportation of emigrants going to or coming from ports of the Allied and Associated Powers and using the Austrian railways, shall not be at a higher kilometric rate than the most favourable tariffs (drawbacks and rebates being taken into account) enjoyed on the said railways by emigrants going to or coming from any other ports.

Article 315.

Austria shall not apply specially to such through services, or to the transportation of emigrants going to or coming from the ports of the Allied and Associated Powers, any technical, fiscal or administrative measures, such as measures of customs examination, general police, sanitary police, and control, the result of which would be to impede or delay such services.

Article 316.

In case of transport partly by rail and partly by internal navigation, with or without through way-bill, the preceding Articles shall apply to the part of the journey performed by rail.

CHAPTER 3.

ROLLING-STOCK.

Article 317.

Austria undertakes that Austrian wagons shall be fitted with apparatus allowing:

(1) of their inclusion in goods trains on the lines of such of the Allied and Associated Powers as are parties to the Berne Convention of May 15, 1886, as modified on May 18, 1907, without hampering the action of the continuous brake which may be adopted in such countries within ten years of the coming into force of the present Treaty, and

(2) of the inclusion of wagons of such countries in all goods trains on Austrian lines.

The rolling stock of the Allied and Associated Powers shall enjoy on the Austrian lines the same treatment as Austrian rolling stock as regards movement, upkeep and repairs.

CHAPTER 4.

TRANSFERS OF RAILWAY LINES.

Article 318.

Subject to any special provisions concerning the transfer of ports, waterways and railways situated in the territories transferred under the present Treaty, and to the financial conditions relating to the concessionnaires and the pensioning of the personnel, the transfer of railways will take place under the following conditions:

(1) The works and installations of all the railroads shall be handed over complete and in good condition.

(2) When a railway system possessing its own rolling-stock is handed over in its entirety by Austria to one of the Allied and Associated Powers, such stock shall be handed over complete, in accordance with the last inventory before November 3, 1918, and in a normal state of upkeep.

(3) As regards lines without any special rolling-stock, the distribution of the stock existing on the system to which these lines belong shall be made by Commissions of experts designated by the Allied and Associated Powers, on which Austria shall be represented. These Commissions shall have regard to the amount of the material registered on these lines in the last inventory before November 3, 1918, the length of track

(sidings included), and the nature and amount of the traffic. These Commissions shall also specify the locomotives, carriages and wagons to be handed over in each case; they shall decide upon the conditions of their acceptance, and shall make the provisional arrangements necessary to insure their repair in Austrian workshops.

(4) Stocks of stores, fittings and plant shall be handed over under the same conditions as the rolling-stock.

The provisions of paragraphs 3 and 4 above shall be applied to the lines of former Russian Poland converted by the Austro-Hungarian authorities to the normal gauge, such lines being regarded as detached from the Austrian and Hungarian State systems.

CHAPTER 5.

PROVISIONS RELATING TO CERTAIN RAILWAY LINES.

Article 319.

When as a result of the fixing of new frontiers a railway connection between two parts of the same country crosses another country, or a branch line from one country has its terminus in another, the conditions of working, if not specifically provided for in the present Treaty, shall be laid down in a convention between the railway administrations concerned. If the administrations can not come to an agreement as to the terms of such convention, the points of difference shall be decided by commissions of experts composed as provided in the preceding Article.

The establishment of all the new frontier stations between Austria and the contiguous Allied and Associated States, as well as the working of the lines between those stations, shall be settled by agreements similarly concluded.

Article 320.

With the object of insuring regular utilization of the railroads of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy owned by private companies which, as a result of the stipulations of the present Treaty, will be situated in the territory of several States, the administrative and technical reorganization of the said lines shall be regulated in each instance by an agreement between the owning Company and the States territorially concerned.

Any differences on which agreement is not reached, including questions relating to the interpretation of contracts concerning the expropriation of the lines, shall be submitted to arbitrators designated by the Council of the League of Nations.

This arbitration may, as regards the South Austrian Railway Company, be required either by the Board of Management or by the Committee representing the bond-holders.

Article 321.

Within a period of five years from the coming into force of the present Treaty, Italy may require the construction or improvement on Austrian territory of the new transalpine lines of the Col de Reschen and the Pas de Predil. Unless Austria decides to pay for the works herself, the cost of construction or improvement shall be paid by Italy. An arbitrator appointed by the Council of the League of Nations shall, after the lapse of such period as may be fixed by the Council, determine the portion of the cost of construction or improvement which must be repaid by Austria to Italy on account of the increase of revenue on the Austrian railway system resulting from these works.

Austria shall hand over to Italy gratuitously the surveys, with their annexes, for the construction of the following railway lines:

The line from Tarvis to Trieste by Raibl, Plezzo, Caporetto, Canale and Gorizia;

The local line from S. Lucia de Tolmino to Caporetto;

The line from Tarvis to Plezzo (new scheme);

The Reschen line connecting Landeck and Mals.

Article 322.

In view of the importance to the Czecho-Slovak State of free communication between that State and the Adriatic, Austria recognises the right of the Czecho-Slovak State to run its own trains over the sections included within her territory of the following lines:

(1) from Bratislava (Pressburg) towards Fiume via Sopron, Szembathely and Mura Keresztur, and a branch from Mura Keresztur to Pragerhof;

(2) from Budejovic (Budweiss) towards Trieste via Linz, S. Michael, Klagenfurt, and Assling, and the branch from Klagenfurt towards Tarvisio.

On the application of either party, the route to be followed by the Czecho-Slovak trains may be modified either permanently or temporarily by mutual agreement between the Czecho-Slovak Railway Administration and those of the railways over which the running powers are exercised.

Article 323.

The trains for which the running powers are used shall not engage in local traffic, except by agreement between Austria and the Czecho-Slovak State.

Such running powers will include, in particular, the right to establish running sheds with small shops for minor repairs to locomotives and rolling stock, and to appoint representatives where necessary to supervise the working of Czecho-Slovak trains.

Article 324.

The technical, administrative and financial conditions under which the rights of the Czecho-Slovak State shall be exercised shall be laid down in a Convention between the Railway Administration of the Czecho-Slovak State and the Railway Administrations of the Austrian systems concerned. If the Administrations cannot come to an agreement on the terms of this Convention, the points of difference shall be decided by an arbitrator nominated by Great Britain, and his decisions shall be binding on all parties.

In the event of disagreement as to the interpretation of the Convention or of difficulties arising unprovided for in the Convention, the same form of arbitration will be adopted until such time as the League of Nations may lay down some other procedure.

CHAPTER 6.

TRANSITORY PROVISION.

Article 325.

Austria shall carry out the instructions given her, in regard to transport, by an authorised body acting on behalf of the Allied and Associated Powers:

(1) For the carriage of troops under the provisions of the present Treaty, and of material, ammunition and supplies for army use;

(2) As a temporary measure, for the transportation of supplies for certain regions, as well as for the restoration, as rapidly as possible, of the normal conditions of transport, and for the organisation of postal and telegraphic services.

CHAPTER 7.

TELEGRAPHS AND TELEPHONES.

Article 326.

Notwithstanding any contrary stipulations in existing treaties, Austria undertakes to grant freedom of transit for telegraphic correspondence and telephonic communications coming from or going to any one of the Allied and Associated Powers, whether neighbours or not, over such lines as may be most suitable for international transit and in accordance with the tariffs in force. This correspondence and these communications shall be subjected to no unnecessary delay or restriction; they shall enjoy in Austria national treatment in regard to every kind of facility and especially in regard to rapidity of transmission. No payment, facility or restriction shall depend directly or indirectly on the nationality of the transmitter or the addressee.

Article 327.

In view of the geographical situation of the Czecho-Slovak State Austria agrees to the following modifications in the International Telegraph and Telephone Conventions referred to in Article 235 of Part X (Economic Clauses) of the present Treaty.

(1) On the demand of the Czecho-Slovak State Austria shall provide and maintain trunk telegraph lines across Austrian territory.

(2) The annual rent to be paid by the Czecho-Slovak State for each of such lines will be calculated in accordance with the provisions of the above-mentioned Conventions, but unless otherwise agreed shall not be less than the sum that would be payable under those Conventions for the number of messages laid down in those Conventions as conferring the right to demand a new trunk line, taking as a basis the reduced tariff provided for in Article 23, paragraph 5, of the International Telegraph Convention as revised at Lisbon.

(3) So long as the Czecho-Slovak State shall pay the above minimum annual rent of a trunk line;

(a) The line shall be reserved exclusively for transit traffic to and from the Czecho-Slovak State;

(b) The faculty given to Austria by Article 8 of the International Telegraph Convention of July 22, 1875, to suspend international telegraph services shall not apply to that line.

(4) Similar provisions will apply to the provision and maintenance of trunk telephone circuits, but the rent payable by the Czecho-Slovak State for a trunk telephone circuit shall, unless otherwise agreed, be double the rent payable for a trunk telegraph line.

(5) The particular lines to be provided together with any necessary administrative, technical, and financial conditions not provided for in existing International Conventions or in this Article shall be fixed by a further Convention between the States concerned. In default of agreement on such Convention they will be fixed by an arbitrator appointed by the Council of the League of Nations.

(6) The stipulations of the present Article may be varied at any time by agreement between Austria and the Czecho-Slovak State. After the expiration of ten years from the coming into force of this Treaty the conditions under which the Czecho-Slovak State shall enjoy the rights conferred by this Article may, in default of agreement by the parties, be modified at the request of either party by an arbitrator designated by the Council of the League of Nations.

(7) In case of any dispute between the parties as to the interpretation either of this Article or of the Convention referred to in paragraph 5, this dispute shall be submitted for decision to the Permanent Court of International Justice to be established by the League of Nations.

Section IV.

DISPUTES AND REVISION OF PERMANENT CLAUSES.

Article 328.

Disputes which may arise between interested Powers with regard to the interpretation and application of this Part of the present Treaty shall be settled as provided by the League of Nations.

Article 329.

At any time the League of Nations may recommend the revision of such of the above Articles as relate to a permanent administrative régime.

Article 330.

The stipulations in Articles 284 to 290, 293, 312, 314 to 316, and 326 shall be subject to revision by the Council of the League of Nations at any time after three years from the coming into force of the present Treaty.

Failing such revision, no Allied or Associated Power can claim after the expiration of the above period of three years the benefit of any of the stipulations in the Articles enumerated above on behalf of any portion of its territories in which reciprocity is not accorded in respect of such stipulations. The period of three years during which reciprocity cannot be demanded may be prolonged by the Council of the League of Nations.

The benefit of the stipulations mentioned above cannot be claimed by States to which territory of the former Austro-Hungarian Monarchy has been transferred, or which have arisen out of the dismemberment of that Monarchy, except upon the footing of giving in the territory passing under their sovereignty reciprocal treatment to Austria.

Section V.

SPECIAL PROVISION.

Article 331.

Without prejudice to the special obligations imposed on her by the present Treaty for the benefit of the Allied and Associated Powers, Austria undertakes to adhere to any General Conventions regarding the international régime of transit, waterways, ports or railways which may be concluded by the Allied and Associated Powers, with the approval of the League of Nations, within five years of the coming into force of the present Treaty.

PART XIII.

LABOUR.

Section I.

ORGANISATION OF LABOUR.

Whereas the League of Nations has for its object the establishment of universal peace, and such a peace can be established only if it is based upon social justice;

And whereas conditions of labour exist involving such injustice, hardship and privation to large numbers of people as to produce unrest so great that the peace and harmony of the world are imperilled; and an improvement of those conditions is urgently required: as, for example, by the regulation of the hours of work, including the establishment of a maximum working day and week, the regulation of the labour supply, the prevention of unemployment, the provision of an adequate living wage, the protection of the worker against sickness, disease and injury arising out of his employment, the protection of children, young persons and women, provision for old age and injury, protection of the interests of workers when employed in countries other than their own, recognition of the principle of freedom of association, the organisation of vocational and technical education and other measures;

Whereas also the failure of any nation to adopt humane conditions of labour is an obstacle in the way of other nations which desire to improve the conditions in their own countries;

The High Contracting Parties, moved by sentiments of justice and humanity as well as by the desire to secure the permanent peace of the world, agree to the following:

CHAPTER I.

ORGANISATION.

Article 332.

A permanent organisation is hereby established for the promotion of the objects set forth in the Preamble.

The original Members of the League of Nations shall be the original Members of this organisation, and hereafter membership of the League of Nations shall carry with it membership of the said organisation.

Article 333.

The permanent organisation shall consist of:

(1) a General Conference of Representatives of the Members, and

(2) an International Labour Office controlled by the Governing Body described in Article 338.

Article 334.

The meetings of the General Conference of Representatives of the Members shall be held from time to time as occasion may require, and at least once in every year. It shall be composed of four Representatives of each of the Members, of whom two shall be Government Delegates and the two others shall be Delegates representing respectively the employers and the workpeople of each of the Members.

Each Delegate may be accompanied by advisers, who shall not exceed two in number for each item on the agenda of the meeting. When questions specially affecting women are to be considered by the Conference, one at least of the advisers should be a woman.

The Members undertake to nominate non-Government Delegates and advisers chosen in agreement with the industrial organisations, if such organisations exist, which are most representative of employers or workpeople, as the case may be, in their respective countries.

Advisers shall not speak except on a request made by the Delegate whom they accompany and by the special authorisation of the President of the Conference, and may not vote.

A Delegate may by notice in writing addressed to the President appoint one of his advisers to act as his deputy, and the adviser, while so acting, shall be allowed to speak and vote.

The names of the Delegates and their advisers will be communicated to the International Labour Office by the Government of each of the Members.

The credentials of Delegates and their advisers shall be subject to scrutiny by the Conference, which may, by two-thirds of the votes cast by the Delegates present, refuse to admit any Delegate or adviser whom it deems not to have been nominated in accordance with this Article.

Article 335.

Every Delegate shall be entitled to vote individually on all matters which are taken into consideration by the Conference.

If one of the Members fails to nominate one of the non-Government Delegates whom it is entitled to nominate, the other non-Government Delegate shall be allowed to sit and speak at the Conference, but not to vote.

If in accordance with Article 334 the Conference refuses admission to a Delegate of one of the Members, the provisions of the present Article shall apply as if that Delegate had not been nominated.

Article 336.

The meetings of the Conference shall be held at the seat of the League of Nations, or at such other place as may be decided by the Conference at a previous meeting by two-thirds of the votes cast by the Delegates present.

Article 337.

The International Labour Office shall be established at the seat of the League of Nations as part of the organisation of the League.

Article 338.

The International Labour Office shall be under the control of a Governing Body consisting of twenty-four persons, appointed in accordance with the following provisions:

The Governing Body of the International Labour Office shall be constituted as follows:—

Twelve persons representing the Governments;

Six persons elected by the Delegates to the Conference representing the employers;

Six persons elected by the Delegates to the Conference representing the workers.

Of the twelve persons representing the Governments eight shall be nominated by the Members which are of the chief industrial importance, and four shall be nominated by the Members selected for the purpose by the Government Delegates to the Conference, excluding the Delegates of the eight Members mentioned above.

Any question as to which are the Members of the chief industrial importance shall be decided by the Council of the League of Nations.

The period of office of the Members of the Governing Body will be three years. The method of filling vacancies and other similar questions may be determined by the Governing Body subject to the approval of the Conference.

The Governing Body shall, from time to time, elect one of its members to act as its Chairman, shall regulate its own procedure and shall fix its own times of meeting. A special meeting shall be held if a written request to that effect is made by at least ten members of the Governing Body.

Article 339.

There shall be a Director of the International Labour Office, who shall be appointed by the Governing Body, and, subject to the instructions of the Governing Body, shall be responsible for the efficient conduct of the International Labour Office and for such other duties as may be assigned to him.

The Director or his deputy shall attend all meetings of the Governing Body.

Article 340.

The staff of the International Labour Office shall be appointed by the Director, who shall, so far as is possible with due regard to the efficiency of the work of the Office, select persons of different nationalities. A certain number of these persons shall be women.

Article 341.

The functions of the International Labour Office shall include the collection and distribution of information on all subjects relating to the international adjustment of conditions of industrial life and labour, and particularly the examination of subjects which it is proposed to bring before the Conference with a view to the conclusion of international conventions, and the conduct of such special investigations as may be ordered by the Conference.

It will prepare the agenda for the meetings of the Conference.

It will carry out the duties required of it by the provisions of this Part of the present Treaty in connection with international disputes.

It will edit and publish in French and English, and in such other languages as the Governing Body may think desirable, a periodical paper dealing with problems of industry and employment of international interest.

Generally, in addition to the functions set out in this Article, it shall have such other powers and duties as may be assigned to it by the Conference.

Article 342.

The Government Departments of any of the Members which deal with questions of industry and employment may communicate directly with the Director through the Representative of their Government on the Governing Body of the International Labour Office, or failing any such Representative, through such other qualified official as the Government may nominate for the purpose.

Article 343.

The International Labour Office shall be entitled to the assistance of the Secretary-General of the League of Nations in any matter in which it can be given.

Article 344.

Each of the Members will pay the travelling and subsistence expenses of its Delegates and their advisers and of its Representatives attending the meetings of the Conference or Governing Body, as the case may be.

All the other expenses of the International Labour Office and of the meetings of the Conference or Governing Body shall be paid to the Director by the Secretary-General of the League of Nations out of the general funds of the League.

The Director shall be responsible to the Secretary-General of the League for the proper expenditure of all moneys paid to him in pursuance of this Article.

CHAPTER II.

PROCEDURE.

Article 345.

The agenda for all meetings of the Conference will be settled by the Governing Body, who shall consider any suggestion as to the agenda that may be made by the Government of any of the Members or by any representative organisation recognised for the purpose of Article 334.

Article 346.

The Director shall act as the Secretary of the Conference, and shall transmit the agenda so as to reach the Members four months before the meeting of the Conference, and, through them, the non-Government Delegates when appointed.

Article 347.

Any of the Governments of the Members may formally object to the inclusion of any item or items in the agenda. The grounds for such objection shall be set forth in a reasoned statement addressed to the Director, who shall circulate it to all the Members of the Permanent Organisation.

Items to which such objection has been made shall not, however, be excluded from the agenda, if at the Conference a majority of two-thirds of the votes cast by the Delegates present is in favour of considering them.

If the Conference decides (otherwise than under the preceding paragraph) by two-thirds of the votes cast by the Delegates present that any subject shall be considered by the Conference, that subject shall be included in the agenda for the following meeting.

Article 348.

The Conference shall regulate its own procedure, shall elect its own President, and may appoint committees to consider and report on any matter.

Except as otherwise expressly provided in this Part of the present Treaty, all matters shall be decided by a simple majority of the votes cast by the Delegates present.

The voting is void unless the total number of votes cast is equal to half the number of the Delegates attending the Conference.

Article 349.

The Conference may add to any committees which it appoints technical experts, who shall be assessors without power to vote.

Article 350.

When the Conference has decided on the adoption of proposals with regard to an item in the agenda, it will rest with the Conference to determine whether these proposals should take the form: (a) of a recommendation to be submitted to the Members for consideration with a view to effect being given to it by national legislation or otherwise, or (b) of a draft international convention for ratification by the Members.

In either case a majority of two-thirds of the votes cast by the Delegates present shall be necessary on the final vote for the adoption of the recommendation or draft convention, as the case may be, by the Conference.

In framing any recommendation or draft convention of general application the Conference shall have due regard to those countries in which climatic conditions, the imperfect development of industrial organization or other special circumstances make the industrial conditions substantially different and shall suggest the modifications, if any, which it considers may be required to meet the case of such countries.

A copy of the recommendation or draft convention shall be authenticated by the signature of the President of the Conference and of the Director and shall be deposited with the Secretary-General of the League of Nations. The Secretary-General will communicate a certified copy of the recommendation or draft convention to each of the Members.

Each of the Members undertakes that it will, within the period of one year at most from the closing of the session of the Conference, or if it is impossible owing to exceptional circumstances to do so within the period of one year, then at the earliest practicable moment and in no case later than eighteen months from the closing of the session of the Conference, bring the recommendation or draft convention before the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, for the enactment of legislation or other action.

In the case of a recommendation, the Members will inform the Secretary-General of the action taken.

In the case of a draft convention, the Member will, if it obtains the consent of the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, communicate the formal ratification of the convention to the Secretary-General and will take such action as may be necessary to make effective the provisions of such convention.

If on a recommendation no legislative or other action is taken to make a recommendation effective, or if the draft convention fails to obtain the consent of the authority or authorities within whose competence the matter lies, no further obligation shall rest upon the Member.

In the case of a federal State, the power of which to enter into conventions on labour matters is subject to limitations, it shall be in the discretion of that Government to treat a draft convention to which such limitations apply as a recommendation only, and the provisions of this Article with respect to recommendations shall apply in such case.

The above Article shall be interpreted in accordance with the following principle:

In no case shall any Member be asked or required, as a result of the adoption of any recommendation or draft convention by the Conference, to lessen the protection afforded by its existing legislation to the workers concerned.

Article 351.

Any convention so ratified shall be registered by the Secretary-General of the League of Nations, but shall only be binding upon the Members which ratify it.

Article 352.

If any convention coming before the Conference for final consideration fails to secure the support of two-thirds of the votes cast by the Delegates present, it shall nevertheless be within the right of any of the Members of the Permanent Organisation to agree to such convention among themselves.

Any convention so agreed to shall be communicated by the Governments concerned to the Secretary-General of the League of Nations, who shall register it.

Article 353.

Each of the Members agrees to make an annual report to the International Labour Office on the measures which it has taken to give effect to the provisions of conventions to which it is a party. These reports shall be made in such form and shall contain such particulars as the Governing Body may request. The Director shall lay a summary of these reports before the next meeting of the Conference.

Article 354.

In the event of any representation being made to the International Labour Office by an industrial association of employers or of workers that any of the Members has failed to secure in any respect the effective observance within its jurisdiction of any convention to which it is a party, the Governing Body may communicate this representation to the Government against which it is made and may invite that Government to make such statement on the subject as it may think fit.

Article 355.

If no statement is received within a reasonable time from the Government in question, or if the statement when received is not deemed to be satisfactory by the Governing Body, the latter shall have the right to publish the representation and the statement, if any, made in reply to it.

Article 356.

Any of the Members shall have the right to file a complaint with the International Labour Office if it is not satisfied that any other Member is securing the effective observance of any convention which both have ratified in accordance with the foregoing Articles.

The Governing Body may, if it thinks fit, before referring such a complaint to a Commission of Enquiry, as hereinafter provided for, communicate with the Government in question in the manner described in Article 354.

If the Governing Body does not think it necessary to communicate the complaint to the Government in question, or if, when they have made such communication, no statement in reply has been received within a reasonable time which the Governing Body considers to be satisfactory, the Governing Body may apply for the appointment of a Commission of Enquiry to consider the complaint and to report thereon.

The Governing Body may adopt the same procedure either of its own motion or on receipt of a complaint from a Delegate to the Conference.

When any matter arising out of Articles 355 or 356 is being considered by the Governing Body, the Government in question shall, if not already represented thereon, be entitled to send a representative to take part in the proceedings of the Governing Body while the matter is under consideration. Adequate notice of the date on which the matter will be considered shall be given to the Government in question.

Article 357.

The Commission of Enquiry shall be constituted in accordance with the following provisions:

Each of the Members agrees to nominate within six months of the date on which the present Treaty comes into force three persons of industrial experience, of whom one shall be a representative of employers, one a representative of workers, and one a person of independent standing, who shall together form a panel from which the Members of the Commission of Enquiry shall be drawn.

The qualifications of the persons so nominated shall be subject to scrutiny by the Governing Body, which may by two-thirds of the votes cast by the representatives present refuse to accept the nomination of any person whose qualifications do not in its opinion comply with the requirements of the present Article.

Upon the application of the Governing Body, the Secretary-General of the League of Nations shall nominate three persons, one from each section of this panel, to constitute the Commission of Enquiry, and shall designate one of them as the President of the Commission. None of these three persons shall be a person nominated to the panel by any Member directly concerned in the complaint.

Article 358.

The Members agree that, in the event of the reference of a complaint to a Commission of Enquiry under Article 356, they will each, whether directly concerned in the complaint or not, place at the disposal of the Commission all the information in their possession which bears upon the subject-matter of the complaint.

Article 359.

When the Commission of Enquiry has fully considered the complaint, it shall prepare a report embodying its findings on all questions of fact relevant to determining the issue between the parties and containing such recommendations as it may think proper as to the steps which should be taken to meet the complaint and the time within which they should be taken.

It shall also indicate in this report the measures, if any, of an economic character against a defaulting Government which it considers to be appropriate, and which it considers other Governments would be justified in adopting.

Article 360.

The Secretary-General of the League of Nations shall communicate the report of the Commission of Enquiry to each of the Governments concerned in the complaint, and shall cause it to be published.

Each of these Governments shall within one month inform the Secretary-General of the League of Nations whether or not it accepts the recommendations contained in the report of the Commission; and if not, whether it proposes to refer the complaint to the Permanent Court of International Justice of the League of Nations.

Article 361.

In the event of any Member failing to take the action required by Article 350, with regard to a recommendation or draft Convention, any other Member shall be entitled to refer the matter to the Permanent Court of International Justice.

Article 362.

The decision of the Permanent Court of International Justice in regard to a complaint or matter which has been referred to it in pursuance of Article 360 or Article 361 shall be final.

Article 363.

The Permanent Court of International Justice may affirm, vary or reverse any of the findings or recommendations of the Commission of Enquiry, if any, and shall in its decision indicate the measures, if any, of an economic character which it considers to be appropriate, and which other Governments would be justified in adopting against a defaulting Government.

Article 364.

In the event of any Member failing to carry out within the time specified the recommendations, if any, contained in the report of the Commission of Enquiry, or in the decision of the Permanent Court of International Justice, as the case may be, any other Member may take against that Member the measures of an economic character indicated in the report of the Commission or in the decision of the Court as appropriate to the case.

Article 365.

The defaulting Government may at any time inform the Governing Body that it has taken the steps necessary to comply with the recommendations of the Commission of Enquiry or with those in the decision of the Permanent Court of International Justice, as the case may be, and may request it to apply to the Secretary-General of the League to constitute a Commission of Enquiry to verify its contention. In this case the provisions of Articles 357, 358, 359, 360, 362 and 363 shall apply, and if the report of the Commission of Enquiry or the decision of the Permanent Court of International Justice is in favour of the defaulting Government, the other Governments shall forthwith discontinue the measures of an economic character that they have taken against the defaultnig Government.

CHAPTER III.

GENERAL.

Article 366.

The Members engage to apply conventions which they have ratified in accordance with the provisions of this Part of the present Treaty to their colonies, protectorates and possessions which are not fully self-governing:

(1) Except where owing to the local conditions the convention is inapplicable, or

(2) Subject to such modifications as may be necessary to adapt the convention to local conditions.

And each of the Members shall notify to the International Labour Office the action taken in respect of each of its colonies, protectorates and possessions which are not fully self-governing.

Article 367.

Amendments to this Part of the present Treaty which are adopted by the Conference by a majority of two-thirds of the votes cast by the Delegates present shall take effect when ratified by the States whose representatives compose the Council of the League of Nations and by three-fourths of the Members.

Article 368.

Any question or dispute relating to the interpretation of this Part of the present Treaty or of any subsequent convention concluded by the Members in pursuance of the provisions of this Part of the present Treaty shall be referred for decision to the Permanent Court of International Justice.

CHAPTER IV.

TRANSITORY PROVISIONS.

Article 369.

The first meeting of the Conference shall take place in October, 1919. The place and agenda for this meeting shall be as specified in the Annex hereto.

Arrangements for the convening and the organisation of the first meeting of the Conference will be made by the Government designated for the purpose in the said Annex. That Government shall be assisted in the preparation of the documents for submission to the Conference by an International Committee constituted as provided in the said Annex.

The expenses of the first meeting and of all subsequent meetings held before the League of Nations has been able to establish a general fund, other than the expenses of Delegates and their advisers, will be borne by the Members in accordance with the apportionment of the expenses of the International Bureau of the Universal Postal Union.

Article 370.

Until the League of Nations has been constituted all communications which under the provisions of the foregoing Articles should be addressed to the Secretary-General of the League will be preserved by the Director of the International Labour Office, who will transmit them to the Secretary-General of the League.

Article 371.

Pending the creation of a Permanent Court of International Justice, disputes which in accordance with this Part of the present Treaty would be submitted to it for decision will be referred to a tribunal of three persons appointed by the Council of the League of Nations.

ANNEX.

FIRST MEETING OF ANNUAL LABOUR CONFERENCE, 1919.

The place of meeting will be Washington.

The Government of the United States of America is requested to convene the Conference.

The International Organising Committee will consist of seven Members, appointed by the United States of America, Great Britain, France, Italy, Japan, Belgium and Switzerland. The Committee may, if it thinks necessary, invite other Members to appoint representatives.

Agenda:

(1) Application of principle of the 8-hours day or of the 48-hours week.

(2) Question of preventing or providing against unemployment.

(3) Women's employment:

(a) Before and after child-birth, including the question of maternity benefit;

(b) During the night;

(c) In unhealthy processes.

(4) Employment of children:

(a) Minimum age of employment;

(b) During the night;

(c) In unhealthy processes.

(5) Extension and application of the International Conventions adopted at Berne in 1906 on the prohibition of night work for women employed in industry and the prohibition of the use of white phosphorus in the manufacture of matches.

Section II.

GENERAL PRINCIPLES.

Article 372.

The High Contracting Parties, recognising that the well-being, physical, moral and intellectual, of industrial wage-earners is of supreme international importance, have framed, in order to further this great end, the permanent machinery provided for in Section I and associated with that of the League of Nations.

They recognise that differences of climate, habits and customs, of economic opportunity and industrial tradition, make strict uniformity in the conditions of labour difficult of immediate attainment. But, holding as they do, that labour should not be regarded merely as an article of commerce, they think that there are methods and principles for regulating labour conditions which all industrial communities should endeavour to apply, so far as their special circumstances will permit.

Among these methods and principles, the following seem to the High Contracting Parties to be of special and urgent importance:

First.—The guiding principle above enunciated that labour should not be regarded merely as a commodity or article of commerce.

Second.—The right of association for all lawful purposes by the employed as well as by the employers.

Third.—The payment to the employed of a wage adequate to maintain a reasonable standard of life as this is understood in their time and country.

Fourth.—The adoption of an eight-hours day or a forty-eight-hours week as the standard to be aimed at where it has not already been attained.

Fifth.—The adoption of a weekly rest of at least twenty-four hours, which should include Sunday wherever practicable.

Sixth.—The abolition of child labour and the imposition of such limitations on the labour of young persons as shall permit the continuation of their education and assure their proper physical development.

Seventh.—The principle that men and women should receive equal remuneration for work of equal value.

Eighth.—The standard set by law in each country with respect to the conditions of labour should have due regard to the equitable economic treatment of all workers lawfully resident therein.

Ninth.—Each State should make provision for a system of inspection in which women should take part, in order to ensure the enforcement of the laws and regulations for the protection of the employed.

Without claiming that these methods and principles are either complete or final, the High Contracting Parties are of opinion that they are well fitted to guide the policy of the League of Nations; and that, if adopted by the industrial communities who are members of the League, and safeguarded in practice by an adequate system of such inspection, they will confer lasting benefits upon the wage-earners of the world.

PART XIV.

MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS.

Article 373.

Austria undertakes to recognize and to accept the conventions made or to be made by the Allied and Associated Powers or any of them with any other Power as to the traffic in arms and in spirituous liquors, and also as to the other subjects dealt with in the General Acts of Berlin of February 26, 1885, and of Brussels of July 2, 1890, and the conventions completing or modifying the same.

Article 374.

The High Contracting Parties declare and place on record that they have taken note of the Treaty signed by the Government of the French Republic on July 17, 1918, with His Serene Highness the Prince of Monaco defining the relations between France and the Principality.

Article 375.

The High Contracting Parties, while they recognize the guarantees stipulated by the Treaties of 1815, and especially by the Act of November 20, 1815, in favour of Switzerland, the said guarantees constituting international obligations for the maintenance of peace, declare nevertheless that the provisions of these treaties, conventions, declarations and other supplementary Acts concerning the neutralized zone of Savoy, as laid down in paragraph 1 of Article 92 of the Final Act of the Congress of Vienna and in paragraph 2 of Article 3 of the Treaty of Paris of November 20, 1815, are no longer consistent with present conditions. For this reason the High Contracting Parties take note of the agreement reached between the French Government and the Swiss Government for the abrogation of the stipulations relating to this zone which are and remain abrogated.

The High Contracting Parties also agree that the stipulations of the Treaties of 1815 and of the other supplementary Acts concerning the free zones of Upper Savoy and the Gex district are no longer consistent with present conditions, and that it is for France and Switzerland to come to an agreement together with a view to settling between themselves the status of these territories under such conditions as shall be considered suitable by both countries.

ANNEX.

I.

The Swiss Federal Council has informed the French Government on May 5, 1919, that after examining the provisions of Article 435 of the Peace conditions presented to Germany by the Allied and Associated Powers in a like spirit of sincere friendship it has happily reached the conclusion that it was possible to acquiesce in it under the following conditions and reservations:

(1) The neutralized zone of Haute-Savoie:

(a) It will be understood that as long as the Federal Chambers have not ratified the agreement come to between the two Governments concerning the abrogation of the stipulations in respect of the neutralized zone of Savoy, nothing will be definitively settled, on one side or the other, in regard to this subject.

(b) The assent given by the Swiss Government to the abrogation of the above mentioned stipulations presupposes, in conformity with the text adopted, the recognition of the guarantees formulated in favour of Switzerland by the Treaties of 1815 and particularly by the Declaration of November 20, 1815.

(c) The agreement between the Governments of France and Switzerland for the abrogation of the above mentioned stipulations will only be considered as valid if the Treaty of Peace contains this Article in its present wording. In addition the Parties to the Treaty of Peace should endeavour to obtain the assent of the signatory Powers of the Treaties of 1815 and of the Declaration of November 20, 1815, which are not signatories of the present Treaty of Peace.

(2) Free zone of Haute-Savoie and the district of Gex:

(a) The Federal Council makes the most express reservations to the interpretation to be given to the statement mentioned in the last paragraph of the above Article for insertion in the Treaty of Peace, which provides that "the stipulations of the Treaties of 1815 and other supplementary acts concerning the free zones of Haute-Savoie and the Gex district are no longer consistent with present conditions." The Federal Council would not wish that its acceptance of the above wording should lead to the conclusion that it would agree to the suppression of a system intended to give neighbouring territory the benefit of a special régime which is appropriate to the geographical and economical situation and which has been well tested.

In the opinion of the Federal Council the question is not the modification of the customs system of the zones as set up by the Treaties mentioned above, but only the regulation in a manner more appropriate to the economic conditions of the present day of the terms of the exchange of goods between the regions in question. The Federal Council has been led to make the preceding observations by the perusal of the draft Convention concerning the future constitution of the zones which was annexed to the note of April 26 from the French Government. While making the above reservations the Federal Council declares its readiness to examine in the most friendly spirit any proposals which the French Government may deem it convenient to make on the subject.

(b) It is conceded that the stipulations of the Treaties of 1815 and other supplementary acts relative to the free zones will remain in force until a new arrangement is come to between France and Switzerland to regulate matters in this territory.

II.

The French Government have addressed to the Swiss Government, on May 18, 1919, the following note in reply to the communication set out in the preceding paragraph:

In a note dated May 5 the Swiss Legation in Paris was good enough to inform the Government of the French Republic that the Federal Government adhered to the proposed Article to be inserted in the Treaty of Peace between the Allied and Associated Governments and Germany.

The French Government have taken note with much pleasure of the agreement thus reached, and, at their request, the proposed Article, which had been accepted by the Allied and Associated Governments, has been inserted under No. 435 in the Peace conditions presented to the German Plenipotentiaries.

The Swiss Government, in their note of May 5 on this subject, have expressed various views and reservations.

Concerning the observations relating to the free zones of Haute-Savoie and the Gex district, the French Government have the honour to observe that the provisions of the last paragraph of Article 435 are so clear that their purport cannot be misapprehended, especially where it implies that no other Power but France and Switzerland will in future be interested in that question.

The French Government, on their part, are anxious to protect the interests of the French territories concerned, and, with that object, having their special situation in view, they bear in mind the desirability of assuring them a suitable customs régime and determining, in a manner better suited to present conditions, the methods of exchanges between these territories and the adjacent Swiss territories, while taking into account the reciprocal interests of both regions.

It is understood that this must in no way prejudice the right of France to adjust her customs line in this region in conformity with her political frontier, as is done on the other portions of her territorial boundaries, and as was done by Switzerland long ago on her own boundaries in this region.

The French Government are pleased to note on this subject in what a friendly disposition the Swiss Government take this opportunity of declaring their willingness to consider any French proposal dealing with the system to be substituted for the present régime of the said free zones, which the French Government intend to formulate in the same friendly spirit.

Moreover, the French Government have no doubt that the provisional maintenance of the régime of 1815 as to the free zones referred to in the above mentioned paragraph of the note from the Swiss Legation of May 5, whose object is to provide for the passage from the present régime to the conventional régime, will cause no delay whatsoever in the establishment of the new situation which has been found necessary by the two Governments. This remark applies also to the ratification by the Federal Chambers, dealt with in paragraph 1 (a), of the Swiss note of May 5, under the heading "Neutralized zone of Haute-Savoie."

Article 376.

The Allied and Associated Powers agree that where Christian religious missions were being maintained by Austrian societies or persons in territory belonging to them, or of which the government is entrusted to them in accordance with the present Treaty, the property which these missions or missionary societies possessed, including that of trading societies whose profits were devoted to the support of missions, shall continue to be devoted to missionary purposes. In order to ensure the due execution of this undertaking the Allied and Associated Governments will hand over such property to boards of trustees appointed by or approved by the Governments and composed of persons holding the faith of the Mission whose property is involved.

The Allied and Associated Governments, while continuing to maintain full control as to the individuals by whom the Missions are conducted, will safeguard the interests of such Missions.

Austria, taking note of the above undertaking, agrees to accept all arrangements made or to be made by the Allied or Associated Government concerned for carrying on the work of the said missions or trading societies and waives all claims on their behalf.

Article 377.

Without prejudice to the provisions of the present Treaty, Austria undertakes not to put forward directly or indirectly against any Allied or Associated Power, signatory of the present Treaty, any pecuniary claim based on events which occurred at any time before the coming into force of the present Treaty.

The present stipulation will bar completely and finally all claims of this nature, which will be thenceforward extinguished, whoever may be the parties in interest.

Article 378.

Austria accepts and recognises as valid and binding all decrees and orders concerning Austro-Hungarian ships and Austrian goods and all orders relating to the payment of costs made by any Prize Court of any of the Allied or Associated Powers, and undertakes not to put forward any claim arising out of such decrees or orders on behalf of any Austrian national.

The Allied and Associated Powers reserve the right to examine in such manner as they may determine all decisions and orders of Austro-Hungarian Prize Courts, whether affecting the property rights of nationals of those Powers or of neutral Powers. Austria agrees to furnish copies of all the documents constituting the record of the cases, including the decisions and orders made, and to accept and give effect to the recommendations made after such examination of the cases.

Article 379.

The High Contracting Parties agree that, in the absence of a subsequent agreement to the contrary, the Chairman of any Commission established by the present Treaty shall in the event of an equality of votes be entitled to a second vote.

Article 380.

Except where otherwise provided in the present Treaty, in all cases where the Treaty provides for the settlement of a question affecting particularly certain States by means of a special Convention to be concluded between the States concerned, it is understood by the High Contracting Parties that difficulties arising in this connection shall, until Austria is admitted to membership of the League of Nations, be settled by the Principal Allied and Associted Powers.

Article 381.

In the present Treaty the expression "former Austrian Empire" includes Bosnia and Herzegovina except where the text implies the contrary. This provision shall not prejudice the rights and obligations of Hungary in such territory.

The present Treaty, in French, in English, and in Italian, shall be ratified. In case of divergence the French text shall prevail, except in Parts I (Covenant of the League of Nations) and XIII (Labour), where the French and English texts shall be of equal force.

The deposit of ratifications shall be made at Paris as soon as possible.

Powers of which the seat of the Government is outside Europe will be entitled merely to inform the Government of the French Republic through their diplomatic representative at Paris that their ratification has been given; in that case they must transmit the instrument of ratification as soon as possible.

A first procès-verbal of the deposit of ratifications will be drawn up as soon as the Treaty has been ratified by Austria on the one hand, and by three of the Principal Allied and Associated Powers on the other hand.

From the date of this first procès-verbal the Treaty will come into force between the High Contracting Parties who have ratified it. For the determination of all periods of time provided for in the present Treaty this date will be the date of the coming into force of the Treaty.

In all other respects the Treaty will enter into force for each Power at the date of the deposit of its ratification.

The French Government will transmit to all the signatory Powers a certified copy of the procès-verbaux of the deposit of ratifications.

In faith whereof the above-named Plenipotentiaries have signed the present Treaty.

Done at , the day of , one thousand nine hundred and nineteen, in a single copy which will remain deposited in the archives of the French Republic, and of which authenticated copies will be transmitted to each of the Signatory Powers.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY AND THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed to read the treaty with Germany.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I do not know whether anyone is ready to go on this afternoon. A number of Senators have notified me that they desire to speak before the reading of the treaty is begun, but I do not know that any Senator desires to speak at this time.

Mr. CURTIS. I think some of the Senators who desired to speak left the Senate because they thought the Austrian treaty would be read after the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. JONES] concluded his speech.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I gave notice that I would speak to-morrow morning, because I thought the time would be taken up this afternoon with the reading of the Austrian treaty. As it was ordered printed in the RECORD without being read, I will change the notice and begin my speech right now.

Mr. President, I desire to discuss the treaty. My position on it was well known. I have made several speeches in favor of the treaty in my own State, but it seems that some of the metropolitan papers have misunderstood my position, and therefore I desire to state my position, and to make a speech for the treaty.

Mr. President, from far across the seas, from a foreign land, amidst pæans of praise and songs of triumph, our brave soldier boys have returned to their dear old homeland crowned with a glorious victory upon the battle field. They whipped the Germans to a standstill—a victory of arms—an armistice and a cessation of hostilities. But the victory of this most stupendous and most horrible of all wars is not yet complete, and will not be complete until all they fought and died for is settled and settled for humanity, for justice, liberty, freedom, a world democracy, and for universal and international peace. It will not be settled and completed until the league of nations, the covenant of peace for the nations of the world, is ratified. Until this is done there can be no peace, but unrest, revolution, starvation, and anarchy will stalk up and down the world, bringing in their wake destruction of nations, social disorder, wretchedness, and, finally, the extermination of the races of men.

Since the days of the lowly Nazarene coming out of the wilderness proclaiming peace on earth and good will to men, for more than 2,000 years, after experiencing the horrors of war, the fathers have dreamed and prayed that wars would cease in all the earth, and the time would come when the sword shall be beaten into the plowshare and the spear into the pruning hook, and war shall be no more.

Our country for years and years attempted to negotiate treaties of peace. This has been the announced policy. It was attempted during the McKinley, the Roosevelt, and Taft administrations, and during the first term of President Wilson's administration—peace with armament, peace without armament, the Bryan treaties, peace through The Hague convention. We have had the Hay treaties, the Root treaties, and the Knox treaties. All this has been of no avail, and it has been followed by the greatest of wars.

The question of the peace of the world is still unsettled. Now, the greatest opportunity for a world peace is here—at this time, when a great part of the world's surface is drenched with blood and tears; when millions of men lie dead and buried in the shell-torn fields of France and other lands, when millions of widows and fatherless children are crying out in their distress and can not be comforted and see no hope for the future, when millions of men who have survived walk about in a dazed condition, almost without hope for the future, when the nations of the earth are so burdened with debt that bankruptcy is staring them in the face—at such a time the great opportunity has arrived "to stop, look, and listen," to endeavor to secure peace, to restore order, preserve society, and provide domestic tranquillity, and to inspire the breasts of suffering humanity with hope for a new and better order of things, out of which shall come democracy, freedom, and liberty to the individual citizen, higher civilization, and a government in all lands such as we have by the consent of the governed.

I have read the treaty, heard it discussed, studied it, and thought over it, and have determined it is my duty to support its ratification to meet the great responsibility resting upon us and aid in the completion of the victory for which our boys fought and died.

Shall we in this country, who for years have advocated peace among all nations, stand in the way of its ratification? Shall we refuse to accept that which we have advocated and prayed for, that which we proclaimed to the world was our purpose? In this great crisis shall we admit that all our professions and promises have been mere pretense and camouflage, and thus have our country looked upon with contempt, when the fact is that treaty practically contains all the provisions of the several treaties for peace which we have negotiated in the past, such as reduction of armament, arbitration, cooling time, high international court for trial of justiciable questions, and other remedies?

Mr. President, one of the greatest events in the world's history was when our great Commander in Chief, the President of the United States, appeared on the 2d day of April, 1917, before a joint session of the Senate and the House of Representatives and delivered his great war message. After reciting the hostile acts of the Imperial German Government against our country, among other things he said:

> While we do these things, these deeply momentous things, let us be very clear and make very clear to all the world what our motives and our objects are. My own thought has not been driven from its habitual and normal course by the unhappy events of the last two months, and I do not believe that the thought of the Nation has been altered or clouded by them. I have exactly the same things in mind now that I had in mind when I addressed the Senate on the 22d of January last, the same that I had in mind when I addressed the Congress on the 3d of February and on the 26th of February. Our object now, as then, is to vindicate the principles of peace and justice in the life of the world as against selfish and autocratic power and to set up amongst the really free and self-governed peoples of the world such a concert of purpose and of action as will henceforth insure the observance of those principles. Neutrality is no longer feasible or desirable where the peace of the world and the freedom of its peoples is involved, and the menace of that peace and freedom lies in the existence of autocratic governments backed by organized force which is controlled wholly by their will, not by the will of their people. We have seen the last of neutrality in such circumstances. We are at the beginning of an age in which it will be insisted that the same standards of conduct and of responsibility for wrong done shall be observed among nations and their governments that are observed among the individual citizens of civilized States.
> We are now about to accept gauge of battle with this natural foe to liberty and shall, if necessary, spend the whole force of the Nation to check and nullify its pretensions and its power. We are glad, now that we see the facts with no veil of false pretense about them, to fight thus for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its peoples, the German peoples included, for the rights of nations, great and small, and the privilege of men everywhere to choose their way of life and of obedience. The world must be made safe for democracy. Its peace must be planted upon the tested foundations of political liberty. We have no selfish ends to serve. We desire no conquest, no dominion. We seek no indemnities for ourselves, no material compensation for the sacrifices we shall freely make. We are but one of the champions of the rights of mankind. We shall be satisfied when those rights have been made as secure as the faith and the freedom of nations can make them.

It is a fearful thing to lead this great peaceful people into war—into the most terrible and disastrous of all wars. Civilization itself seems to be in the balance. But the right is more precious than peace, and we shall fight for the things which we have always carried nearest our hearts—for democracy, for the right of those who submit to authority to have a voice in their own governments, for the right and the liberties of small nations, for a universal dominion of right by such concert of free peoples as shall bring peace and safety to all nations and to make the world itself at last free. To such a task we can dedicate our lives and our fortunes, everything that we are and everything that we have, with the pride of those who know that the day has come when America is privileged to spill her blood and her might for the principles that gave her birth and happiness and the peace which she has treasured. God helping her, she can do no other.

Soon after the delivery of this wonderful message each House returned to its Chamber, and four days later, to wit, on the 6th day of April, declared war against Germany, without a dissenting voice and without protest from any Senator or Member of the House of Representatives against the principles announced in the message and as to our purposes in going to war.

Then and there the keynote as to the purposes of the war was sounded by our great President, which rang all around the world, thrilling the hearts of the people in every warring country and inspiring them with new hope and new aspirations that a new order of things would come about, and peace would finally reign and men should be free.

This was the slogan which was sounded upon every stump, in every pulpit, and upon every platform in this broad land; in meetings held for the sale of Liberty bonds, thrift stamps, for the raising of funds for the Red Cross, Young Men's Christian Association, Salvation Army, and other war purposes.

All the people were made to understand the purposes of the war, and they rallied to the cause as they never had before. It was not our purpose to send our soldiers to a foreign land simply and for the only purpose of aiding the Allies in whipping Germany, because Germany made war on us, but also it was for a higher and nobler purpose—to fight for justice, humanity, liberty, freedom, and the future peace of the world. This was the slogan and eloquent sentiment which thrilled the hearts of our people, stirred their patriotism, and caused them to open their purse strings and to subscribe more liberally and more generously than anyone ever dreamed they would do. It caused every true American, with the greatest enthusiasm, to do his utmost to help win the war, and the good women of our land to take upon themselves great burdens and make every sacrifice in order to be of help and comfort. Democracy and peace were the great watchwords which stirred the very souls of our people and aroused them to the noblest, most patriotic, and most glorious activities.

Shall it all go for nothing? Shall all the blood shed and the treasure expended go simply to have helped the Allies whip Germany? Shall our boys have suffered and died in a foreign land for this purpose only? No; the victory won on the battle field must extend further than that. The people of this country demand that this treaty be ratified in order to complete the victory and establish in all the world the principles for which we fought, as announced by the President in his celebrated message.

We are told on the other side of this Chamber that this is all altruism and idealism. Mr. President, that is what the Tories and English stated in 1776, when in our Declaration of Independence we declared that all men are created equal and that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, and that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and that to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.

If it is idealism and altruism to lift the people of the world to a higher plane of civilization, to give righteousness and justice, and to aid governments which derive their just powers from the consent of the governed—a government of the people, by the people, and for the people—to promote peace in the world, then I am an altruist and idealist.

The keynote which was sounded by the President of the United States was echoed and reechoed by leaders of men and the great statesmen in all the countries at war with Germany.

Mr. David Lloyd-George caught it up and spoke as follows:

> The world will then be able, when this war is over, to attend to its business in peace. There will be no war or rumor of war to disturb and to distract. We can build up, we can reconstruct, we can till, we can cultivate and enrich, and the burden and terror and waste of war will have gone. The best security for peace will be that nations band themselves together to punish the peace breaker.

Mr. Balfour said:

> Here we come face to face with the great problem which lies behind all the changing aspects of this tremendous war. When it is brought to an end, how is civilized mankind so to reorganize itself that similar catastrophes shall not be permitted to recur? * * * Surely even now it is fairly clear that if substantial progress is to be made toward securing the peace of the world and a free development of its constituent nations, the United States of America and the British Empire should explicitly recognize, what all instinctively know, that on these great subjects they share a common ideal. * * * If in our time any substantial effort is to be made toward securing the permanent triumph of the Anglo-Saxon ideal, the great communities which accept it must work together.

Lord Northcliffe said:

> A close federation of the nations now fighting the good fight will be the only insurance against the autocracy that made this war possible and the horrors that the armies of the autocrat perpetrated on innocent noncombatants. The world must be made free for democracy.

Premier Viviani, the great French orator, soon after the President had delivered his great message, said:

> And now we see all America rise and sharpen her weapons in the midst of peace for the common struggle. Together we will carry on that struggle; and when by force we have at last imposed military victory our labors will not be concluded. Our task will be—I quote the noble words of President Wilson—to organize the society of nations. After material victory we will win this moral victory. We will shatter the ponderous sword of militarism; we will establish guaranties for peace.

If I had the time I could go on and give the sentiments expressed by other great world statesmen who uttered similar statements, but I give only those few extracts to show that the whole world has reechoed the sentiment of the President and was inspired with a new hope that after the victory should come to our armies the purpose for which we went to war should be realized through a league of nations in order to complete the victory.

Should we refuse to ratify the league of nations undoubtedly the nations of Europe would be in despair. The possibility is that there would be revolutions, social conflicts, and great upheavals, which would be worse even than the horrible war itself.

Here I desire to read a statement made by Mr. Venizelos, the great premier of Greece, probably the greatest statesman of them all:

> I permit myself to say that the outlook in Europe would be one of utter despair without the league of nations. * * * We shall have in future either a sincere effort to prevent war under the league of nations or we shall be menaced by internal crises and civil wars. If our democracies see coming before them the possibility of our great wars, the result will be a social conflict and upheaval that may be worse than the international war itself. * * *
>
> The basis of the whole peace is the league of nations, and the covenant and the other terms are inextricably bound together. It therefore is not possible to separate the covenant from the rest of the treaty terms. If this were attempted by the legislative authorities in America and there was failure to ratify the terms as a whole, Germany would say—and truly say—that the treaty was not sanctioned by one of the parties, and she would proceed to evade its provisions. I allow myself to say that opposition in America arises in large measure, if not wholly, from a misinterpretation of the significancies of the clauses of the covenant and the lack of full understanding of the extent to which the treaty depends on the covenant for the working out of the terms. * * *
> Perhaps we have not been very happy in wording this (Monroe doctrine) provision, but I am sure I speak for everyone. Nobody had any thought of interfering with the Monroe doctrine.
> I finish by saying I fear that America has not yet an exact idea of the greatness of her position. You have taken such a position in the world that you can not ignore its responsibilities.

Mr. President, after many weary months of incessant and untiring labor, the President of the United States returned from Versailles, bringing with him this treaty, and which, as under the Constitution it is made his duty to do, he has submitted to the Senate for its advice, consent, and ratification. Mr. President, not his treaty or such a treaty as he would have it; not the treaty of Lloyd-George or Gen. Smuts; not the treaty of Clemenceau or just as he would have it; not a treaty as other members of the peace commission would have written it, but the result of the combined wisdom of all the great representatives of the many nations of the world which were represented at the peace commission, all being devoted to one single purpose—that of promoting the peace of the world and promoting happiness and justice to all mankind.

Here it has been denounced and criticized even before it was signed and agreed upon. Since the signing of the "round robin," so called, most strenuous efforts have been made to defeat it for one purpose or another. Some are absolutely opposed to any league whatever. Some are in favor of interpretations, and some in favor of reservations, mild or drastic.

I do not believe the Senate will refuse to ratify it. The American people are behind it, and, after all our promises and pledges and the prayers of our people for peace, for 50 years, we can not afford from the standpoint of honor to defeat it.

More than two-thirds of the nations of the world are now willing to join hands with us in ratifying such a league, and we can not afford to block the way of the fulfillment of that which we have advocated, hoped for, and dreamed of for years. We should at least be willing to try it. This is the first time in the world's history that we have been face to face with this great opportunity which is now offered to bring about a new order of things for the happiness and welfare of the people of the earth.

It is easy to find fault, easy to criticize, easy to see ghosts and make evil predictions. But taking the covenant as a whole, with its 26 articles, except those which provide for organization and detail, every article contains provision looking to preserving the peace of the world. We should do as our fathers did when the great league of colonies, the Constitution of the United States, was submitted. Many disapproved, some refused to sign, some rejected, but when considered as a whole the majority, acting upon the principle stated by the great statesman, Benjamin Franklin, signed it; and momentous has been the result. We now speak of it as an inspired instrument—the greatest ever penned by mortal man. Here is what that wise old statesman, Benjamin Franklin, then a feeble old man 80 years of age, said:

I confess that there are several parts of this Constitution which I do not at present approve, but I am not sure I shall ever approve them. For, having lived long, I have experienced many instances of being obliged by better information or fuller consideration to change opinions, even on important subjects, which I once thought right but found to be otherwise. It is, therefore, the older I grow the more apt I am to doubt my own judgment and to pay more respect to the judgment of others.

I doubt, too, whether any other convention we can obtain may be able to make a better Constitution. For you assemble a number of men to have the advantage of their joint wisdom, you inevitably assemble with these men all their prejudices, their passions, their errors of opinion, their local interests, and their selfish views. From such an assembly can a perfect production be expected? It therefore astonishes me, sir, to find this system approaching so near to perfection as it does, and I think it will astonish our enemies, who are waiting with confidence to hear that our councils are confounded, like those of the builders of Babel, and that our States are on the point of separation, only to meet hereafter for the purpose of cutting one another's throats. Thus I consent, sir, to this Constitution, because I expect no better and because I am not sure that it is not the best. The opinions I have had of its errors I sacrifice to the public good. I have never whispered a syllable of them abroad. Within these walls they were born and here they shall die. If every one of us in returning to our constituents were to report the objections he has had to it and endeavor to gain partisans in support of them, we might prevent its being generally received, and thereby lose all the salutary effects and great advantages resulting naturally in our favor among foreign nations as well as among ourselves from our real or apparent unanimity. * * *

On the whole, sir, I can not help expressing a wish that every member of the convention who may still have objections to it would with me, on this occasion, doubt a little of his own infallibility, and to make manifest our unanimity, put his name to this instrument.

And these should be the principles which should guide us when the final vote is taken for ratification.

As to Shantung, we can do absolutely nothing at this time. We could not remedy the wrong if we would. We could not help the situation at the peace conference, and we can not do so now either by rejecting the treaty or by amendment, reservation, or interpretation. Japan by the fortunes of war has come into possession of all the rights, title, and interest in the Shantung Peninsula which Germany surrendered to her. She has acquired it by treaty with China, also with Great Britain, France, and Italy. The time for us to protest was when Germany forced it from China 21 years ago. Instead of that we have sat silently by all these years until now, when, in order to defeat the treaty, some hold up their hands in holy horror at the great wrong inflicted upon China. We do not want to go to war with Japan, neither do we wish to make her our enemy. We can do nothing except trust in the solemn pledge made by Japan to President Wilson to turn back Shantung to China in a reasonable time.

The principal objections to the treaty by those who oppose it and favor reservation are to article 10, touching the guaranty of territorial integrity of the nations forming the league, to the Monroe doctrine and to purely domestic questions, which, as it is contended, are subject to determination by the council, and to the provision for the two years withdrawal clause. But the chief objection, and upon which the great arguments have been made in opposition to the ratification of the treaty, is article 10, which reads as follows:

The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve, as against external aggression, the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league. In case of any such aggression or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

In my opinion this is the very cream and crux of the covenant, so far as the preservation of the peace of the world is concerned, for without it the treaty would have very little vitality and the real purpose of the covenant would be nullified and very little would be accomplished to carry out the purposes for which it is intended.

It is argued that the article will be productive of war—involve us in wars all over the world, and require our soldiers to be sent to foreign lands to suffer and die in wars waged for remote countries in whose welfare we have but little interest. This article has no such terrors for me, and such arguments have very little force and lodgment in my mind. It will have the contrary effect. It simply prescribes for all nations a policy essentially similar to the Monroe doctrine, which practically guarantees the territorial integrity of the countries of the South and Central Americas, which has had the moral effect, and, without going to war, has prevented any foreign country acquiring territory in the Republics to the south of us. Other nations knew that to attempt to encroach on that territory meant a fight, and they have desisted and without question have respected this great policy of ours.

With this article in the treaty no nation will ever attempt to interfere with the territorial integrity or political independence of any nation which is a member of the league when it well knows that besides the other punishments which are provided in the covenant shall be visited upon the offending nation it might finally result in having to fight 30 or more nations. This in itself is a most overwhelming deterrent from engaging in war. But before invoking the provisions of article 10 the council will be required to exhaust every other remedy provided by the terms of the treaty to prevent war. The whole covenant is based upon cooperation, mediation, and conciliation for the peaceful settlement of threatened disputes between the nations by diplomacy, by mediation, by arbitration, by the submission to the high court to be established for the determination of justiciable questions which may arise, restraining war until three months' cooling time has elapsed. And, further, after all this machinery for peaceful settlement has failed, if there is a breach it is provided by the covenant that the offending nation shall be penalized by an immediate and universal boycott of the offending nation. Not until all these mediatorial provisions shall have been tried and have failed, then and not until then, can the council consider the question of proceeding under article 10. The council is nowhere given the power to declare war. In case of any violation of the article the council can only advise, under its expressed terms and provisions, a plan for fulfilling its obligations, and the plan will have to be unanimously agreed upon, and the representative of the United States is always there to veto by refusing his consent to anything that might be proposed which is not in accord with the views expressed or implied by the people of this country.

Under the Constitution of our country the Congress only can declare war and provide for the raising and equipment of armies and navies. As the Constitution follows the flag, so the Constitution is present with our representatives in the assembly and the council, and our delegates will advise, of course, with Congress before final action is taken.

I admit that we are in honor bound to carry out the provisions to the letter of any treaty we may make, and we would not shrink from any duty which it imposes upon us. But with all these provisions for peaceful settlement of disputes between nations, I insist that war would be a very remote possibility. We have never failed to keep faith and carry out the terms of any treaty we have ever made, except, possibly, the treaty made with New Grenada, now Colombia, when instead of protecting her from external and internal dissensions, as we agreed to do for a consideration, we aided and abetted in the secession and rape of Panama, and we are soon, I am glad to say, to rectify our act by paying Colombia $25,000,000. But we shall always in honor be bound to keep faith and strictly adhere to the contract we here entered into, even at the expense of war, should it become absolutely necessary. There is no danger of our being involved in war. No nation would ever even consider going to war with a member of the league. The boycott provision alone would prevent it.

The prospect of her withering ostracism, forbidden the use of foreign markets, denial of food and raw material from the rest of the world, severance of all trade and financial relations, would alone mean her downfall; and then, above all, staring her in the face, finally the fact that an overwhelming number of the nations of the world would be arrayed against her. It is simply preposterous to think that we would be compelled to go to war under article 10.

This article, it must be observed, also does not protect changes in boundaries, enlargement or reduction of States, even the establishment of new States, but simply forbids the taking by force territory from a member of the league or overthrowing by force its established government; and also the provision does not in any way provide against internal dissension or revolution but only external aggression. As by the Monroe doctrine, simply announced, we have succeeded in protecting the territorial integrity of our sister Republics to the south of us without the loss of the life of a single soldier or the firing of a shot, so I contend that there is no danger of our ever being called upon to make use of the provisions of the article or to declare war. In my judgment it needs no amendments, no interpretations or reservations.

Even before the treaty was signed and while it was being considered by the peace commission, the obstructionists began to criticize the proposed draft, and not only signed what is now called the "round robin" but they bitterly protested because our time-honored Monroe doctrine and our domestic questions, as they claimed, would be left to the determination of the league. Such, in my judgment, was not so, but in deference to that sentiment or protest the peace commission incorporated in the new draft of the treaty—which was finally signed and is now before us—article 15 and article 21, which, in my judgment, take from the council the consideration and determination of those purely domestic questions as the tariff, immigration, our coastwise trade, and the Monroe doctrine.

Mr. Veniselos, the great Greek statesman, who was a member of the peace commission and recognized as one of the greatest statesmen in Europe, said in an interview:

> Perhaps we have not been very happy in wording this (Monroe doctrine) provision, but I am sure I speak for everyone. Nobody had any thought of interfering with the Monroe doctrine.

Why were these things inserted in the new draft of the treaty if not for the purpose of excepting and eliminating them from consideration by the council?

Not only must every action, except in matters of procedure, taken by the council be unanimous when we are directly interested, thereby giving the veto power to this country through our own delegates and member of the council, but in the very first article it is provided that we can withdraw from the league after giving two years' notice, provided we have fulfilled all of our international obligations under the covenant. Mr. President, we will fulfill them and keep faith, and we can withdraw whenever the people of our country say we shall, and we shall say whether our obligations have been kept or not. All these provisions are plain to me, and I can see no need of amendments, reservations, or written interpretations made to the article.

Germany is still strong and wonderful in her resources. Conditions in the countries which are parties to this contract are very unsatisfactory. I fear delay with all the unrest in the world.

Mr. President, the sovereignty, the integrity, of our country and our vital honor will in no way be affected by the ratification of this treaty. Our vital interests are amply safeguarded. Our delegate to the council goes with the Constitution in one hand and, in effect, the veto power in the other, and with the provision for the reduction of armaments, the nations being pledged to do so by article 8.

With the pledge to submit all disputes to arbitration, pledges not to go to war until three months after the award by the arbitrators or the report by the council, pledges to respect each other's territory and political independence, and with the boycott provision contained in article 16, besides the general pledge given by each to the other to do all in their power, either by diplomacy, conciliation, or mediation, to adjust and settle disputes, how can there be war?

A number of Senators fear that the language in some of the articles is ambiguous, and by reason of their ambiguity these articles should be plainly interpreted in the resolution of ratification as to what they do mean. Provided such reservation is not an amendment to the treaty, I confess I would not object. I fear, however, the adoption of any reservation or interpretation to the treaty would throw the whole matter back in conference. Other nations might ask for similar reservations or interpretations, especially Germany, dissatisfied as she is with the treaty, and, being a party to it, would insist on reopening the whole matter, and thus delay final ratification of the treaty and peace. This would be a calamity and bring untold trouble to the world. It would absolutely bring chaos. The question is whether we can afford to take the risk.

It is a treaty for international or world peace. These covenants therein contained will bring it about. Ratify the treaty and complete the great victory. Ratify it and make the heart of the world glad. Ratify it and bring order out of chaos, and give domestic tranquillity to those unhappy nations lately cutting each other's throats. Ratify it and make the world safe for democracy. Ratify it and sound the death knell of absolutism and the divine right of the Hapsburgs and the Hohenzollerns to rule. Ratify it and give to the world such as we have the light of liberty, the right of equal opportunity, the right to govern by and with the consent of the governed, liberty, and the preservation of happiness. Let us have peace. Let this Christian civilization stand not in the way, but let us lead the way for light, justice, humanity, and peace.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I move that the Senate return to legislative session. I understand that there is no desire to proceed with the executive session further this afternoon.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is that the program of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations?

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to that procedure. There is no Senator, I think, who desires to continue to-night the discussion of the treaty. It is now half past four; and if the Senator from Georgia desires to go on with his bill I shall be very glad to oblige him, so far as I am concerned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Before making objection I should like to get a little light. I understood the Senator from Massachusetts made the announcement that he proposed, in bringing the treaty before the Senate to-day, to keep it here without interruption and have it the exclusive business of the Senate after 2 o'clock. Now, is it proposed at any time to suspend the consideration of the treaty and resume legislative business?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, at half past 4 o'clock in the afternoon on the first day of the consideration of the treaty, if there are other Senators who desire to speak and do not wish to go on this afternoon, I am not going to try to force them to speak; I can not do so. While I am in charge of the management of the treaty I shall do the best I can to expedite its consideration and keep it before the Senate steadily; but I am not going to interfere with the Senator from Georgia if by taking half an hour in the late afternoon he can dispose of an important bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator does not intend to give the impression that the consideration of the treaty can not proceed unless some Senator is ready to speak. We have now reached the stage where under the rules the second reading of the treaty is in order, and it is to be read under rules, as I understand, article by article.

Mr. LODGE. It can be read in that way or we can have the formal reading and consume five or six days. If the Senator wants that procedure followed, we will begin.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I certainly do not. I wish to ascertain the Senator's intentions. I understood him the other day to state that he proposed to bring the treaty before the Senate to-day——

Mr. LODGE. I have done so.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. And keep it here without interruption and to the exclusion of all other business.

Mr. LODGE. I did not say "to the exclusion of all other business."

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Well, what are the Senator's intentions in that respect? Does he propose to lay the treaty aside?

Mr. LODGE. My intention is to go on with it every day until it is disposed of.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understand now the Senator proposes to lay it aside for legislative business, although we have just reached the reading stage.

Mr. LODGE. There is now probably half an hour before the Senate will adjourn; the Senator from Georgia has in charge a bill which is just on the verge of passage. I pushed him aside this afternoon at 2 o'clock in order to bring the treaty up, and I now propose, so far as I am personally concerned, to allow him to take up his bill and finish it if he can do so in half an hour. If the Senator from Nebraska thinks that he can make anything out of that, he is welcome to do so.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am simply desirous of finding out the exact position of the Senator. I think the matter can be arranged this afternoon under the circumstances, but I am asking for the future. I should like a plain statement from the Senator whether he proposes to begin to-morrow at least, if not to-day, to take up the treaty and give it attention to the exclusion of other business, or does he propose to lay it aside?

Mr. LODGE. My intention is to bring the treaty before the Senate every day and have it dealt with until disposed of. I am not going to say what I am going to do each day, for I do not know. On Wednesday we have a holiday. I shall not have it up that day. On Thursday we are to receive Gen. Pershing. I shall not have it up that day.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Probably not.

Mr. LODGE. I can not tell what will come up from day to day. My intention is to keep the treaty before the Senate until disposed of. What we shall do each day I can not undertake to say. It is for the Senate to determine.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator whether it is his purpose to have the second reading, or will he ask unanimous consent now that the second reading of the treaty may be dispensed with? It will take four or five days to do that, and perhaps a week.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, my plan was to have it read, to have the second reading, and have the amendments offered as the treaty is read. If we have it read formally, as it is called—that is, if we have the treaty read a second time—then the amendments will be offered without a rereading of the treaty. My plan is to have it treated just as we treat an appropriation bill.

Mr. SWANSON. My idea was to suggest to the Senator to dispense with the second reading of the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. I do not need to do that, under the rules.

Mr. SWANSON. I understand that it must be read the second time.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Senator evidently has not examined the question. Under the rules of legislative business a bill is read a first and second time before being referred. Under the rule affecting treaties, it is read a first time. That reading was not called for, and it went without a formal reading. Now, under the rule, it is to be read a second time. I shall not ask for a formal reading the second time. I will have it read for amendment. It has to be read, and I will have it read for amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. That is what we suggest—that the Senator ask unanimous consent that that be done.

Mr. LODGE. We do not need unanimous consent to have it done.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator does not hold, then, that a second formal reading of the treaty is necessary?

Mr. LODGE. Why, there is no formal reading. The treaty has to be read. You can either read it en bloc, right through, which is what is usually called the formal reading, or you can read it and take up the amendments as it is read, which I think is the more workmanlike way of doing.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is my understanding that that is the rule. I was surprised to hear the Senator put the other interpretation upon it. My understanding is that the first formal reading occurred before it was referred to the committee.

Mr. LODGE. That has taken place.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then, after the committee reports the treaty, it has to lie over at least one day.

Mr. LODGE. Yes; and take a second reading.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then the second reading occurs, and the committee amendments are considered article by article as the reading progresses.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If that is the Senator's understanding, that is satisfactory.

Mr. LODGE. That is my understanding.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I withdraw my objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, mine was a motion. My motion was that we return to legislative session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood it to be a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. LODGE. No; the Senator can make the motion. It is a privileged motion.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate return to legislative session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia that the Senate return to legislative session.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, before that question is put——

Mr. LODGE. It is not a debatable question; but I am not going to make that point.

Mr. POMERENE. I think that is true, but I simply want to offer this suggestion:

I feel very keenly the importance of this bill, and I do believe that it is a step in the direction of increased inflation in this country, and I am not willing that this matter shall be voted upon without there being a quorum present. I have not any objection to taking up this bill again in the morning hour, and if the majority of the Senate decide that I am wrong the responsibility must belong to that majority. I think, however, it will be very difficult to get a quorum here to-night, and if it can be taken up to-morrow morning, I shall assist in getting it up; but I want to have a vote upon this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia that the Senate return to legislative session.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate resumed legislative business.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. POMERENE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Harris	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Bankhead	Harrison	New	Smoot
Brandegee	Henderson	Newberry	Sutherland
Capper	Hitchcock	Norris	Swanson
Colt	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Thomas
Cummins	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Townsend
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Owen	Trammell
Dillingham	Kellogg	Page	Underwood
Fall	Kenyon	Phelan	Walsh, Mass.
Fletcher	Keyes	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
France	Lenroot	Pittman	Watson
Frelinghuysen	Lodge	Pomerene	Wolcott
Gay	McKellar	Robinson
Gerry	McNary	Sheppard
Gronna	Moses	Simmons

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH], and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] are necessarily detained from the Senate on public business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I move that the Senate resume the consideration of House bill 7478.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 7478) to amend sections 5200 and 5202 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as amended by acts of June 22, 1906, and September 24, 1918.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I move to amend the bill by inserting, on page 3, on line 9, after the word "under," the characters "(1)" and "(2)," so that it will read:

Described under (1), (2), and (3) hereof.

If this amendment should be adopted, I shall follow it by another amendment, so as to make the text clear, by inserting, on page 3, line 8, after the word "liabilities," the words "arising out of the discount of bills of exchange, including drafts and bills of exchange, and the discount of commercial or business paper described in paragraphs (1) and (2)."

The purpose of this limitation is to make it apply to liabilities upon bills of exchange and upon commercial or business paper described in paragraphs (1) and (2), as well as in paragraph (3), upon the discount of notes; and I should like to take the time of the Senate to explain this amendment again as I see it.

If the Senators who care to follow me will refer to the bill, they will find that in the proviso beginning at the top of page 2 there are four classes of paper referred to. The first one is "the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values," and so forth. I will not read the rest of that, because it is not necessary for the purpose I have in mind.

Second. "The discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person, company, corporation, or firm negotiating the same."

Third. "The discount of notes secured by shipping documents," and so forth.

Fourth. "The discount of any note or notes secured by not less than a like face amount of bonds or notes of the United States."

Those four classes of paper are made the subject of the following verb, on line 21:

Shall not be considered as money borrowed within the meaning of this section.

The first part of this section places a limitation upon the amount that one can borrow from a bank at 10 per cent of the paid-in capital stock and surplus. The limitations that we find, then, on the amount of accommodations which the borrower can get will be found at the bottom of page 2 and on page 3, and this provides that as to that kind of paper which is designated in paragraph 4, and which relates to paper which is secured by bonds of the United States, or certificates of indebtedness of the United States, the borrower can get an additional accommodation of 10 per cent. In other words, if a borrower has United States bonds or certificates of indebtedness, under this act he can get 20 per cent of the paid-up capital stock and surplus. But there is a further enabling clause whereby the Comptroller of the Currency can increase this amount when the security he gives consists of bonds or certificates of indebtedness of the United States, and the Comptroller of the Currency has issued an order whereby that can now be increased to $100 for every $105 of bonds and certificates of indebtedness which he will furnish to the bank.

Then comes the limitation upon class 3. Class 3 provides for the discount of notes secured by shipping documents, warehouse receipts, and so forth, and the limitation placed upon this class of discounts is 25 per cent of the paid-in capital stock and surplus, provided that the amount of the existing values which is furnished as collateral shall be 110 per cent of the amount borrowed. As I construe this language, and I think I am right, with security of the kind last mentioned they can get 25 per cent of the paid-up capital stock and of the surplus, plus the 10 per cent provided for in the first portion of the section.

Mr. President, we have this situation before us then: When it comes to the discount of bills of exchange described in paragraph 1, or the discount of commercial and business paper described in paragraph 2, there is no limitation on the amount of money which the borrower, or the discounter, if I may use that term, can get, other than that which is provided by the limit in the amount of deposits. In other words, by discounting this kind of paper in classes 1 and 2 they can get the entire contents of the bank less the legal reserves.

It is said in answer to this that such has been the law for a good while, even under the national banking act; but I submit that the danger to our financial institutions consists in the great amount of borrowing by an individual borrower, and is not due to the borrowing by a multitude of borrowers. This adds to the inflation that is going on. The greater the credits that are extended the more the amount of inflation which we will have. It is not, in my judgment, going to assist any community in the United States for one man to be able to go to one bank and get this large amount of accommodation.

It is said that this measure is necessary in order to finance commercial transactions in certain sections of the country. Personally, I do not believe that is a correct statement of the situation, because there are many banks in every section, and it is not necessary to get all this money from one bank. If the borrower needs more capital, he can get part of it at one bank and part of it at another.

I have made this just as clear as I think language can express it. I am opposed to that kind of banking, and I believe that these limitations ought to be placed upon the amount which the borrower can get.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to just what the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] is trying to do. This bill is, in a few respects, new; it is largely the existing law. As to drafts which could be cashed, sight drafts, without being estimated as part of the 10 per cent of the capital stock loaned by the bank, the law already provides the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values. That has been the law all along. The business of the country has been done by drawing those sight drafts against existing values, and they have been cashed by the banks at which they are presented without estimating their amount as part of the 10 per cent of the capital of the bank. To the old law this bill adds language chiefly of explanation, making it clear, and indicating exactly to what it refers.

This practice has been followed for a long time. The business of this country has been conducted in that way. The movement of crops has been almost exclusively through drawing sight drafts with bills of lading attached, not always on a great city, but from a country town to the near-by distributing point. The producer puts his goods in the depot, gets his bill of lading, draws his sight draft on a city perhaps 100 miles off, and the small bank cashes that sight draft. The draft goes right on to the city, and the money goes in the central city to the credit of the country bank. It is really a cash transaction. The country banker or the smaller banker would not cash the draft unless he knew that the drawer was good. If he had any doubt, he would use the telegraph wire. It is simply a means of transferring money from the smaller bank to the bank more centrally located. It is really a cash transaction, and it has always been the law that such transactions are not regarded as loans to the party drawing the sight draft, and they have never been charged up as part of the 10 per cent of the capital stock that a bank could advance to one customer.

What does the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] propose to do? Suppose you amend the existing law by reducing the amount of such drafts to 25 per cent of the capital stock of the bank cashing them.

Section 2 is an old provision. Section 2 is nothing new. It provides for "the discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person, company, corporation, or firm negotiating the same." It has always been the law that a bank can discount paper of a person or corporation not limited to 10 per cent of the capital of the bank. That has been the national bank law, so far as I can recall, indefinitely during the past.

Now the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] proposes to amend that provision of the national bank law under which the business of this country has long been done, so far as I can recall, by reducing the amount that any one bank can carry of paper discounted in the bank to 25 per cent of its capital stock and surplus. Surely the Senate will not accept such a view, such a radical change of the national banking law of the country.

The third division, which is new, permits "the discount of notes secured by shipping documents, warehouse receipts, or other such documents conveying or securing title covering readily marketable nonperishable staples, including live stock, when the actual market value of the property securing the obligation is not at any time less than 110 per cent of the face amount of the notes secured by such documents and when such property is fully covered by insurance."

Later on in the bill it is provided that these advances of these discounted papers, with warehouse receipt attached, shall not be discounted beyond the amount of 25 per cent of the capital stock of the bank, and that 25 per cent must include all loans or advances to the person so discounting notes with warehouse certificates attached.

The bill was recommended by the Federal Reserve Board, it was approved by the Comptroller of the Currency, it was approved by the Banking and Currency Committee of the House, and passed the House. It has been recommended favorably by the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate. I hope the Senate will vote down the proposed amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I join in the opinion expressed by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] that the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] should not be agreed to. If I correctly construe that amendment, it will make the law more restrictive than it now is as to what we know as (1) and (2) classes of paper in the bill. Both those classes are now embraced in existing law.

I ask leave to have inserted in the RECORD at this point, in connection with my remarks, the act approved June 22, 1906, amending section 5200 of the Revised Statutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The act referred to is as follows:

[PUBLIC—No. 269.]

An act to amend section 5200, Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to national banks.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 5200 of the Revised Statutes of the United States be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 5200. The total liabilities to any association, of any person, or of any company, corporation, or firm for money borrowed, including in the liabilities of a company or firm the liabilities of the several members thereof, shall at no time exceed one-tenth part of the amount of the capital stock of such associations, actually paid in and unimpaired and one-tenth part of its unimpaired surplus fund: Provided, however, That the total of such liabilities shall in no event exceed 30 per cent of the capital stock of the association. But the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values, and the discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person negotiating the same shall not be considered as money borrowed."

Approved, June 22, 1906.

Mr. ROBINSON. The first paragraph, which is, as I have just stated, embraced in existing law, is amplified by the present bill. It is the belief of those responsible for the legislation that the existing law was intended to embrace the paper that is more definitely described in paragraph 1.

"The discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values" ordinarily would be considered, without this amendment, to include "drafts and bills of exchange secured by shipping documents conveying or securing title to goods shipped," and would also be construed to include "demand obligations when secured by documents covering commodities in actual process of shipment."

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. If the Senator will allow me, is it not true that that has been the construction and has been the practice for years past?

Mr. ROBINSON. Yes, and under the present ruling of the comptroller's office. As I understand it, however, it becomes necessary, if that practice is to continue, to make this amendment, so that the purpose of the bill in so far as paragraph 1 is concerned, "discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith against actually existing values," is to carry into effect the law as it is now written and as it has been heretofore construed.

With reference to (2), "the discount of commercial or business paper actually owned by the person, company, corporation, or firm negotiating the same," the only change that is proposed in the existing law is the addition of the words "company, corporation, or firm," which are added to "person." So there is no important change in that.

The amendment of the Senator from Ohio is intended to make the limitation in (3) applicable to (1) and (2); that is, he would change existing law and restrict the 25 per centum of the amount of the association's paid in and unimpaired capital stock and surplus, the amount that may be advanced or paid out on paper of the character described in (1) and (2), whereas the practice has been as to this class of paper to cash in whole, and it is absolutely necessary that that practice shall be continued or great difficulty will be experienced in financing the crops.

The Senator from Ohio made a statement as to the effect of his amendment in which I do not concur, and I ask the attention of the Senator from Georgia, who is more familiar with the matter than I am, to this phase of it. The Senator from Ohio said that the limitation of 25 per centum of the amount of the association's paid in and unimpaired capital stock and surplus, carried in lines 9 to 14 of the bill, is in addition to the limitation of 10 per cent. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio, if he feels disposed to address his thought to the statement he made a moment ago, how he reaches that conclusion. The language, to my mind, is so clear that it is not susceptible to that construction. The language is:

The liabilities upon notes secured in the manner described under (3) hereof, shall not at any time exceed 25 per centum of the amount of the association's paid-in and unimpaired capital stock and surplus.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. The clear meaning of this language, as it appears to me, is that the maximum amount of liability which may be incurred by any bank on that class of paper is 25 per cent, and not 35 per cent, as stated by the Senator from Ohio. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, I recognize the fact that this language is not quite as clear as it ought to be, but I think a lawyer of the ability of the Senator from Arkansas or the Senator from Georgia will agree with me that, under the canons of construction, we must give effect to all the language of a section if it is possible.

The Senator from Arkansas calls attention to the language, which reads as follows:

The liabilities upon notes secured in the manner described under (3) hereof, shall not at any time exceed 25 per centum of the amount of the association's paid-in and unimpaired capital stock and surplus.

Now, we turn to (3) and we find that that is a limitation upon the amount which can be borrowed or secured, by what? "The discount of notes secured by shipping documents," and so forth.

Mr. ROBINSON. No; the Senator——

Mr. POMERENE. Pardon me; let me finish my explanation, because we both want to be right about it. That is as I understand it. In other words, this means that the liability upon notes secured in the manner described shall not at any time exceed 25 per cent of the amount of the association's paid-in and unimpaired capital stock and surplus. But now, when we go back to the earlier part of that section, if Senators will follow me, they will find that in the proviso four classes of paper are mentioned for discount.

The first is the discount of bills of exchange drawn in good faith, and so forth; second, the discount of commercial or business paper, and so forth; third, the discount of notes secured by shipping documents, and so forth; fourth, the discount of any note or notes secured by not less than a like face amount of bonds or notes. Those four classes named are the subject of the verb on line 21, "shall not be considered as money borrowed within the meaning of this section." So we have in class (3) 25 per cent of the paid-up capital stock and surplus of the bank, and the draftsman of this measure says that shall not be included in the amounts which may be borrowed under this section.

The first part of the section reads:

The total liabilities to any association of any person or of any company, corporation, or firm for money borrowed, including in the liabilities of a company or firm the liabilities of the several members thereof, shall at no time exceed 10 per cent.

So we have in the first part of the section a provision authorizing the borrower to get 10 per cent of the paid-up capital stock and surplus, and then we provide for his getting accommodations in four other classes of paper and they are not included in the amount which may be borrowed, and these four classes shall not be considered as money borrowed within the meaning of this section.

I do not see how one can place any other construction upon it, if we are to give full force to the entire language. It, therefore, in my judgment, means 25 per cent of the paid-up capital and surplus if you borrow it on notes which you discount and which are secured by shipping documents or warehouse receipts, and in addition to that another 10 per cent.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, notwithstanding the statement of my friend, the Senator from Ohio, that he is unable to see how this section is susceptible of any other construction than that which he has placed upon it, I nevertheless believe that I can make it entirely clear that the construction which he has placed upon it is erroneous. If the Senator and other Senators interested will follow me for a moment I will attempt to do that. The language of that portion of the act relating to the limitation of 10 per cent of the paid-up capital stock and surplus fund is as follows:

The total liabilities to any association of any person or of any company, corporation, or firm for money borrowed, including in the liabilities of a company or firm the liabilities of the several members thereof, shall at no time exceed 10 per cent of the amount of the capital stock of such association.

And so forth.

That relates to money borrowed.

The limitation of 10 per cent applies only to money borrowed. The language of 1, 2, 3, and 4 contained in the bill is that paper of the character described in each one of them shall not be considered as money borrowed. Therefore the limitation of 10 per cent shall not apply to any one of the four, and if it were not for the limitation of 25 per cent in line 9 there would be no limitation in the bill on the amount that might be paid out under (3). So the limitation of 25 per cent, applying to paper which shall not be considered as constituting a loan, is the total amount that may be advanced as to that class of paper. The limitation of 10 per cent applies only to money borrowed, and the act we are seeking to pass expressly declares that paper of the character described in (3) shall not be money borrowed. Therefore it is equivalent to saying that the limitation of 10 per cent shall not apply to that at all. So there is no limitation of the amount except that contained in line 9, which is 25 per cent.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. POMERENE. Assume for the sake of the argument that I go to a bank on my individual note without any collateral whatsoever. I succeed in borrowing 10 per cent of the paid-in capital and surplus. That would be my limit of credit under the first paragraph of the bill. But suppose that later on, after I have borrowed that 10 per cent, I go to the bank with other notes, and I have them secured by shipping documents, warehouse receipts, and so forth, could I not, under the provisions of this bill, get 25 per cent more?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator's first loan became a liability on his part to the bank, did it not?

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; if I give my note it is a liability.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator says he first goes and borrows 10 per cent. He then goes to the bank with his warehouse receipt. Now, let us see what the bill says about that.

Mr. POMERENE. I am going to the bank with other notes now.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator is going to the bank with other notes and with his warehouse receipt.

Mr. POMERENE. Yes; that is right.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Now, what does the bill say? It reads:

The total liabilities to any association of any person or of any company, corporation, or firm for money borrowed, including the liabilities upon notes secured in the manner described under (3) hereof, shall not at any time exceed 25 per cent.

If the Senator's first loan was a part of his liability, then the bill provides that his total liability, that which he first borrowed and that which he borrowed on his warehouse receipt, shall not, as a total liability, exceed 25 per cent. If he borrowed on the first note 10 per cent, he can borrow but 15 per cent the next time on his warehouse receipt.

Mr. POMERENE. With all due respect to the great legal ability of my friend from Georgia——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I do not think it requires any legal ability to see that; it is plain language.

Mr. POMERENE. The bill which the Senator is discussing is not the bill which is now before the Senate.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I read exactly the language of the bill.

Mr. POMERENE. I know that; but if language means anything, I will undertake to get a loan up to 35 per cent, if I can get some bank to trust me to that extent.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator from Ohio will look at the language last quoted by the Senator from Georgia, he will see that my statement that 25 per cent is the maximum that may be advanced under subdivision (3) is correct. The language is:

The total liabilities to any association of any person or of any company, corporation, or firm for money borrowed, including the liabilities upon notes secured in the manner described under (3) hereof—

It does not mean excluding; it says "including"— shall not at any time exceed 25 per cent of the amount of the association's paid-in and unimpaired capital stock and surplus.

That is saying, just as plainly as language can express it, that no person upon such notes, including the notes described in section 3, can borrow more than 25 per cent of the paid-up capital stock and surplus of a bank. I rest the case with the language of the bill itself, which I think is as clear as language can make it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. Do I understand the Senator from Arkansas to say, although subdivision 3 is expressly mentioned as being included, that it would also include subdivisions 1 and 2?

Mr. ROBINSON. The language is:

The total liabilities to any association of any person or of any company, corporation, or firm for money borrowed, including the liabilities upon notes secured in the manner described under (3) hereof, shall not at any time exceed 25 per centum——

Mr. LENROOT. But that limitation would not apply to subdivisions 1 and 2?

Mr. ROBINSON. No; certainly not.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if we are going to vote upon this bill to-night, I wish to say a few words. I did intend to speak at some length upon the bill, but I shall not do so if it is possible to get a vote to-night.

I merely wish to say, Mr. President, that my experience as a banker tells me that this is an unwise bill to pass. There is no question if the bill is to relieve the situation in this country in order to do so it must further inflate our currency. That is the only way in which it can possibly benefit any person, association, or corporation.

I agree with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], that under subdivisions 3 and 4 the total liabilities can not exceed 25 per cent. That includes the 10 per cent a person may borrow referred to by the Senator from Ohio before he goes to the bank to borrow more money on a warehouse certificate. The total liability can not exceed 25 per cent of the amount of the association's paid-in and unimpaired capital and surplus. That is 150 per cent more than the law allows to-day. I recognize the fact that there are a few States in the Union that allow to individuals and corporations or associations loans up to 25 per cent of the capital stock and unimpaired surplus of banking institutions, but I have never considered that to be safe banking.

A banking institution ought to be operated for the purpose of assisting the business interests of the community in which the bank is located and its customers who may be located outside of the immediate district; in other words, to take care of all of its depositors and those who do business with it. Bankers in the past have agreed that 10 per cent should be the limit of loans to individuals or associations. There are some States, such as my own State, that have allowed as high as 15 per cent in the case of State banks; but I now predict that the safe banker in the United States is not going to take advantage of this bill in increasing individual loans, for he will know from past experience that it is unwise to undertake to put such a great percentage of his business in one channel.

Now, as to subdivisions 1 and 2 of section 1 of the bill, there is no question that they were unlimited until the amendment was agreed to this morning in subdivision 2. So far as subdivision 1 is concerned, it is now unlimited. So far as subdivision 2 is concerned, with the amendment that was adopted this morning limiting——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Allow me to correct the Senator from Utah. The amendment was not in subdivision 2, but in the last clause of subdivision 1, referring to section 13 of the Federal reserve act.

Mr. SMOOT. In the last clause of section 1. I stand corrected. It refers to section 13 of the Federal reserve act, and that falls within paragraph 1. So there is a limitation of 100 per cent. That limitation is a safeguard; but where is the banker who is going to lend 100 per cent——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Just a moment—without knowing beforehand that there is only one place where he can go and get the money to use if he is forced to before the collection is made, and that one place is the Federal Reserve Board here at Washington. That is how the inflation of currency is going to take place if this bill is made use of in general trade.

Mr. POMERENE. May I suggest——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. POMERENE. May I suggest to the Senator that 100 per cent is 100 per cent of the capital, surplus, and deposits, less the legal reserve.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand that, and I know that should not be so; but there is one safeguard about it, namely, that this whole matter will be under the direct supervision of the Federal Reserve Board. It is so late now that I am not going to say any more in relation to the bill——

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. SMOOT. In just a moment I will yield. I hope that the bill, if it is enacted into law, will be the means of helping a certain section of the country in handling a product the value of which runs into the hundreds of millions of dollars, and a section of the country where the banking facilities are not so great as they are in other sections. I hope there may be some good come from it, and I hope that no evil will come from its enactment, but I do know that the door will be left wide open for a lot of trouble when the bill passes if wisdom is not used in granting credits and purchasing paper.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. In connection with what the Senator has just said, in Memphis, where I live, the largest banks are State banks. One of them was a national bank, but had to give up its charter and become a State bank in order to care for the business that naturally came to it. It never made a great success until it relinquished its Federal charter, because under the law limiting it to 10 per cent it could not take care of the big customers that came to it. The State banks have been the most successful in the city, and there is not a thing in the world that is dangerous in connection with their business as it is being conducted. They have tremendous deposits; they have large surpluses, and their banking business is of a most successful character. They are able by reason of the larger limit given them by the State laws to get the big customers that naturally come to banks that can handle their business. For that reason it seems to me that there is no danger. The records of these banks show distinctly that there can be no danger.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that there are bankers in this country who, if there were not a single line of law, if no restriction were laid upon them by the law, because of the experience they have had, certainly would not go so far as this bill, if it becomes a law, will allow them to go. I will say to the Senator frankly that I would not do so. If I were the president of any bank in the United States, I would not go so far as this bill would allow me to go along certain lines.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I realize that what the Senator says is correct in a very large measure, but there are certain seasons in the year, especially when cotton is being gathered and shipped and sent to the presses, when it is absolutely impossible for a national bank to do the business because of the limitations upon it.

Mr. SMOOT. I recognized that fact, as the Senator knows, when I referred to the handling of a product in a certain section. I did not use the word "cotton," but every Senator knew that I meant the crop of cotton and the Southern States when I referred to a section of the country where the banking facilities are not so great as they are in other sections. I recognize there are just as good banks in the South, according to their size, as there are any place in the world; but I recognize also that in the South, as in the West, as in the East, as in the North, and as in every country there are banks managed by men who are not so careful as they should be when handling other people's funds.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Is not the Senator also familiar with the fact that it has been the practice for years to draw sight drafts with bill of lading attached and for the banks to cash such sight drafts without estimating them as a part of the 10 per cent of their capital and considering them as a loan?

Mr. SMOOT. That has been the practice in the past.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The provisions of the first part of the first paragraph allow a draft to be drawn against actually existing values, and this has long been the law. Has not the practice under the law now of force extended to all the provisions covered by the added language?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that I know of banks that have taken no consideration of the amount they have issued on bills of exchange drawn upon manufacturers or other banks or institutions. The practice in the case of many of the banks has been, just as soon as a draft is drawn to credit the amount of the draft, the same as though it had been that much money. I know of two or three cases in the West where small banks have almost been ruined by that practice.

I have known of drafts drawn by such banks for, say, $35,000; and I remember once of a bank, whose entire capital stock was $50,000 and whose deposits were not very large, accepting such a draft for a trainload of cattle, and the man who presented the draft was credited with the amount of the draft the same as if it had been actual money; but when the draft was presented to the parties upon whom it was drawn they refused to pay the draft. The little bank was up against it. It was impossible for it to meet the $35,000 without going out and borrowing the money.

It is just because of that class of cases, Mr. President, that I hesitate to open the door and allow greater latitude to a bank to make an obligation upon its own resources and the deposits that belong to the people. As I say, however, in this bill there is one check upon it, and that is that it is under the direction of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah a question, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. KELLOGG. Was this bill recommended by the Committee on Banking and Currency?

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I understand that a majority of the Committee on Banking and Currency agreed to the bill.

Mr. KELLOGG. Was it a unanimous report?

Mr. SMOOT. It was not unanimous.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator? I am not aware that there was any committee hearing on this bill, or that it was considered by the committee. I understand—although I know now that the chairman of the committee is supporting the bill—that in the absence of the chairman of the committee it was reported by the ranking member, and that certain members of the committee were polled. I am a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency. I was not polled on this bill.

I have no objection to accommodations being extended through these various banks for a particular line of credit; but we have jealously guarded the conservative policy of the Federal Reserve Banking System, and this more or less breaks down those safeguards. I have not been opposed to it, but I believe it should be carefully considered by the full committee as a question of banking policy. I do not wish to oppose the bill, but I think the committee should carefully consider the bill, because it involves a change in the conservative policy of the Federal Reserve System. I think the bill should be recommitted, and that the committee should reconsider it carefully in session.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. POMERENE addressed the Chair.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I thought I had the floor.

Mr. SMOOT. A question was asked me. I did not ask the Senator to yield, and, of course, I do not want to interfere with the Senator at all.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator wishes to interrupt, I have no objection.

Mr. POMERENE. I simply rose to answer, in part, the question which was asked by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG].

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection.

Mr. POMERENE. The Senator from Minnesota asked whether or not this bill was considered by the committee. The clerk of the committee called upon me at my office with a copy of the bill to take a poll. It was at a time when I was engaged in the hearings in the Interstate Commerce subcommittee on railroads, and I said to the clerk that I was opposed to the bill. What other hearings there were I can not say.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, may I ask a question of the Senator in charge of the bill? I should like to know if he expects to finish the consideration of the bill to-night. If not, could we not adjourn now? It is nearly 6 o'clock.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think so.

Mr. CURTIS. That is, the Senator thinks we could adjourn now?

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I think so; yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The Senator from North Carolina has the floor.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have just suggested to the Senator from Georgia that I thought it was advisable to let this matter go over until to-morrow. I shall be glad if he will do so, and I shall submit the remarks I desire to make on the bill at that time.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, September 16, 1919, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, September 15, 1919.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. William Couden, late chaplain of the Second Division, American Forces in Germany, offered the following prayer:

Our Father which art in Heaven, grant to all men the consolations of Thy truth and the inspirations of Thy gospel. Bless our nation and all righteous governments, and bring them all into relations of permanent peace and amity through the impulses of the spirit.

May we who are gathered here walk with Thee throughout this day, as in that ancient time Enoch walked with God. Forgive the meagre offering of our hands; but accept us for our desire and intent to serve Thee, and justify us by our faith in Thy truth and love. Through Jesus Christ our Lord, amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, September 13, 1919, was read and approved.

UNITED CONFEDERATE VETERANS' CONVENTION, ATLANTA, GA.

Mr. WISE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 95, authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the city of Atlanta, Ga., tents, cots, horses, and saddle equipments for the use of United Confederate Veterans in their convention from October 7 to 10, 1919.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a Senate resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the joint resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to loan, in his discretion, under such rules and regulations, including a cash deposit, should the Secretary deem such necessary, as the Secretary may prescribe, to the reunion executive committee of Atlanta, for the use of the United Confederate Veterans, in their encampment to be held in Atlanta from October 7 to October 10, 1919, such tents, cots, blankets, and other camp equipment as the Secretary of War, in his discretion, deems sufficient for the purpose of the encampment: Provided, That no expense shall be caused the United States Government by delivery and return of said property, the same to be delivered to said committee at such time prior to the holding of said encampment as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of War and the chairman and treasurer of said committee: Provided further, That the Secretary of War, before delivering said cots, tents, blankets, and other camp equipment to the committee, shall take from the chairman and treasurer of said reunion executive committee of Atlanta a bond with good and sufficient security for the safe return of said property in good order and condition, the same to be without expense to the United States Government.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

By unanimous consent the title was amended to conform to the text.

RATIFICATION OF WOMAN-SUFFRAGE AMENDMENT BY NEW HAMPSHIRE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the secretary of state of the State of New Hampshire announcing the ratification by the legislature of that State of the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States extending the right of suffrage to women.

THE FLAG.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, a question of privilege. What has gone with the flag that usually hangs above your head?

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands it has been taken down to be repaired.

UNANIMOUS-CONSENT DAY.

The SPEAKER. To-day is unanimous-consent day. The Chair thinks it is but fair to the House that he should state that, after some time, which will depend upon the progress made in the consideration of requests for unanimous consent, the Chair will recognize Members for suspensions of the rules. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent.

REPORT ON SUGAR BY FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION.

The first business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was House resolution 150, directing the Federal Trade Commission to investigate and report to the House certain information regarding sugar.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Federal Trade Commission is hereby directed to make an immediate investigation and report to the House of Representatives its findings on the subject of sugar used for domestic and manufacturing purposes, both as to its market price, wholesale and retail, and whether these prices are reasonable; and the amount of sugar now in the United States, both raw and refined, in the possession of sugar refiners, wholesale dealers, or in storage; said investigation to involve a report of supplies in the possessions of the United States, raw and refined, and the causes of the present sugar scarcity.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. ANDERSON. Reserving the right to object, I was under the impression that this joint resolution was objected to on last unanimous-consent day and stricken from the calendar.

Mr. TINKHAM. It was objected to, but was allowed to remain on the calendar.

Mr. ANDERSON. Ought it not to have gone to the foot of the calendar in that case?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that unanimous consent was given that it should retain its place on the calendar. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. MONDELL. Reserving the right to object, I think the House has been sufficiently informed with regard to these matters to know that under the law the House alone can not properly order these investigations. In view of the provisions of the law requiring action by both Houses to authorize investigations by the Federal Trade Commission, I had hoped gentlemen would not present these matters in the form of House resolutions. Let us have these inquiries presented in a way that will surely get the facts. I know the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] wants the facts.

Mr. TINKHAM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. TINKHAM. About a month ago, with the consent and cooperation of the honorable Representative from Wyoming, an order very similar to this was passed, asking the Federal Trade Commission to report the same character of information in regard to shoes which is now desired in regard to sugar.

Mr. MONDELL. Yes; and attention was then called to the fact that under the law the House, acting alone, has no authority to order the Federal Trade Commission to make these investigations. Of course, we hoped that, having been notified and informed with regard to that provision of law, gentlemen would in future follow the provisions of the law in making these requests. I know the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] has been most earnest and persistent in this matter, but I doubt if we can get the facts in this way.

Mr. TINKHAM. Will the honorable Representative yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. TINKHAM. Is not the law made from day to day by this House? Does not that supersede any law that may have been made by any previous Congress, and will not any request upon the Federal Trade Commission by the House be courteously answered, and does not the honorable Representative realize that this question——

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will allow me to answer his question and not go into a discussion of the proposition, the gentleman from Massachusetts, of course, knows that the House acting alone can not change a law which has been passed by both Houses and signed by the President. Of course, the gentleman understands that.

Mr. TINKHAM. Does anything forbid the Federal Trade Commission to do this?

Mr. MONDELL. My understanding is that under the law the Federal Trade Commission is not authorized to make investigations except at the request or on the order of the Congress.

Mr. TINKHAM. Does the law forbid the Federal Trade Commission to make an investigation of this character?

Mr. MONDELL. It provides that they shall do it at the request of the Congress, and that is definite and specific. Of course, the Federal Trade Commission would neither have the authority to spend money nor be obligated by a request on the part of the House acting alone for an investigation of this character.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, may I ask the gentleman from Wyoming a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. My recollection is that when the Igoe resolution was under consideration the very fact which is now stated was suggested, and it was determined to pass the resolution in the form of a request to the board to make the investigation.

Mr. MONDELL. The House good-naturedly allowed that to go through. Many Members had not had their attention called then to the provision of the law, but everyone was on notice thereafter as to the provision of the law in this regard, and we ought to follow the law.

The House of Representatives ought to proceed in accordance with the law. If the House had been disposed to have the Federal Trade Commission enter upon inquiries and investigations at the request of one House only, I assume that the House would have been able to have had its way in that matter in the enactment of the law, but evidently the gentlemen at both ends of the Capitol thought in view of the very important activities of the Federal Trade Commission they should not have the unusual and extraordinary burdens placed upon them without the action of the Congress.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I asked the gentleman a question in view of what I had heard in regard to it.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, we are insisting on assuming to instruct the Federal Trade Commission which, under the law we passed, this House has no authority to do.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I beg the gentleman to consider that this is a most meritorious matter, and I think the Federal Trade Commission will respond to the resolution.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the measure is very meritorious, but this is also true of the Federal Trade Commission; it has full authority to report on every matter referred to in this resolution. It could do it without any request on the part of Congress. I have no doubt that in the ordinary course of business it does make certain inquiry along these lines, but Congress deliberately provided, when the Federal Trade Commission was constituted, that it was to have placed upon it no unusual burden, no unusual inquiry or investigations unless requested by the Congress, and I think the House should act in accordance with the law as it was placed on the statute books. My recollection is that one of the members of the Federal Trade Commission, in a hearing before the Appropriations Committee a few days ago, called attention to the limitation of the authority of the commission, and that the Federal Trade Commission had no authority to carry on an investigation unless requested by the Congress. That is all I have to say. I shall not object. I have simply said what I have to call attention to the fact that we are constantly ignoring the law in making these requests, and that we embarrass the Trade Commission in making a request they have no authority to comply with.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is the gentleman objecting?

Mr. MONDELL. I have not objected and shall not. I know we want all the information we can get in regard to sugar, but I fear we will not get it this way.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, after listening to the statement of the gentleman from Wyoming, who, I think, has stated the facts as they are, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 8624) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel," approved August 10, 1917, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

PRESENT AND FUTURE SUPPLY OF TIE TIMBER.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the House resolution 186, requesting the Interstate Commerce Commission to make an investigation regarding the present and future supply of tie timber.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Reserving the right to object, who is in charge of this resolution?

Mr. DYER. I have charge of it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What is the purpose of the resolution?

Mr. DYER. The object of this resolution is to ascertain what the present supply of tie timber is in the United States with reference to its needs, and whether or not there are available any other materials for railroad ties which can be had.

I will say to my colleague that at the hearings had before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, from which committee this resolution was reported unanimously, the Forester of the Department of Agriculture stated that at the present time the country is producing only one-third of the amount of timber that is now needed for ties and now being consumed; in other words, the consumption is two-thirds greater than the production, and something must be done in some way to provide for the shortage. This only authorizes the Interstate Commerce Commission to make an inquiry touching the matter which will not require much time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does not the gentleman think that the men engaged in the tie business would give the information without any investigation?

Mr. DYER. We had before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce the officers of the Department of Agriculture, the assistant forester, who gave the facts and figures in the hearings touching the amount of timber available now and that which is being consumed. We had before the committee the officials of the railroad companies, those having charge of construction work, and they stated the needs of the railroads with reference to ties at the present time. Practically every railroad in the country is in a bad condition on account of the condition of the ties and not being able to obtain, so they state, sufficient ties to make the roads safe. They say they are trying to find some method to meet this situation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The gentleman stated a minute ago that there was an effort to find new material to make ties of. Under this new process of doctoring wood I have understood that cottonwood or anything of that sort would make as good a tie as the old-fashioned white-oak tie.

Mr. DYER. There was testimony in the hearings touching that, and I think it was stated that there has been some use made of that, and that there has been a process of doctoring them up and making them last longer, and also some testimony to show that some of the railroads—the Chicago & Alton and some in Pennsylvania—have made an effort to find a substitute. They have experimented upon other materials, particularly steel, and this is merely to have the Interstate Commerce Commission investigate. One ground is not only the necessity for something to preserve the forests of the country, which are being depleted, but also as a matter of safety. Wooden ties in bad condition cause many wrecks and loss of life. If something can be found to make a railroad safer in this respect, it comes under the safety provisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission, authorizing that commission to make an investigation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How much is this investigation going to cost?

Mr. DYER. I doubt if it will cost anything. There is a fund now available to the Interstate Commerce Commission under the safety section for investigating devices and things pertaining to the safety of railroad travel, and that same section of the Interstate Commerce Commission could make this investigation. They have funds available. They have not stated to anybody, so far as I know, that they would require any additional funds to make this investigation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Did the committee take into consideration the fact that white oak, which it is universally conceded makes the best ties, had been used heretofore principally to make whisky barrels, and that the whisky-barrel business was now busted and that white oak might go into ties?

Mr. DYER. That matter was not brought out, I will say to the gentleman.

Mr. KING. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. KING. Does the gentleman know whether one Charles Lathrop Pack will be employed in the investigation of the proposition?

Mr. DYER. I never heard of the gentleman.

Mr. KING. He is the gentleman who conducted the war-garden commission and is now in the forestry business.

Mr. DYER. No; he had nothing to do with this.

Mr. KING. Did he testify before the committee?

Mr. DYER. He did not. I never heard of the gentleman.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, let me ask if in these hearings the amount of timber in the forest reserves of the United States, available for tie timber, was discussed?

Mr. DYER. We discussed all of the timber that was available in the United States, and the condition of the forests generally, and the Assistant Forester, Mr. E. H. Clapp, appeared before the committee and gave a very thorough analysis of the forestry situation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do not wish to object, nor will I object to any inquiry that the commission might make; but if it makes a fair report it will come to about the following conclusion: The United States reserves and holds from use its timber in forest reserves, including tie timber. Taxes are increasing upon the outside timber and many of the holders of private timber are liquidating; that is to say, getting out from under. They, many of them, are cutting timber into ties that never should be cut into ties, thereby reducing the quantity of larger timber to be available in the future. I think any investigation that is made will be a useless procedure. The amount of timber owned by the Government and privately owned is well known. An investigation is likely to develop the well-known fact that a shortage of ties to railroads, particularly in the East, is partly due to increased railroad rates on ties from a distance. In the great State of Washington and in Oregon and in Idaho, the great timber section, there is timber, quantities of it, billions upon billions of feet, rotting for want of use—all locked up in forest reserves. Yet we propose to investigate the matter to see whether there is a shortage of tie timber?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, did the gentleman observe closely the strictures made by the gentleman from Wyoming regarding House resolution 150, directing the Federal Trade Commission to investigate respecting sugar, which was just objected to, to the effect that the House can not require the Federal Trade Commission to act in the circumstances? What is the distinction between this resolution and the one just objected to in respect to the point made by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]?

Mr. DYER. I am not acquainted with the matter to which the gentleman referred; but the request here is that the Interstate Commerce Commission do this. That commission makes investigations of this kind.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming made the statement about resolution 150 that the House can not require the Federal Trade Commission to make a report to the House upon sugar. Does this resolution, as was the case with the one just objected to, involve the question of interstate commerce or combinations or antitrust laws?

Mr. DYER. No. Nothing of that kind. It merely asks the Interstate Commerce Commission to make an investigation and advise the House as to the present and future supply of tie timber, as to the best and most practical methods of meeting the present and future demands of such supply, the extent and practicability of the use of substitutes of metal, concrete, or other material, and the relative cost of ties made of such materials as compared with those made of wood.

Mr. RAKER. Has the gentleman any doubt that the House has the right to call on the Federal Trade Commission as was done by House resolution 150?

Mr. DYER. I have none, I will say; but I do not pretend to be a great lawyer.

Mr. RAKER. I do not understand the strictures of the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] a moment ago on the other House resolution which required the Federal Trade Commission to make a report on sugar.

Mr. DYER. I think the commissions created by this Congress are authorized, and should be under the law, to give to the Congress information from time to time.

Mr. RAKER. I hope this resolution will pass, and I am sorry that the resolution just objected to, House resolution 150, was objected to on the ground that the House has no authority to ask the Federal Trade Commission for this information. Now, we come to a resolution of this kind and there is no objection to this, apparently.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LANKFORD. Mr. Speaker, I object to the consideration of the resolution.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard, and the Clerk will report the next business.

CAMP A. A. HUMPHREYS, VA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was House joint resolution 161, authorizing the Secretary of War to expend certain sums appropriated for the support of the Army for the fiscal years ending June 30, 1919, and June 30, 1920, at Camp A. A. Humphreys, Va.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this resolution seems to carry a good deal of money, and I think there ought to be some sort of an explanation.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to state to the House that joint resolution 161 carries approximately $500,000 with which to perform some work at Camp A. A. Humphreys, Va.

It is of a rather temporary character. The Committee on Military Affairs did not feel it was necessary to use as much money as the sum specified in resolution No. 161. A subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs recently visited Camp A. A. Humphreys, and that committee recommended that $116,000 be expended in lieu of the half million dollars provided for by this resolution, and at the proper time, if unanimous consent is given, I shall move to strike out or shall move to substitute another resolution which the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] introduced on the 12th instant, which provides for $116,000 instead of the amount carried in the original resolution. The nine members of the Subcommittee on Military Affairs who visited Camp A. A. Humphreys came to the conclusion that to conserve property which is already in the course of construction that latter amount ought to be expended at this time.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ANDERSON. I will yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. If we make this initial expenditure now, does that mean that we must make the entire expenditure called for by the War Department for the improvement of this plant there?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no. Of course the very purpose of coming to Congress and asking for this expenditure of money is to enable the War Department to make some repairs and continue some improvements which were in progress when the amendment to the Army appropriation bill stopping all new construction and purchase of land was adopted by Congress.

Mr. SNELL. What I am afraid of is that if we start in with this appropriation that next year they may come in here and in a little while try to spend the whole $32,000,000 estimated for the improvement of these grounds.

Mr. KAHN. This has nothing to do with the establishment of a permanent military engineer school at this point. The committee was careful to see to it that it was not a case of the camel getting his nose under the tent.

Mr. SNELL. This provides for something between $500,000 and $600,000.

Mr. KAHN. No; the original——

Mr. SNELL. The original estimate calls for that.

Mr. KAHN. Yes. The subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs who went to Camp A. A. Humphreys came to the conclusion that they could get along with $116,000 in lieu of the $500,000.

Mr. SNELL. Well, the first time they came before the Rules Committee they said it was absolutely necessary to have that amount; that they could not get along with anything less; and now they come in and say they can cut it to $116,000. If by making one visit——

Mr. KAHN. Oh, at that time the members of the Committee on Military Affairs had not visited the camp.

Mr. SNELL. I am pleased that they made that one visit, because that saves the Government something like $400,000.

Mr. KAHN. Now, the gentleman from Kansas, who is very careful and conscientious, is chairman of the subcommittee which made that visit. He went over the ground very carefully, and he stated to his colleagues on the committee that he was satisfied that this money should be expended so as to make the place habitable this winter. There are many bungalows which have been put up for officers' quarters. They have no roof on and they have to be roofed. There is no heating apparatus, and they are to be occupied this winter.

Mr. SNELL. It is not the intent of the Committee on Military Affairs to make this a permanent camp?

Mr. KAHN. No.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not know that I exactly understand the purpose of the gentleman from California with reference to the substitute resolution.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. ANTHONY introduced House joint resolution 208 on Friday afternoon, I think, which provides for the expenditure of $116,000 in lieu of the $500,000 originally provided in this pending resolution.

Mr. ANDERSON. If the gentleman will permit, does the new resolution the gentleman proposes to offer as a substitute eliminate all the items in section 2?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. And practically all the elements in section 1, and reduces it to $116,000?

Mr. KAHN. Exactly.

Mr. ANDERSON. So the RECORD will show what has happened?

Mr. KAHN. The resolution itself will appear in the RECORD.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. FESS. Is the resolution now proposed the same as it was before the Committee on Rules?

Mr. KAHN. No; it eliminates a great many items which were in the original resolution and carries $116,000 instead of the aggregate of money of over $500,000.

Mr. FESS. The elements which were objectionable——

Mr. KAHN. Are eliminated.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. HASTINGS. How is the $116,000 to be used? Is it intended that any additional land shall be purchased with this money?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no; the land belongs to the Government already, and some of it has belonged to the Government since, I think, 1904. This is to complete some construction that has been going on at Camp A. A. Humphreys.

Mr. HASTINGS. It is not for the purpose of buying any additional land?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no.

Mr. RUCKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. RUCKER. The resolution which was introduced by the gentleman which calls for some $500,000 was introduced upon the request, I take it, of the War Department?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. They drew it and their officers and engineers have viewed the situation and are thoroughly familiar with it?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. RUCKER. And stated that $500,000 was needed?

Mr. KAHN. Exactly.

Mr. RUCKER. And subsequently the Committee on Military Affairs visited the place—nonexperts—and they think that $116,000 is proper, and the chairman is disposed to recognize the recommendation of that subcommittee?

Mr. KAHN. I have every confidence in my colleagues on the committee.

Mr. RUCKER. It is the purpose of the committee to do by piecemeal what the gentlemen sought to do originally in one resolution?

Mr. KAHN. We can not do it by piecemeal.

Mr. RUCKER. Could not another resolution be offered?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; Camp Humphreys is rather near Washington. You can go over there in about an hour and a half, and the members propose to visit these various military posts. Heretofore the attention of the Committee on Military Affairs has never been given to that proposition. But it seems to be the desire of the members of the committee to keep themselves informed as to the military posts.

Mr. RUCKER. I understand, then, it is not the purpose of the gentleman or of his committee, so far as he knows, to introduce other resolutions in reference to the items he is now striking out?

Mr. KAHN. It certainly is not.

Mr. RUCKER. I want to commend the subcommittee for visiting Camp Humphreys, for it is money well spent, and I think it would be well for the gentlemen to go to many places to curb the War Department in its desire to acquire property, which will bankrupt this Nation if it is not stopped.

Mr. KAHN. I thank the gentleman from Missouri, and I want to tell him that we have appointed a subcommittee of nine Members who will visit in the near future all the camps and cantonments that were involved in the legislation passed by the House last July in the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. RUCKER. Not with the hope of forestalling the work of that committee, I will say that I hope they will not recommend $116,000 at those other places.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. BEGG. The question I would like to ask is, If I understood the gentleman correctly, he said that most of this money was to complete construction that was started—of bungalows, and so forth—for officers' quarters?

Mr. KAHN. Exactly; quarters for officers who are teachers over there in the Engineers' school.

Mr. BEGG. Now, I should like to ask the gentleman another question. We had a good many camps in this country practically fully completed, did we not?

Mr. KAHN. We had 16 camps and cantonments.

Mr. BEGG. At Camp Sherman, I think we have a very creditable and well-equipped camp. Would it be impossible for the War Department to use some of these camps without even expending $116,000?

Mr. KAHN. I believe those camps are now being used, or have been used, for the demobilization of the troops. In other words, when the boys have been brought from France they are first sent to some debarkation camp near New York City, and then sent to these cantonments that the gentleman speaks of for final discharge.

Mr. BEGG. And the majority of them are discharged now?

Mr. KAHN. There are still about half a million men to be discharged.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman make the statement that there is no room in buildings already equipped in cantonments to do this work that is asked to be done and house the officers that are asked to be housed at Camp Humphreys? Is that a fact?

Mr. KAHN. I do not think it is possible to do this work at any other place. I could go into an explanation of that.

Mr. BEGG. That is not necessary. The gentleman's word is satisfactory to me.

Mr. KAHN. The engineers, of course, have to be taught how to build wharves and bridges, including pontoon bridges, and all work of that kind. The land at Belvoir is absolutely suited to that kind of work, and it would not be suitable in most of the other places.

Mr. HAMILTON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question. How many acres of land does the Government own at Camp A. A. Humphreys?

Mr. KAHN. I think something like 9,000 acres.

Mr. HAMILTON. I suppose the Government owns large areas of land elsewhere. What, if the gentleman knows, is to be the policy of the Government with reference to this land, the title to which it has acquired?

Mr. KAHN. Well, of course, that is a very large proposition. The Committee on Military Affairs became somewhat impatient over the purchase, or reported purchase, or intention to purchase, additional lands. We thought the Government had all the land for military purposes that it might require. And, if the gentleman recalls, when the Army appropriation bill was passed by Congress a provision was put in prohibiting the further purchase of land and also prohibiting the completion of any improvements that were in progress at the camps and cantonments. That immediately stopped further construction at Camp A. A. Humphreys. Now, the subcommittee that went down there feels satisfied that these quarters for officers who are teachers there ought to be at least completed to the extent of putting on roofs, finishing the interiors, putting in heating apparatus, and things of that sort. That is as far as the legislation will go.

Mr. HAMILTON. That phase of the situation is not what is troubling me. I was thinking of the larger question, of what is proposed to be done with this immense area of land.

Mr. KAHN. We have asked for information from the War Department on that very proposition, and we are still awaiting a final answer.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Was this camp in existence before the breaking out of the war, or before we entered it?

Mr. KAHN. I understand the military were in possession of that land and had some kind of buildings over there.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Will the gentleman say what is being done over there at this time?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; I can say what is being done there at this time. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEARNS], says that there was no construction over there before the war.

Mr. KEARNS. And only part of the land was owned, too.

Mr. KAHN. Yes. Belvoir, if you remember, was owned by the Government for some years. It was the intention on the part of Congress to put up the District of Columbia workhouse on that land. The ladies of the Mount Vernon Association—Mount Vernon adjoining Belvoir—filed protests against the construction of the workhouse at that place, and then Congress decided to build it elsewhere. But the land remained in the possession of the Government.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. But it was not purchased for military purposes?

Mr. KAHN. No; and in the meantime, when the war broke out, additional land was purchased. The United States Engineer School has been at the Washington Barracks here, in the District of Columbia, for many years. It was found that those buildings down there were inadequate during the war for the larger activities of the Engineer Department. Many of the buildings, as I understand it, are used now for storehouses. Of course, the officers' quarters are still in use. But, at any rate, the Engineer school claimed that they were crowded out of an area at the Washington Barracks, and they began to construct a temporary camp at Camp A. A. Humphreys. They had about 20,000 troops down there in training as Engineers. They had intrenchments and gas retorts, and the Engineer troops were taught everything that was necessary to enable them to fight in this war. It was impossible to do that at the Washington Barracks, and so these new buildings, temporary in character, were constructed at Camp A. A. Humphreys.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. The war is over now.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. And what is the necessity of continuing this improvement down there?

Mr. KAHN. Well, there are some 300 students in the Army in the Engineer Corps, many of them graduates from West Point.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think there are 110 students, according to my information.

Mr. KAHN. One hundred and ten. They were all, I think, members of certain classes of West Point who were graduated ahead of time by reason of the war. Then, the war being over, they were sent back to school to finish their education. They are now at Camp A. A. Humphreys, there being no place for them at Washington Barracks, as I understand it.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. That is all that we have there at this time—110 students?

Mr. KAHN. I am informed there are 280 students in all.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. That is all we have down there?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. During the progress of the war we had down there not only a great many officers in the Engineer school but many thousands of troops?

Mr. KAHN. Yes. They were in training.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I say they were in training. There were a great many down there, were there not?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; 20,000 in tents, and so on.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Is there not a sufficient number of buildings to take care of those 280 students?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no. The buildings we have down there are not of the character that are useful for officers who are teachers in the school.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. It is intended, then, to make this a permanent institution down there, is it?

Mr. KAHN. No.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. When is it expected to be abandoned?

Mr. KAHN. That remains with Congress. I will say frankly that the Committee on Military Affairs have not looked with favor upon the establishment of a permanent engineer school at this place.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. What became of all the buildings that were there?

Mr. KAHN. They are down there yet, those that were used during the war.

Mr. RAKER. Some six months ago they were tearing them down. They had four or five hundred men at work taking down the buildings, and there were still at that time, as it seemed to me, enough to accommodate about 20,000 people.

Mr. KAHN. I am quite sure that there are only those buildings that are necessary at the present time to carry on the temporary establishment down there. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRISON] is very familiar with the place, and he can give gentlemen the desired information.

Mr. RAKER. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Is it the intention that this appropriation shall be used to construct new buildings down there?

Mr. KAHN. Decidedly no. This is intended to put on roofs on about 40 sets of officers' quarters.

Mr. HARRISON. Thirty-two.

Mr. KAHN. Yes; 32 sets of officers' quarters, finishing the interior and putting in heating apparatus and making them habitable.

Mr. RAKER. My recollection is that we had 40,000 men down there. There were about 10,000 negroes on one side, and white quarters on the other, and it seems to me there were enough buildings there to house about ten or fifteen thousand men in permanent buildings.

Mr. KAHN. No. As I recall those quarters, they were not of a very permanent character. If we wanted to make them habitable this winter we would have to spend a great deal more money on them.

Mr. HARRISON. We would have to spend as much.

Mr. RAKER. I have been there.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I wanted to ask my colleague whether there are not more students at this place for engineers at the present time, due to their graduation ahead of time, than there will be hereafter when the regular classes are graduated, and there will be no such demands on this camp in the coming year as there is at this time?

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman is quite right.

Mr. ANTHONY. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANTHONY. If consideration is given to this bill, would it be open for amendment?

The SPEAKER. Yes; until the previous question is ordered.

Mr. KAHN. I stated that the gentleman was in the committee room and could not come over immediately. I stated in his absence that if permission is granted I will offer as a substitute the resolution which the gentleman introduced last Friday.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have a statement that I desire to make in regard to Camp Humphreys, which I will make when the bill is under consideration.

Mr. CANNON. I want to ask a question.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I understand, if unanimous consent is given, the Committee on Military Affairs, which reported this bill, will support a motion made by the chairman of that committee to reduce the amount?

Mr. KAHN. Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CANNON. I want to ask a question.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. It seems from the inquiries and answers that at Camp Humphreys the only thing desired is to perfect and finish 40 sets of quarters, with heating apparatus and everything of that kind, for officers?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. There is enough for students there already?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Now, what is between this camp and Baltimore—Camp Meigs, is it?

Mr. KAHN. That is over in the other direction altogether.

Mr. CANNON. That is on a railroad, is it not?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; but this place is a little further south than the Mount Vernon property.

Mr. CANNON. I understand that, but are there not hospitals and officers' quarters both at Meigs and at Meade, near by, practically on a railroad?

Mr. KAHN. They are both far away. It is an hour and a half ride from Camp Humphreys to Washington, and to Meade from Camp Humphreys it is two hours and a half or three hours.

Mr. CANNON. But how far is it by rail?

Mr. KAHN. There is no direct rail communication to Camp Humphreys.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, yes.

Mr. KAHN. No; you go on the Southern road to a little station called Accotink. There are only a certain number of trains that stop at that place, and there is a spur from there.

Mr. CANNON. I am speaking about the camps in the other direction—Meigs and Meade.

Mr. KAHN. Of course, there is no railroad direct to Meade, but there is a railroad to Annapolis Junction, which is fairly near Meade.

Mr. CANNON. Yes; I know. I have been over there, and so has the gentleman.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. There are hospitals and officers' quarters there, as I understand it, galore. Here the proposition is to spend $116,000 to fix up quarters for the officers, which the gentleman confesses are to be only temporary.

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman will allow me, Camp Meade at the present time is occupied by the First Division, and will be occupied by the First Division for some time, and this place at Camp A. A. Humphreys is occupied only by engineer students.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, but the officers——

Mr. KAHN. Who are teaching them.

Mr. CANNON. But their quarters will not be done before the snow flies.

Mr. KAHN. Oh, yes; the very purpose of passing this appropriation is to allow it all to be done before the snow flies.

Mr. CANNON. Camp Meade is being used for demobilization, but they will all be gone.

Mr. KAHN. There are nearly 500,000 men still to be demobilized.

Mr. CANNON. But there are any number of places to demobilize them, and it will all be done before cold weather.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. I was over in Texas the other day, and I understood at Camp Bowie they sold all the improvements, houses and everything which had cost the Government over $3,000,000, and the Government only received for them $66,000. They had plenty of room there to send these men.

Mr. CANNON. They have got plenty of room at any number of places.

Mr. RAKER. There is a railroad into Camp Humphreys, is there not?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; a spur track which strikes the main road at a place called Accotink.

Mr. RAKER. Yes; I have been there. Now, is it not a fact that over 5,000 officers—that is, men who were studying to be Engineer officers—have occupied these same quarters at different times—the same buildings that are there now?

Mr. KAHN. My colleague from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] has been over the ground very recently, and he can tell the gentleman all about it. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. ANTHONY. I should like unanimous consent to proceed for 15 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. CANNON. I think we had better have the explanation first. The gentleman may make it plain that it should not be done.

Mr. ANTHONY. A special subcommittee was appointed to look into some of these pending matters concerning appropriations that are being asked for by the War Department at some of these Army camps and cantonments. On last Tuesday this subcommittee visited Camp Humphreys and looked into the necessity for the appropriations asked for in the resolution now before the House.

The situation down there is this: The engineering school was formerly installed at Washington Barracks in buildings and officers' quarters that cost probably very near $1,000,000 that, I think, were in every way fitted for the continued housing of the Engineer school. A short time ago, however, the War Department, for a reason which I think was a very trivial one, concluded to change the location of that school from these splendid buildings down at Washington Barracks that had been constructed for them to Camp Humphreys, where they say they want to utilize the terrain there, which is, in fact, adapted for field engineer operations. But, gentlemen, the only purpose, as far as I could see, for the removal of the Engineer school from these splendid officers' quarters and buildings at Washington Barracks was so that the officers at the War College could occupy the quarters which were formerly occupied by the officers and students of the Engineer school. That is the only reason I can see for making this change which may involve the Government in the expenditure of an enormous amount of money.

The committee looked into the situation as we found it, caused by this unhappy change of location. There is no way I can see to avoid keeping the engineer school at Camp Humphreys at least for this winter, and the committee decided that it would be reasonable and proper to allow the department just a sufficient sum of money so that they could go ahead and complete bungalows for officers quarters, which they had already partially constructed. There are 28 of these buildings ranging from 10 per cent to 90 per cent completed. There is no heating plant installed in any of them. The $116,000 we propose to allow the War Department is solely for the purpose of completing the buildings that the War Department started the construction of without any authority or warrant from Congress, by using funds voted for the conduct of the war on construction which is intended for an engineer school for peace-time use.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman says that this move was made entirely without any authority whatever from Congress?

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, some authority; they had the authority of the Military Committee to adopt that location temporarily for the engineer school during the war, because they said they desired to use the Washington Barracks for other purposes; but the only military purpose of the great buildings of the engineer school there is apparently to store draft records and provide quarters for the officers of the War College.

Mr. SNELL. Why could not they move the records of the draft to some other place and move the engineer school back to these quarters here?

Mr. ANTHONY. That is what I think should be done, but the committee feels that this land at Camp Humphreys, 6,000 acres, now owned by the Government, is useful and necessary for the training of engineer students. We are willing to allow them the grounds for summer use and field work and training. But I, for one member of the committee, feel that they should be compelled to come back and occupy the buildings at the Washington Barracks which were erected for that purpose, as the permanent quarters of the engineer school.

But let me tell the gentleman another thing, and this is really the bug under the chip at Camp Humphreys. We were shown a magnificent set of plans down there, that must have cost hundreds of dollars to prepare, of one of the most magnificent set of buildings ever constructed in this country or in the world to house the proposed new engineer school. In response to a question we were told that the buildings and housing for the new school would cost $32,000,000. We were told that the General Staff had approved of the plan and that the Secretary of War had approved it.

Now, gentlemen, the danger in making further appropriations for Camp Humphreys lies in not safeguarding the appropriation so that the money can be used by the War Department for permanent construction on this wild, wasteful, extravagant plan to cost $32,000,000 for a permanent school. I believe we should pass the bill with the amendment which the committee will offer, and a provision that none of the funds now or heretofore appropriated shall be spent for any part of a permanent engineer school at Camp Humphreys without specific authority from Congress.

Mr. SNELL. One more question. How are we going to stop them if they do it without authority, and Congress comes in and appropriates the money for them to do what they did without authority?

Mr. ANTHONY. We feel that the act has been done, the school has been moved, it is in operation, and it will be wise to maintain the school there at least through the coming winter. The gentleman must understand that in time of peace the families of these officers are with them and should be made comfortable.

Mr. SNELL. Could not they be moved back to the Washington Barracks now?

Mr. ANTHONY. I doubt if it could be done without time to properly provide for quarters for officers at the War College. There are 28 bungalows which are from 10 per cent to 90 per cent completed, and it would be the practical thing to finish them.

Mr. SNELL. Would it not be possible to use the buildings here and put the school back where it was for years?

Mr. ANTHONY. It ought to be done, but I do not think it would be wise to do it now, because the school is now at Camp Humphreys and in operation. The school should be moved back to Washington Barracks next spring, but the Military Committee feels that the Camp Humphreys land should be retained as a field training ground for engineer work.

Mr. SNELL. Would that interfere with keeping it for any other purposes. My idea is that we ought to move it back and not spend any more money there.

Mr. ANTHONY. If immediately moved back it would involve securing quarters for officers of the War College. That could be taken care of if we moved them back next spring.

Mr. SNELL. They had the same officers there once before.

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes; but they have a vastly increased number now at the War College.

Mr. SNELL. What is the policy as to the number of officers there; how many?

Mr. ANTHONY. The War Department has increased the number of officers at the War College.

Mr. SNELL. I am against making appropriations for departments where they go out and spend money without the authority of Congress.

Mr. ANTHONY. That is just what the Committee on Military Affairs is trying to stop. The limitation in the last appropriation bill stopped the construction and equipment at these places which was going on without authority of Congress. Now they have come for this authority at Camp Humphreys, and we deem it wise that they should complete these bungalows that are nearly completed.

Mr. SNELL. What assurance have we that they will not start something else?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think if a proviso is put on the bill against construction of permanent buildings of the new school plan there it will effectually stop it.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman think that it is necessary in view of the fact that Congress passed the bill forbidding the purchase of other additional ground and the construction of new quarters in any of these camps and cantonments?

Mr. ANTHONY. I will say to the gentleman that if there is any possibility by which the War Department could get hold of any of the money that we have provided in the last appropriation bill, I think they would not hesitate to do it and spend it for that purpose, unless we explicitly prohibit it.

Mr. KAHN. The War Department has sent up a great many propositions which it wants completed, showing, at any rate, that they are paying some deference to the law.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think that is commendable on the part of the department.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. I desire to ask the gentleman whether or not there is provision being made for the heating of these houses during the coming winter?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes. I was informed by one of the officers there that $116,000 would complete these uncompleted bungalows and heat them.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. I want to say in prefacing my question that I fully agree with the recommendation of the subcommittee on cutting the amount in this bill, and shall vote for that amendment, but I also agree with my colleague and object to the proposition of making this a permanent engineers' school. I want to ask the gentleman from Kansas if it is not a fact that the War Department, when asked to find storage for the registration of records of the various soldiers, looked around Washington and finally decided that the only secure place they could put these records was in these magnificent buildings that have been used for the engineers' school, on the ground that they are fireproof, when as a matter of fact they had all kinds of space in the Munitions Building which could have been utilized, and if they did not in that way undertake to force Congress to build a permanent school at Camp Humphreys?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think the statement made by the gentleman is correct, and it illustrates the absolute lack of business judgment in the War Department in handling these questions.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Was this engineers' school there last winter?

Mr. ANTHONY. I can not answer that.

Mr. CANNON. Was Camp Humphreys used last winter?

Mr. ANTHONY. I think last winter it was used as an engineers' training camp for units of the National Army, but I do not think it was used as a regular engineers' school.

Mr. CANNON. Precisely, and the officers were there during that time doing their duty?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. And a great many more than will be utilized this winter?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. I object.

Mr. ANTHONY. Let me explain to the gentleman further. Can I get the attention of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Last winter the Army was on a war basis. Officers were quartered in buildings which were not comfortable, in which it would be impossible for the officer to have his family with him, and in which it would be impossible to have a school. Unless we give the small measure of relief asked for in this bill it will be impossible to conduct an engineers' school this winter.

Mr. CANNON. I do not see the impossibilities. I would be perfectly willing to spend $50,000 to put the families in buildings in Washington.

Mr. ANTHONY. And the gentleman would probably destroy an investment of about $200,000 already made in these quarters.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Illinois withdraw his objection?

Mr. CANNON. Oh, I withdraw it; I yield to the importunities of the Military Committee.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the Clerk will report the next bill.

DISPUTED CLAIMS OF ENTRYMEN IN FLORIDA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 55) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to adjust disputes or claims by entrymen, selectors, grantees, and patentees of the United States against the United States and beween each other arising from faulty surveys in Townships 36, 37, and 38 south, ranges 29 and 30 east, Tallahassee meridian, in the State of Florida, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

GRANTING CITIZENSHIP TO CERTAIN INDIANS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 5007) granting citizenship to certain Indians.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, what is the bill about?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I will say that this is a bill which was introduced by the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, and it simply gives citizenship to those Indians who are not now citizens of the United States who enlisted and saw service in the last war. It is optional with them. The bill is favorably reported by everybody, including the Indian Department, the Interior Department, and the House Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. What is the effect of granting citizenship to these Indians upon their property rights?

Mr. HASTINGS. None whatever. It is properly safeguarded, as the gentleman will see from reading the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. I have not a copy of the bill here.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the Clerk report the bill. There is a clause that it has no effect whatever upon property rights.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the bill.

There was no objection, and the clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That every American Indian, if he so desires, who served in the Military or Naval Establishments of the United States during the war against the Imperial German Government, and who has received or who shall hereafter receive an honorable discharge, shall, on proof of such discharge and after proper identification before a court of competent jurisdiction, be granted full citizenship with all the privileges pertaining thereto, without in any manner impairing or otherwse affecting the tribal rights of any such Indian or his interest in tribal or other Indian property.

With the following committee amendments:

Line 3, page 1, after the word "Indian," strike out the words "if he so desires"; line 7, page 1, after the word "discharge," insert the words "if not now a citizen and if he so desires"; line 9, page 1, after the word "jurisdiction," insert the words "and without other examination except as prescribed by said court"; and line 2, page 2, strike out the word "tribal" and insert the word "property," and after the word "rights" insert the words "individual or tribal."

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I do not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will again report the bill.

The bill was again reported.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. HASTINGS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

HOMESTEAD CREDIT TO WIDOWS.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 5000) to allow credit for husbands' military service in case of homestead entries by widows, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, That in the case of the death of any person who would be entitled to a homestead under the provisions of the act of Congress approved February 25, 1919 (Public, No. 273), entitled "An act to extend the provisions of the homestead laws touching credit for period of enlistment to the soldiers, nurses, and officers of the Army and the seamen, marines, nurses, and officers of the Navy and the Marine Corps of the United States, who have served or will have served with the Mexican border operations or during the war between the United States and Germany and their allies," his widow, if unmarried and otherwise qualified, may make entry of public lands under the provisions of the homestead laws of the United States and shall be entitled to all the benefits enumerated in said act, subject to the provisions and requirements as to settlement, residence, and improvement therein contained: Provided, That in the event of the death of such homestead entrywoman prior to perfection of title, leaving only a minor child or children, patent shall issue to the said minor child or children upon proof of death, and of the minority of the child or children, without further showing ar compliance with law.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Page 2, line 9, after the word "or," insert the word "minor"; page 2, line 10, after the word "said," strike out the word "minor"; and page 2, line 11, strike out "and of the minority of the child or children."

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. FRENCH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PUBLIC SCHOOL BUILDINGS, PETERSBURG, ALASKA.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 7709) to authorize the incorporated town of Petersburg, Alaska, to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $75,000 for the purpose of constructing and installing a municipal electric light and power plant and for the construction of a public school building.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I do not see the Delegate from Alaska here, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill go over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

BOARD OF HARBOR COMMISSIONERS, HAWAII.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 7632) to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to ratify, approve, and confirm sections 1, 2, and 3 of an act duly enacted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii, relating to the Board of Harbor Commissioners of the Territory."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of this bill?

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if the Delegate from Hawaii is here I would like to know something about this matter.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to give to the Territory of Hawaii through its Board of Harbor Commissioners the authority and right to charge a tonnage tax or toll on goods passing over wharves, landings, and so forth.

It simply amends the present law by changing the word "except" to read "including."

While the Government has expended large sums of money for the improvement and enlarging of our wharves, yet the Government has never had the right to levy any tax, and it is nothing but right and fair that we be allowed this privilege in order to raise some revenue which is neeeded for maintenance purposes as well as for paying the interest and sinking fund on the bonds issued for harbor improvement.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. I will.

Mr. KNUTSON. As I understand this bill it permits the imposition of a tax for purely maintenance purposes?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Yes. The Territory has for years spent much money for the improvements of our lands, docks, wharves, and so forth. Besides the money spent in these improvements, which was appropriated by the legislature from the general revenues of the Territory, we have also borrowed on Territorial bonds about $2,500,000 and the last session of the legislature authorized another bond issue of $2,250,000, all for improving and enlarging our wharves and shipping facilities.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. I will.

Mr. KNUTSON. This is simply to maintain the wharves and public improvements?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Yes; and pay the interest and sinking fund on our bonds.

Mr. KNUTSON. That seems fair enough.

Mr. WILSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of the point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. FESS). Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of an act entitled "An act to ratify, approve, and confirm sections 1, 2, and 3 of an act duly enacted by the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii relating to the board of harbor commissioners of the Territory, as herein amended, and amending the laws relating thereto," approved March 28, 1916, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. Section 685 of the Revised Laws of Hawaii, 1915, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 685. Powers and duties of board. Said board shall have and exercise all the powers and shall perform all the duties which may lawfully be exercised by or under the Territory of Hawaii relative to the control and management of the shores, shore waters, navigable streams, harbors, harbor and water-front improvements, ports, docks, wharves, quays, bulkheads, and landings belonging to or controlled by the Territory, and the shipping using the same, and shall have the authority to use and permit and regulate the use of the wharves, piers, bulkheads, quays, and landings belonging to or controlled by the Territory for receiving or discharging passengers and for loading and landing merchandise, with a right to collect wharfage and demurrage thereon or therefor, and, subject to all applicable provisions of law, to fix and regulate from time to time rates for services rendered in mooring vessels, charges for the use of moorings belonging to or controlled by the Territory, rates or charges for the services of pilots, wharfage or demurrage, rents or charges for warehouses or warehouse space, for office or office space, for storage of freight, goods, wares, and merchandise, for storage space for the use of donkey engines, derricks, or other equipment belonging to the Territory, under the control of the board, and to make other charges, including toll or tonnage charges on freight passing over or across wharves, docks, quays, bulkheads, or landings. The board shall likewise have power to appoint and remove clerks, wharfingers, and their assistants, pilots and pilot-boat crews, and all such other employees as may be necessary, and to fix their compensation; to make rules and regulations pursuant to this chapter and not inconsistent with law; and generally shall have all powers necessary fully to carry out the provisions of this chapter.

"'All moneys appropriated for harbor improvements, including new construction, reconstruction, repairs, salaries, and operating expenses, shall be expended under the supervision and control of the board, subject to the provisions of this chapter 100. All contracts and agreements authorized by law to be entered into by the board shall be executed on its behalf by its chairman.

"'The board shall prepare and submit annually to the governor a report of its official acts during the preceding calendar year, together with its recommendations as to harbor improvements throughout the Territory.'"

SEC. 2. That the Legislature of the Territory of Hawaii may amend or repeal section 685 of the Revised Laws of Hawaii, 1915, as amended by section 2 of the act of Congress approved March 28, 1916, save and except such portion thereof as relates to the public lands of the Territory of Hawaii.

SEC. 3. That this act shall take effect upon its approval.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all of section 2 and renumber section 3 to read "Section 2."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. KALANIANAOLE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ABSENCE OF HOMESTEAD SETTLERS AND ENTRYMEN.

The next business in order on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 277) to authorize absence of homestead settlers and entrymen, and for other purposes.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it seems we ought to have some explanation. I have no objection whatever to it.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, this bill merely grants to wounded soldiers who are taking vocational training credit for the length of time they are engaged in that training, credit upon their homestead entry, except that in any event they must reside upon their entry for a period of at least one year. At present soldiers before they are discharged are given this credit, but after they are discharged and are engaged in vocational training they are looked upon as discharged soldiers and can not obtain the credit given to the ordinary soldier before his discharge.

Mr. ANDERSON. May I ask the gentleman what is the effect of the amendments suggested by the department and agreed to by the committee?

Mr. SINNOTT. That is to confine it to wounded soldiers, to disabled soldiers. That is explained in the letter of the Secretary. In the Secretary's letter he states:

The present bill is intended to benefit only such persons heretofore in the military service who have been disabled.

Mr. ANDERSON. I understand that, but what is the effect of this amendment?

Mr. SINNOTT. The purpose of the amendment is to confine the credit solely to the disabled soldier taking vocational training.

Mr. ANDERSON. It strikes me it was already confined to him without that amendment.

Mr. SINNOTT. That was the idea of the Secretary in advancing that amendment. It was suggested to the Senate committee. The amendment was put in in the Senate. The gentleman is referring to a Senate bill and not to the House bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am referring to the amendment inserted by the House, which reads as follows:

Upon the ground that he comes within article 3 of the act of October 6, 1917, fortieth volume, Statutes at Large, page 398.

Does that restrict the operation of the bill?

Mr. SINNOTT. That was not a House amendment. That was put in in the Senate. The House has made no amendments to the bill.

Mr. ANDERSON. It is in the bill that I have as a House amendment.

Mr. SINNOTT. It is not in the one that I have.

Mr. CANNON. What is the number? Is it 277 or 276?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 277) to authorize absence by homestead settlers and entrymen, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That every person who, after discharge from the military or naval service of the United States during the war against Germany and its allies, is furnished any course of vocational rehabilitation under the terms of the vocational rehabilitation act approved June 27, 1918, upon the ground that he comes within article 3 of the act of October 6, 1917, fortieth volume, Statutes at Large, page 398, and who before entering upon such course shall have made entry upon or application for public lands of the United States under the homestead laws, or who has settled or shall hereafter settle upon public lands, shall be entitled to a leave of absence from his land for the purpose of undergoing training by the Federal Board of Vocational Education, and such absence while actually engaged in such training shall be counted as constructive residence: Provided, That no patent shall issue to any homestead settler who has not resided upon, improved, and cultivated his homestead for a period of at least one year.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. SINNOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

STOCK-RAISING HOMESTEADS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 276) to amend sections 4 and 5 of an act entitled "An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes," approved December 29, 1916.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. IGOE. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have a statement of what this bill is intended to do.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman who reported the bill is not present, but I may say in explanation that under the present enlarged-homestead act a person may take additional land contiguous to his present entry. If he does so, he is not compelled to live upon the contiguous or adjoining land, but he is also given the privilege of taking similar lands within a 20-mile radius of his present entry. In case he does that, he has to take up his residence upon the noncontiguous entry, and it was thought by the department, and it was also thought by the committee, that a man who takes up the noncontiguous land should have the same privilege as the man with contiguous land, and should not be penalized, should not be compelled to abandon his residence upon his present entry and take up his residence 20 miles from where he has his original land. It was to give both the same privilege.

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Oregon yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. SINNOTT. I yield.

Mr. BEGG. I would like to have the gentleman advise us as to what the limit as to acreage is that one man may homestead under this particular bill.

Mr. SINNOTT. The limit of land is 640 acres. If a man has 320 acres, he may take an additional 320, but it is a very arid character of land. It is land that is not capable of raising a domestic agricultural crop. It is really grazing land, land that does not contain any timber, and land that can not be irrigated.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. I yield.

Mr. MONDELL. It is a fact, is it not, that what is proposed in this bill was really the intent of those who had to do with the drafting of the original bill, which it is now proposed to amend?

Mr. SINNOTT. That was really the intent, and one can make a very good, plausible argument that the present law provides for what we are trying to do under this proposed bill; but the department has interpreted otherwise.

Mr. MONDELL. And you are simply making clear the original interpretation of the bill as it was originally passed and as those who are familiar with it understood it at the time it was passed?

Mr. SINNOTT. Carrying out the intention of the act.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINNOTT. I will.

Mr. HICKS. I realize, of course, that if this act is passed some distance would have to be stated in the bill.

Mr. SINNOTT. It is already in the act. They can only take it, by virtue of another provision, within a radius of 20 miles. They can not go beyond 20 miles from the original entry and take the additional land.

Mr. HICKS. Just why was that 20 miles adopted as a limit? We know some limit had to be adopted, but why 20?

Mr. SINNOTT. It was more or less arbitrary. Some limit had to be adopted, of course.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill be considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (S. 276) to amend sections 4 and 5 of an act entitled "An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes," approved December 29, 1916.

Be it enacted, etc., That sections 4 and 5 of the act entitled "An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes," approved December 29, 1916, be amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4. That any homestead entryman of lands of the character herein described who has not submitted final proof upon his existing entry shall have the right to enter, subject to the provisions of this act, such amount of lands designated for entry under the provisions of this act, within a radius of 20 miles from said existing entry, as shall not, together with the amount embraced in his original entry, exceed 640 acres, and residence upon the original entry shall be credited on both entries, but improvements must be made on the additional entry equal to $1.25 for each acre thereof: Provided, That the entryman shall be required to enter all contiguous areas of the character herein described open to entry prior to the entry of any noncontiguous land.

"SEC. 5. That persons who have submitted final proof upon or received patent for lands of the character herein described under the homestead laws and who own and reside upon the land so acquired may, subject to the provisions of this act, make additional entry for and obtain patent to lands designated for entry under the provisions of this act within a radius of 20 miles from the lands theretofore acquired under the homestead laws, which, together with the area theretofore acquired under the homestead laws, shall not exceed 640 acres, on proof of the expenditure required by this act on account of permanent improvements upon the additional entry: Provided, That the entryman shall be required to enter all contiguous areas of the character herein described open to entry prior to the entry of any noncontiguous land."

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. A question was asked as to the intention of those who reported the bill as to the designation of 20 miles. And in that connection I ask that a letter of the Acting Secretary of the Interior, dated June 27, 1919, be inserted in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting a letter from the Acting Secretary of the Interior. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the letter referred to:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, June 27, 1919.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I am in receipt of your request for report upon S. 276, a bill to amend sections 4 and 5 of an act entitled "An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes," approved December 29, 1916.

Under the existing law, as construed by this department, homestead entrymen of lands of the character described in said act may, after designation of their lands, enter an additional amount of lands of similar character and designation within 20 miles of the original entry, the total acreage of the two entries not to exceed 640 acres. Those entrymen who are able to make additional entries upon lands contiguous to their original entries are not required by existing law and departmental rulings to remove from the original entry to the additional, but may obtain patent upon proof of the expenditure of the amount required by law in permanent improvements upon the additional entry, and if they have submitted satisfactory final proof or obtained patent upon the original entry, patent issues upon the additional, upon submission of proof of the making of the permanent improvements required by statute. As to lands sought in additional entries noncontiguous to the original and within a radius of 20 miles, the existing law requires the entryman to comply with the requirements of the homestead laws as to residence and improvement for three years from the date of additional entry.

S. 276 proposes to place both classes of additional entries upon the same basis, and where satisfactory final proof has been made or patent issues upon the original, to allow patent to issue upon the additional upon proof of the expenditure required by the law in permanent improvements upon the additional.

It would seem both fair and logical to extend to entrymen who are not able to secure contiguous lands, but who make additional entries within the 20-mile limit, the same rights and privileges extended to those who are fortunate enough to secure adjoining lands by the making of additional entries.

To avoid confusion and to carry out the intent of the author of the bill, as well as the purpose of the original act, I suggest that the second proviso to section 3 of the act of December 29, 1916, be added to both sections 4 and 5 as proposed to be amended by this bill, viz: "Provided, That the entryman shall be required to enter all contiguous areas of the character herein described open to entry prior to the entry of any noncontiguous land."

So amended, I recommend the enactment of S. 276.

Cordially, yours,

ALEXANDER T. VOGELSANG,
Acting Secretary.

Hon. REED SMOOT,
Chairman Committee on Public Lands,
United States Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. SINNOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

PUBLIC-SCHOOL BUILDING, PETERSBURG, ALASKA.

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to H. R. 7709, No. 50 on the calendar, a bill to authorize the town of Petersburg, Alaska, to issue bonds for certain purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to return to H. R. 7709. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill, as follows:

A bill (H. R. 7709) to authorize the incorporated town of Petersburg, Alaska, to issue bonds in any sum, not exceeding $75,000, for the purpose of constructing and installing a municipal electric light and power plant, and for the construction of a public-school building.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Reserving the right to object, I would like to have the gentleman from Alaska inform us as to the necessity for this legislation.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I inquired for the gentleman from Alaska at his office this morning—in fact, I knew it before I inquired after him—and was told that by reason of important business the Delegate from Alaska had to go home. That is where he is now. He has left this bill in charge of the gentleman from California [Mr. CURRY].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. ANDERSON. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have an explanation of it.

Mr. CURRY of California. Mr. Speaker, this bill provides for the issuing of $75,000 worth of bonds by the city of Petersburg, Alaska, $50,000 of which is to extend the municipal electric light and power plant and to apply hydroelectric power to the production of the light and power instead of fuel, which they now have to use. It is a saving to the city. Twenty-five thousand dollars is to provide a schoolhouse for more than 100 children who at the present time are without adequate school accommodations.

Under the organic act the city of Petersburg is prohibited from levying a tax of over 2 per cent. The only way that this money can be obtained is through the enactment of this bill authorizing the town to issue $75,000 worth of bonds. It has been presented to the people, and all but four voted in favor of it, and the bonds will be taken up locally.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the incorporated town of Petersburg, Alaska, is hereby authorized and empowered to issue bonds in any sum, not exceeding $75,000, for the purpose of constructing and installing a municipal electric light and power plant, and for the construction of a public-school building.

SEC. 2. That before said bonds shall be issued a special election shall be ordered by the common council of the town of Petersburg, at which election the question of whether such bonds shall be issued shall be submitted to the qualified electors of said town of Petersburg whose names appear on the last assessment roll of said town for municipal taxation. Thirty days' notice of such election shall be given by publication thereof in a newspaper printed and published and of general circulation in said town before the day fixed for such election.

SEC. 3. That the registration for such election, the manner of conducting the same, and the canvass of the returns of said election shall be, as near as practicable, in accordance with the requirements of law in general or special elections in said municipality, and said bonds shall be issued only upon the condition that a majority of the votes cast at such election in said town shall be in favor of issuing said bonds.

SEC. 4. That the bonds above specified, when authorized to be issued as hereinbefore provided, shall bear interest at a rate to be fixed by the common council of Petersburg, not to exceed 8 per cent per annum, payable semiannually, and shall not be sold for less than their par value with accrued interest, and shall be in denominations not exceeding $1,000 each, the principal to be due in 20 years from date thereof: Provided, however, That the common council of said town of Petersburg may reserve the right to pay off such bonds in their numerical order at the rate of $5,000 thereof per annum from and after the expiration of five years from their date. Principal and interest shall be payable in lawful money of the United States of America at the office of the town treasurer, or at such bank in the city of New York, in the State of New York, or such place as may be designated by the common council of the town of Petersburg, the place of payment to be mentioned in the bonds: And provided further, That each and every such bond shall have the written signature of the mayor and clerk of said town of Petersburg, and also bear the seal of said town.

SEC. 5. That no part of the funds arising from the sale of said bonds shall be used for any purpose other than specified in this act. Said bonds shall be sold only in such amounts as the common council shall direct, and the proceeds thereof shall be disbursed for the purposes hereinbefore mentioned and under the order and direction of said common council from time to time as the same may be required for said purposes: Provided, That not to exceed $50,000 of the proceeds of the sale of said bonds shall be expended for the construction and installation of the electric light and power plant and not to exceed $25,000 thereof shall be expended for the construction of the public-school building.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Page 2, in line 20, strike out the figure "8" and in lieu thereof insert the figure "7."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURRY of California, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

HOMESTEAD ENTRY OF PUBLIC LANDS FOR MINORS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next one.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 1729) permitting minors of the age of 18 years or over to make homestead entry or other entry of the public lands of the United States.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, as I understand the condition of public lands at the present time, there are very few acres remaining available for settlement. Those which are available now are not of good enough quality to allow our soldiers to make entry upon them, and for that reason I do not think they should be opened up to young men under 21 years of age.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I hope the gentleman will not object to the consideration of this bill. It is intended to take care of the young men who are already living in the public-land States. If the boys 18 years old are old enough to fight for their country abroad, they are certainly old enough to take up land.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman knows that if a man serves in the Army at the age of 18 he can take a homestead entry.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. That is true; but it does not apply to those who served in the Navy or Marine Corps.

Mr. SNELL. This is open to the boys all over the country, not to the boys of the immediate territory only.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. If the gentleman from New York had had time to look at the report, he would have observed that on the 31st day of August last year Congress passed a law authorizing the boys who have served in the Army, of the age of 18 years or over, to take up homestead claims. But it does not apply to those serving in the Navy or in the Marine Corps, and the committee felt that they ought to be put on an equality certainly with the boys who served in the Army proper.

Mr. SNELL. Are you going to put them on an equality with the Army boys—pension them, and all that? It does seem to me that if we have already included the Army and Navy and Marine Corps we are including practically all young men from 18 to 21. From the statement made in the Public Lands Committee when we were discussing the soldiers' public-lands bill, it was brought out plainly that there were very few acres of public lands of real value left available. If that is so, we should not open what is left to boys 18 years of age.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman permit me for a moment to have the floor?

Mr. SNELL. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I have lived out there practically all my life, and I know that there are many millions of acres of public land left in the Western States. But substantially all of it is of a poor quality. It is rough, broken, barren, and arid, and hard to clear. There is no very good land left any more.

Mr. SNELL. And you should not start boys 18 years old on such land.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. We in the West feel that we know what is for the welfare of the people out there and what is best for the building up of that country. Let me say that Canada has had a law like this for years and years, allowing 18-year-old boys to locate homesteads. We are trying to prevent some of our boys from going over there and locating those homesteads by enacting this bill. This was Senator STERLING'S bill originally. The Senators and Representatives from those Northern States have been trying for years and years to pass it. It has been passed time and time again by the Senate. Our Public Lands Committee has reported it out several times, and every time it has been reached somebody who comes from a State that has no public lands in it objects to it and prevents the passage of the bill.

Now, we feel this way about it: If you want to give the boys who are raised on the farm an opportunity of getting something to connect themselves with a farm, inducing them to stay there, we should provide that when boys are 18 or 19 years old they may go and locate a home. If you provide that they can not get a homestead until after they are 21 years of age, they are very largely going to go to the towns and cities, and you will thereby lose the best prospective American farmers that you could get by not giving them an opportunity to get a farm and putting in a few years' time trying to get a home.

Mr. SNELL. If, as the gentleman from Colorado says, attempts have been made for several years to get this bill passed and it has always failed, I do not think it should be passed now. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made, and the bill goes off the calendar.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be allowed to retain its place on the calendar.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York objects and the bill is stricken from the calendar.

TRAVEL ALLOWANCE.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (S. 2624) to provide travel allowances for certain retired enlisted men and Regular Army reservists.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves to suspend the rules and pass a bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, would it be in order to have the bill reported in full?

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will report the bill in full.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WELLING. Will the House recur to the Unanimous Consent Calendar again this afternoon?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that there are four or five bills for the passage of which, under suspension of the rules, motions will be made. If they are completed in time the House will return again to the consideration of the Unanimous Consent Calendar. In the opinion of the Chair these bills will not take a great while.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. RAKER. The House having used two hours in the consideration of bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, and the Speaker having stated that there will be four or five motions to suspend the rules, will there be an opportunity after these bills have been disposed of to take up the Calendar on Motions to Discharge Committees?

The SPEAKER. No; we will return to the Unanimous Consent Calendar. The Clerk will report the bill called up by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 126 of the act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provisions for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, as amended by section 3 of an act entitled "An act permitting any person who has served in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the present war to retain his uniform and personal equipment, and to wear the same under certain conditions," approved February 28, 1919, shall be held to apply to any enlisted man for whom the law authorizes travel allowances as an incident to entry upon and relief from active duty with the Army who has been called into active service during the present emergency, or who shall hereafter be called into active service.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. ANDERSON. I demand a second.

Mr. KAHN. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California has 20 minutes and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] has 20 minutes.

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE]. [Applause.]

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this legislation is simply to provide the authority for equalizing the allowances that may be paid to all soldiers who served in the armies of the United States during the emergency so far as they relate to the subject matter of this bill. I think I may say, as expressing your minds, that at no time since the development of the emergency up to the present has there been any intention on the part of Congress to treat the soldiers of the United States otherwise than upon a plane of general equality as to their pay and allowances, according to their several grades and ranks.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Does this bill cure the situation by which men were invited to come from Alaska and Honolulu to become officers in the Engineer Corps, and to come, for instance, to Camp Humphreys, making their applications on blanks which stated that mileage would be allowed to them, but who found afterwards that no mileage was allowed them?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I can not pass judgment on the specific instance that the gentleman refers to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I have introduced a bill to cover their cases, and I was wondering whether this covers them.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not know as to any special case which may be covered, except the matters set out in the following letter from the Secretary of War. If the gentleman will permit me to read it, he will find out whether this covers his cases or not.

The letter from the Secretary of War to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, under date of June 26, 1919, after quoting the text of the proposed bill, continues as follows:

> The foregoing is for the purpose of affording relief for those enlisted men who have previously been retired or furloughed to the reserve, and later were called to active service during the present emergency, the Comptroller of the Treasury having held that the act approved February 28, 1919, does not permit the payment of 5 cents per mile to these men upon being placed upon inactive duty for the second time. The comptroller has ruled that these men upon being relieved from active duty shall receive travel pay at 3½ cents per mile only, as provided by the act approved July 9, 1918.
> This situation arises by reason of the choice of words in the law of July 9, 1918, enacted to cover the cases of certain enlisted men (retired enlisted men and reservists called to active duty), which provides for these men the same allowance "now prescribed by law for discharged soldiers," the word "now" limiting the allowances to those in effect at the date of the passage of the law—July 9, 1919.

As I said in the beginning, it has been the general intention of Congress at all times to see that all enlisted men were treated on an equality so far as pay and allowances in their respective grades were concerned. It turns out that perhaps the accidental choice of a word in a statute has been construed to prohibit particular soldiers from getting what other soldiers get. This is simply to cure that, so that they will all receive alike.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I see that this bill does not take care of the officers I spoke of who came from distant points but who were not allowed travel pay.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. No.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I will ask the gentleman in his capacity as a member of the Committee on Military Affairs to bear these officers in mind. For a long time these men coming from distant points were ordered to report for duty at their first station at the engineer camp in Virginia. Some of them came thousands of miles, but they received no travel pay. Later, when the War Department saw the inequality of the thing, they would order a man to report for first duty at his nearest military post, which in Alaska would be a post there, or in Utah would be Fort Logan. But prior to that a great many men lost all chance of claiming mileage for proceeding to their first station to which they were called.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I will be very glad to look into it.

Mr. REAVIS. In that same connection I will state that I have in my office now certain documents which were sent to these officers by the War Department in which there was an absolute promise that their mileage should be paid at the rate of 5 cents a mile.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. REAVIS. They came clear across the continent to Camp Humphreys, and then the War Department refused to pay their mileage.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Has the gentleman himself or any other Member presented a bill to correct that?

Mr. REAVIS. I have introduced a bill that corrects it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The committee will be very glad to consider it. Measures like this that may be brought to your attention from time to time are intended to cure these constructions of law that are made necessary perhaps by an unfortunate choice of words in a statute or amendment or some technical status of affairs arising since the emergency that prevents what was manifestly the intention of Congress to treat all soldiers in their respective grades upon an equality as to pay, allowances, and all similar matters.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to enable some 12,000 soldiers to receive the same travel pay that all the millions of men in the Army during the war have received. Under our law prior to our getting into the war the enlistment period was three years with the colors and four years in the reserves. Something like 12,000 men had served their three-year period and had been furloughed into the reserves at the time we got into the war.

When the war came, they were called back again to the colors and served throughout the war. But the language of the amendment to one of the bills allowing increased travel pay did not take care of these 12,000 men. The comptroller held that it was not broad enough to give those in the reserves the 5-cent travel pay which the law gave to all the other soldiers. And so this resolution is made necessary in order that these reservists can get 5 cents a mile travel pay instead of 3½ cents a mile. This is all there is to the proposition. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Is Senate 2624 and House joint resolution 175 the same?

Mr. KAHN. They are not the same. I will explain House resolution 175 later.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

PAYMENT OF TRAVEL PAY, UPON DISCHARGE, TO MEN OF REGULAR ARMY ENLISTED PRIOR TO APRIL 2, 1917.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass House joint resolution 175.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves to suspend the rules and pass House joint resolution 175, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 175) to provide for the payment of travel pay upon discharge to men of the Regular Army enlisted prior to April 2, 1917.
>
> Resolved, etc., That those enlisted men of the Army who enlisted in the Regular Army prior to April 2, 1917, and who have accepted or may accept their discharge from such enlistment in order to reenlist under the terms of the act entitled "An act to authorize the resumption of voluntary enlistment in the Regular Army, and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1919, shall upon such discharge receive travel pay at the rate provided in the act entitled "An act permitting any person who has served in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the present war to retain his uniform and personal equipment and to wear the same under certain conditions," approved February 28, 1919, from the place of such discharge to their actual bona fide home or residence or original muster into the service, as they may elect. The Secretary of War is authorized to discharge any or all of these men enlisted prior to April 2, 1917, who desire discharge from their old enlistment for the purpose of so reenlisting, regardless of whether or not the period of their original contract or enlistment has been completed: Provided, That in case any enlisted man has been or hereafter shall be discharged for the purpose of reenlisting in the Regular Army, he shall be entitled to the payment of $60 as provided in section 1406 of the act entitled "An act to provide revenue, and for other purposes," approved February 24, 1919.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded?

Mr. ANTHONY. In order that we may have an explanation of the bill I demand a second.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is somewhat similar to the Senate bill which the House has just passed.

As I stated before, under the law that was in existence before we got into the war the enlistment period was for seven years—three years with the colors and four years in the reserves. The men who were in the Regular Army when this war broke out ought to be furloughed into the reserves when their period of enlistment is over. The comptroller has held, in construing the existing law, that these particular men—and I think there is something like 30,000 of them—are not entitled to the $60 bonus that was provided for in the revenue bill which passed in the last Congress at the last session.

This refers only to the men in the Regular Army. Many of them have been in the Regular Army for many years, some probably 20 years. They have remained in the hope of getting the benefit of the law which allows them to retire at the end of 30 years' service.

Many of these men are willing to reenlist at the present time and disregard the provision of their previous enlistment of four years with the reserves. But the comptroller has held that they are not entitled to the $60 bonus until they get a final discharge. This legislation is intended to give these men of the Regular Army an opportunity to get the same bonus that is to be paid to all the other forces of the United States.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Does not the bill go further and give the men travel pay from the place where they would be discharged to their homes had they been discharged?

Mr. KAHN. That feature is the same as in the bill we previously passed. The comptroller has held that they would only be entitled to 3½ cents a mile, and the desire is to give them 5 cents a mile.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Let me see if I understand the case. It means that any man now in the Regular Army at his discharge after the passage of this act will be entitled to travel pay allowance and $60 bonus, even if he immediately reenlists.

Mr. KAHN. Exactly.

Mr. BEE. Whereas if he reenlisted without this law he would get none of these benefits.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman has stated it exactly.

Mr. KITCHIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Do all the men in the Regular Army have to be discharged and reenlist to get this?

Mr. KAHN. No; it is optional with them whether they reenlist or not.

Mr. KITCHIN. These men in the Regular Army, to get the $60 bonus, will have to be discharged in order to get it.

Mr. KAHN. As I understand it, many of them desire to reenlist, and if they reenlist they will get this as will the others.

Mr. KITCHIN. If I am in the Regular Army to-day, and want to get this $60 bonus, I ask for my discharge and they discharge me to-day, and then I reenlist to-morrow.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. And the only object of this bill is to permit these enlisted men in the Regular Army to get the $60?

Mr. KAHN. That is the idea.

Mr. KITCHIN. Because under the present law they can only get the $60 if their enlistment expires?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. So I imagine from the department's letter here that every man in the Regular Army will be discharged at once and will at once reenlist in order to get the $60.

Mr. KAHN. No; it will be an optional thing for the man to reenlist, but he would not get his final discharge until the period of his going into the reserves would expire, which might be three years or four years hence.

Mr. KITCHIN. I should think that he would exercise the option if he could get the $60 by doing so. We had this matter up in conference in the revenue bill, and that was one of the reasons we did not include what this bill now provides, because the man would be discharged to-day and go right back in to-morrow in order to get the $60. How much appropriation will this take?

Mr. KAHN. There are about 30,000 of these men.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. Must a man physically obtain his discharge before he can get his $60?

Mr. KAHN. Absolutely.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. PARRISH. Will the gentleman tell me whether or not the man who has been in the Regular Army, say for four years in March, is entitled under the law to an absolute furlough to the reserves?

Mr. KAHN. He would be at the end of his second enlistment.

Mr. PARRISH. If he enlisted four years under the seven years' term, with the right to be called back for three years' reserve?

Mr. KAHN. He must have enlisted after that, because the law only provides for a three years' enlistment with the colors. But this is possible: If he was in the reserves at the time of the breaking out of the war, he would be called back to the colors, but of course if he serves for a year, or a year and a half, that time would be included in his enlistment period.

Mr. PARRISH. Would he be entitled now as a matter of law to be furloughed to the reserves and dropped out of active service.

Mr. KAHN. I rather think he would.

Mr. PARRISH. The reason I ask is that I have a case of that kind.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. KITCHIN. Take the case of an enlisted soldier in the Regular Army, who is not drafted. He did not have to leave his business or his home except voluntarily to make the Regular Army his profession. He goes out to-day and reenlists to-morrow and gets his $60. When his term of reenlistment comes and he reenlists a second time, would he get another $60?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no.

Mr. KITCHIN. Would he not get the other $60 under the provisions of the revenue act?

Mr. KAHN. I do not think that applies to any soldier except those soldiers who were in the war up to the time the revenue bill passed.

Mr. KITCHIN. I am very fearful that under the language here and the provisions of the revenue act he will get two bonuses, because the revenue act says that he can have his bonus of $60 when he is permanently discharged—that is, when his term of enlistment expires. Say that a man's term would expire three years from now. Under this bill he will be discharged to-day and reenlist to-morrow for another term, and he would get this $60, and then when his term of enlistment expires, under a new enlistment would he not also get $60?

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman from Vermont.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, I think there is nothing provided in the terms of this act that differs essentially from the policy already carried in existing law. The existing law contemplates the possibility of an interim between the periods of service of a man who continues throughout his life in the military profession as an enlisted man of the Regular Army. For instance, it allows him to have three months between the period when his first enlistment expires and he is discharged therefrom and his subsequent and second enlistment, so that he may reenter at the end of three months, if he waits that long upon his second enlistment, and it will all count as if it were a continuous service. And so on with each succeeding reenlistment. He gets an actual physical discharge from the Army at the end of each one of these enlistments. He is given a little leeway—I think it is three months, as I remember now—in which he may make up his mind whether he will reenter. If he does reenter within that limitation, then it is construed as continuous service.

Mr. KITCHIN. Is that existing law?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Yes; and men have gone through for years and years that way.

Mr. KITCHIN. Then he would not get his two bonuses?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Oh, no. Each enlistment has to expire and be terminated by formal discharge. Then there is a period in which a man is free, and that period may run for three months. If during that period he enlists, it is construed that he has had continuous service, so far as longevity is concerned.

Mr. KITCHIN. So that he would not get two bonuses.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Oh, no.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Take the case of a man who was in the Regular Army prior to April 6, 1917, who has served on the border in the Mexican campaigns and everything else. The war comes on. He enters the war, reenters, and has service in France. The purpose of this bill is to put him on the same status as the man that went in after April 6, 1917, with reference to travel allowance and the bonus?

Mr. KAHN. That is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. BEE. That is the only purpose of the bill.

Mr. KAHN. Yes. I now yield to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. CALDWELL. I noticed in answer to the question of the gentleman from Texas a few moments ago the gentleman said that a man who had continued long in the service as a reservist actually would be entitled to discharge. He would only be entitled to return to the reserve provided the Secretary of War said that the emergency was over and he could go back.

Mr. KAHN. That was the intention of my answer. I meant that he would have to finish the balance of the period in the reserve.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. Does the gentleman object to the bill being amended so as to include those in the regular service of the Navy?

Mr. KAHN. We can not consent to it, because we are under suspension of the rules and we can not have an amendment where we suspend the rules. I suggest to the gentleman that he get a bill of that kind applicable to the Navy.

Mr. OLIVER. Unquestionably if this bill passes those serving in the Regular Navy should be placed on exactly the same basis.

Mr. KAHN. I think that should be done, and I believe if the Navy Department were appealed to it would recommend such legislation. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. ANDERSON. I am ready to yield time to anybody who desires to discuss the bill. I only demanded a second in order that the bill might be explained.

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. OLIVER. Are there any other special benefits that go to the second enlistment other than those that the gentleman has mentioned?

Mr. KAHN. Not that I know of. I do not think that there are any other benefits than those I have mentioned.

Mr. OLIVER. It does not operate on the second enlistment to increase the pay, then?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Are there any obligations assumed by those who enlist now which were not assumed before?

Mr. KAHN. No; there are no new obligations. The only advantage that they have in enlisting now is that they get the increased pay which the Congress voted at the outbreak of the war. Before that period they were only getting $15 a month, and we raised the pay to $30 a month. Of course, we have not by congressional legislation reduced the pay and therefore they get that additional amount.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. We have heard a good deal about the reenlistments and the efforts being made by the War Department to secure reenlistment, about inducements being offered, and a good deal is said about these men enlisting for the purpose or of their being liable to be sent to the end of the earth. Well, now, do they assume any liability of that kind of being sent anywhere the Secretary of War may please to send them, or any obligation that does not rest upon them by virtue of their present enlistment?

Mr. KAHN. That is a very large question. The question of the soldiers being sent to different places is one that, in the opinion of the legal authorities, rests entirely with the Commander in Chief of the Army, the President of the United States. Congress has had the matter up a number of times during our history, notably during the Civil War period, in connection with the fight between Congress and the President. I think the Congress has finally yielded in every instance to the proposition that the Commander in Chief of the Army can send the soldiers where he deems it necessary for the soldiers to be sent. Congress in the final analysis has invariably accepted that decision of the Commander in Chief. I want to say that I have stated upon this floor repeatedly that so far as I am concerned I am in favor of bringing every American soldier home at the speediest opportunity; but it seems we can not enforce our will upon the Executive.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield a little further? We hear a great deal about the efforts being made to secure enlistments and reenlistments particularly where efforts are being made by the department to secure reenlistments. I may be mistaken, but this looks to me like an effort to secure reenlistments with the idea that there are some obligations that rest upon the men who reenlist that do not rest upon them now and some rights they are waiving that they now have.

Mr. KAHN. No.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. It looks to me as if there was such an acknowledged effort that there must be something back of it in such effort to secure reenlistments.

Mr. KAHN. I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan that the War Department is having no difficulty whatever in securing reenlistments, none whatever. We are paying our men, the lowest-paid American soldier, to-day $30. He gets in addition to that his uniform, he gets his food, he gets transportation, he gets his housing—in short, he gets what I assume is equivalent at least to $75 or $80 a month; so there is no difficulty in finding men who volunteer to enlist.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for one question right there?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Suppose he is ordered by the Commander in Chief to go to Constantinople or Armenia, he would get 20 per cent more, would he not?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; he would get 20 per cent additional for foreign service. I yield now to my colleague on the committee.

Mr. McKENZIE. My question was suggested by the question of the gentleman from Michigan. I do not know that my colleague caught the full import of the question. There is no difference, as I understand it, between the obligation of the soldier enlisting in the Regular Army prior to going into the war, during the war, or now?

Mr. KAHN. None whatever.

Mr. ANDERSON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. ANDERSON. This bill now contemplates reenlistments?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. ANDERSON. Are they reenlisted for the same period as the first enlistment?

Mr. KAHN. No; three years with the colors and four in the reserves—seven years—although I think the proposition in the old law of four years with the reserves has been repealed.

Mr. McKENZIE. We repealed the law and made the period of enlistment three years.

Mr. ANDERSON. So that a man can reenlist under this bill—he is permitted to do it—although he has still two or three years to serve on his former enlistment, and can get travel pay and bonus and the whole business?

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman misunderstands. If he had enlisted prior to April 2, 1917—and that is the only class of soldiers this law refers to—at the period when he is subject to discharge he would have to go into the reserves for a period of four years. And after that four-year period expires he would then get his discharge. But this legislation is asked for to enable him to get his discharge immediately.

Mr. ANDERSON. When you say "immediately," do you mean now or when his enlistment period in active service expires?

Mr. KAHN. Either. He can probably be discharged now or he can ask for it when his enlistment period in active service expires. And I am inclined to think almost all the soldiers that are in the Regular Army who are subject to the four-year reserve have been discharged, practically.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LONGWORTH). The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, this colloquy was had in the time of the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. May I ask a question?

Mr. KAHN Yes.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. If this should become a law and a soldier should elect to be discharged, he would be entitled automatically to receive $60. Would he also be entitled to receive travel pay, whether he traveled or not?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; he would be entitled to his travel pay to the place of his residence. But that is the existing law. Every soldier is entitled to that pay, whether he travels or not.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. A good deal has been said here about a soldier asking for a discharge, although his term runs for some time, for the purpose of getting travel pay. If he is discharged under those circumstances and reenlists the next day, would he receive travel pay for travel he never did?

Mr. KAHN. He would; and he would under the existing law, even if this should not pass. The provision in this bill allows him to receive 5 cents per mile, whereas under the comptroller's decision he would only get 3½ cents per mile.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] to suspend the rules and pass the bill.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

AMBASSADOR TO BELGIUM.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass Senate joint resolution No. 75, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 75) authorizing the appointment of an ambassador to Belgium.

Resolved, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, as the representative of the United States, an ambassador to the Kingdom of Belgium, who shall receive as compensation the sum of $17,500 per annum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. ANDERSON. For the purpose of receiving an explanation of the legislation, I ask for a second.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] is recognized for 20 minutes and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. ANDERSON] for 20 minutes.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, I think the resolution is self-explanatory. It simply provides that the United States shall be represented at Brussels, Belgium, by an ambassador instead of by a minister. Belgium has already raised its minister to the United States to the rank of ambassador, and has also officially raised its representatives to France, Great Britain, and Italy within a few days from the rank of ministers to the rank of ambassadors. Italy, Great Britain, and France have within the last two months raised their Belgian legations to embassies, and it is unofficially announced that Spain, Brazil, and Japan are about to follow suit. In other words, each of the seven greatest powers of the world other than the United States has made, or is about to make, its representative at Brussels an ambassador. It would seem the proper thing, for many reasons, for the United States to do likewise. I shall be very happy to answer any questions that I can that any Member of the House may care to ask.

Mr. RAMSEYER. I would like to know what it is that determines whether we should send a minister or an ambassador to a certain place. Is it the amount of business or what?

Mr. ROGERS. Ordinarily it is one of two considerations—either the size of the country, irrespective of any peculiar relationship between that country and ourselves, or, in the second place, a peculiar relationship between the United States and the other country. As an illustration of the former class I may cite Italy, Great Britain, and France; as an illustration of the latter I may cite Mexico; and perhaps a still more recent instance is the Republic of Peru, which the United States raised from a legation to an embassy within a few months. In this particular case I suppose the consideration is, in part, a sentimental one—our recognition of the sufferings and hardships which Belgium has undergone during the past five years, and our desire to pay tribute to the gallantry and heroism with which, almost defenseless as she was, she resisted the invasion of the Prussian armies.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROGERS. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Is this bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. ROGERS. This resolution passed the Senate on July 23. It is a Senate resolution and was unanimously reported by the House Committee on Foreign Affairs on August 27.

I ask for a vote, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts to suspend the rules and pass the resolution.

The question was taken; and two-thirds having voted in favor thereof, the rules were suspended and the resolution was agreed to.

THEFT OF AUTOMOBILES.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill H. R. 9203.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9203) to punish the transportation of stolen motor vehicles in interstate or foreign commerce.

Be it enacted, etc., That this act may be cited as the national motor vehicle theft act.

SEC. 2. That when used in this act—

(a) The term "motor vehicle" shall include an automobile, automobile truck, automobile wagon, motor cycle, or any other self-propelled vehicle not designed for running on rails;

(b) The term "interstate or foreign commerce," as used in this act, shall include transportation from one State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, to another State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or to a foreign country, or from a foreign country to any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia.

SEC. 3. That whoever shall transport or cause to be transported in interstate or foreign commerce a motor vehicle, knowing the same to have been stolen, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 or by imprisonment of not more than five years, or both.

SEC. 4. That whoever shall, with the intent to deprive the owner of the possession thereof, receive, conceal, store, barter, sell, or dispose of any motor vehicle, moving as, or which is a part of, or which constitutes interstate or foreign commerce, knowing the same to have been stolen, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, or by imprisonment of not more than five years, or both.

SEC. 5. That any person violating this act may be punished in any district in or through which such motor vehicle has been transported or removed by such offender. A judgment of conviction or acquittal upon the merits under the laws of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, of any defendant charged with stealing any motor vehicle shall, as against any such defendant, be a bar to a prosecution hereunder for transporting such motor vehicle in interstate commerce.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Evidently a quorum is not present.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. LONGWORTH). Two hundred and forty gentlemen have answered to their names, a quorum. The Sergeant at Arms will open the doors.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ANDERSON. Has a second been ordered on the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent is asked that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER] is recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] for 20 minutes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, this bill is for the purpose of providing punishment for those stealing automobiles and automobile trucks and taking them from one State to another State.

At the present time there is a great emergency demanding this kind of legislation. In the United States at this time there are in use approximately 6,500,000 automobiles. During the past year the number of thefts of automobiles has been very large throughout the United States, and particularly in some cities of the Middle West. In Chicago 2,500 thefts of this kind have occurred. St. Louis has had 2,241 automobiles stolen, and other cities in proportion. In most cities the percentage that has been lost entirely and not recovered is very large. Kansas City, Mo., has suffered the greatest loss in this respect.

The Congress of the United States can scarcely enact any law at this session that is more needed than the bill herein recommended, and that has for its purpose the providing of severe punishment of those guilty of the stealing of automobiles in interstate or foreign commerce. There has been and is now a most widespread demand for such a law. State laws upon the subject have been inadequate to meet the evil. Thieves steal automobiles and take them from one State to another and ofttimes have associates in this crime who receive and sell the stolen machines. The losses to the people of the United States by reason of this stealing amount to hundreds of thousands of dollars every year. It is getting worse. It is getting so now that it is difficult for the owners of the cheaper cars to obtain theft insurance, due to the great loss that insurance companies have sustained. During the past year automobile theft insurance on this class of cars has increased 100 per cent. It is automobiles of that price that are generally stolen. Automobile thieves who make a specialty of this crime do not steal many of the higher-priced cars, the reason being, of course, that they are not so easily sold. I submit the following table in proof of the above statement relative to the increased cost, and so forth, of automobile theft insurance:

Comparative statement showing increase in cost of automobile theft insurance between June 1, 1918, and June 1, 1919.

	Class A, $3,500 and up.		Class B, $2,500–$3,499.		Class C, $1,800–$2,499.		Class D, $799–$1,799.		Class E, $799 and under.
	1918	1919	1918	1919	1918	1919	1918	1919	1918	1919
New cars	$0.50	$0.25	$0.75	$0.60	$1.00	$1.00	$1.75	$3.00	$2.75	$5.00
1 year old	.50	.25	.75	.60	1.00	.90	1.50	2.75	2.25	4.00
2 years old	.50	.25	.75	.50	.75	.75	1.25	2.40	1.25	3.00
3 years old	.50	.25	.75	.50	.75	.60	1.00	1.90	1.25	2.50

NOTE.—It will be noticed that the cost of theft insurance on cars selling at $799 (f. o. b.) and under has increased approximately 100 per cent in the period between June, 1918, and June, 1919, while the cost on cars in class D, $799 to $1,799, shows a correspondingly large increase.

Thieves have found the automobile field one in which they can reap huge harvests, due to the fact, no doubt, that there are so many automobiles now in use in the United States. On July 1, 1919, the number of automobiles and trucks registered in the United States amounted to a total of 6,353,233. July and August are always heavy selling months. It is therefore quite certain that the number of automobiles now in use has increased to approximately 6,500,000 cars, with an average estimated value of $1,200 each, giving a total value for all cars now in use at $7,800,000,000. I submit the following table showing how these cars are distributed according to States, as of July 1 last:

Cars and trucks in United States, July 1, 1919.

The total number of cars reported stolen in 18 western and mid-western cities during 1918 was 22,273. The city of Detroit, Mich., headed the list with 2,637 cars stolen; Chicago came second with 2,611; and St. Louis third with 2,241. Kansas City, Mo., led in the list of a total percentage of stolen cars not recovered with 46 per cent. St. Louis was second with 40 per cent of stolen cars being lost absolutely. The following table gives, in addition to the cities mentioned, the record of the other 18 cities referred to:

The power of the Congress to enact this law and to punish the theft of automobiles in one State and the removing of them into another State can not be questioned, in view of laws of similar nature heretofore enacted by Congress and the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States touching same.

The purpose of the commerce clause in the Constitution was to regulate and promote the freedom of commercial intercourse between the States and foreign nations. The power granted under this clause is absolute and practically without qualification. Commerce has frequently been defined by the courts as "intercourse," but not all intercourse is commerce. To render intercourse commerce there must be present the element of transportation. Transportation is essential to commerce, or rather is commerce itself, and the commodities transported may be tangible or intangible. Neither are they limited to those known at the time of the adoption of the Constitution.

In Pensacola Telegraph Co. v. Western Union Telegraph Co. (96 U. S., 1) the court said:

> The powers granted by the "commerce clause" are not confined to the instrumentalities of commerce or the Postal Service known or in use when the Constitution was adopted, but they keep pace with the progress of the country and adapt themselves to the new developments of time and circumstances. They extend from the horse with its rider to the stagecoach; from the sailing vessel to the steamboat; from the coach to the steamboat and the railroad; and from the railroad to the telegraph, as the new agencies are successively brought into use to meet the demands of increasing population and wealth.

Under this general principle the simile may well be extended from the coach to the automobile. The doctrine thus laid down has never been questioned. So communications passing between a correspondence school and its pupils are interstate commerce. (International Textbook Co. v. Pigg, 217 U. S., 91.)

Over interstate commerce the Federal Government has, therefore, an authority equal in extent to that possessed by the States over domestic commerce or by the United States with reference to foreign commerce. This the Supreme Court has repeatedly declared. The control of interstate and foreign commerce being granted to the Federal Government without limitation, the grant is, according to a general principle governing the interpretation of grants of Federal power, construed to be plenary.

In Champion v. Ames (188 U. S., 321) the Supreme Court, in sustaining an act of Congress for the suppression of the lottery traffic through interstate commerce, said:

The cases cited show that the power to regulate commerce among the several States is vested in Congress as absolutely as it would be in a single government having in its constitution the same restrictions in the exercise of power as are found in the Constitution of the United States; that such power is plenary, complete in itself, and may be exerted by Congress to the utmost extent, subject only to such limitations as the Constitution imposes upon the exercise of the powers granted by it; and that in determining the character of the regulations to be adopted Congress has a large discretion, which is not to be controlled by the courts simply because in their opinion such regulations may not be the best or most effective that could be employed.

Congress has enacted various laws for the regulation of interstate commerce which have uniformly been sustained by the courts. Among them are those relating to the use of safety appliances, hours of labor of employees, monthly reports of accidents, arbitration of controversies between railroads and their employees, the exclusion of impure goods and lottery tickets, employers' liability, and so forth. Specific reference may be made to the interstate-commerce act, wherein interstate-commerce railroads are forbidden to form combinations or pools for the maintenance of rates, and also the antitrust act of July 2, 1890, wherein every contract combination in the form of trust or otherwise, or conspiracy in restraint of trade or commerce among the several States, was declared a crime and made punishable as such. Larceny of goods from railroad cars being transported in interstate commerce has also been declared a crime by act of Congress.

The purpose of the proposed law is to suppress crime in interstate commerce. Automobiles admittedly are tangible property, capable of being transmitted in interstate commerce. The larceny of automobiles is made a crime under the laws of all the States in the Union. No good reason exists why Congress, invested with the power to regulate commerce among the several States, should not provide that such commerce should not be polluted by the carrying of stolen property from one State to another. Congress is the only power competent to legislate upon this evil, and the purpose of this bill is to crush it with the penalties attached.

This bill has been given very careful consideration by the Committee on the Judiciary. The full committee, with the earnest desire to present to the House a measure that would as far as possible wipe out the numerous stealings of automobiles, gave mose careful consideration to the same. Prior to doing so it was considered by a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, and after its consideration by the full committee and after a number of meetings changes were made in it from time to time, and the bill as finally agreed upon was introduced by me and given its present number. But prior to this the bill had been considered in substantially the same form for some time, and at a meeting some time ago the Committee on the Judiciary directed that my bill be reported to the House favorably and unanimously.

It provides, gentlemen, for only two things. Section 3 provides for the punishment of a thief stealing a car and transporting it from one State to another. Section 4 provides for the receipt of the stolen car by thieves in another State for the purpose of selling and disposing of it.

One of the reasons why this legislation is needed so badly is because, on account of so many cars having been stolen in the last few years, automobile theft insurance has advanced in the past year over 100 per cent on cars costing from $500 to $900. The cheaper cars are stolen, and the need is apparent for that reason, among others. In fact, Mr. Speaker, it is getting now so that it is almost impossible for the owners of these cheaper cars to obtain at any rate automobile theft insurance.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I used?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used five minutes.

Mr. DYER. I desire to reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Before I sit down I will yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. ANDERSON. I will ask the gentleman whether the committee meant the same thing in its definition of interstate commerce in section 2 as it meant in section 4?

Mr. DYER. I think so. If the gentleman will point out wherein it differs, I shall be glad.

Mr. ANDERSON. In the definition under section 2 interstate commerce means transportation from one State to another, while if you refer to section 4 you find there you have a vehicle or motor car constituting interstate or foreign commerce, and you scarcely have a sensible section.

Mr. DYER. I will say to the gentleman that if there is any difference there, which I do not see, the matter would be construed by the Supreme Court, which has passed many times upon what is meant by interstate and foreign commerce. I think it really is not necessary to put the definition in this bill. It was done at the request of some of the members of the committee. The Supreme Court has decided many times what is interstate commerce. I do not think myself that any definition is necessary.

Mr. ANDERSON. I think the bill would be a better bill if the definition were not there.

Mr. CLEARY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. CLEARY. I notice in section 3 it is provided that "whoever shall transport or cause to be transported," and so forth. I have in mind the conditions in New York City and Jersey City. There are thousands of cars crossing the ferries at all hours of the day and night, and I was wondering whether the intention was to hold the ferry companies responsible for carrying these automobiles?

Mr. DYER. Not unless they know they are stolen.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I demanded a second.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. REAVIS. Gentlemen of the House, this bill has only been called to my attention within the last few minutes. While I am a member of the Judiciary Committee, I was not privileged to be present when this bill was considered. I regret exceedingly that the bill is before the House under parliamentary conditions that will not permit it to be amended, as I do not believe the bill as now constituted should be passed at this time. I presume that, coming from the locality in which I live, the necessity for this legislation is as apparent as it is in any other locality, because I live right in the southeastern corner of my State, within 4 miles of the Kansas line and 10 miles of the Missouri line, where every opportunity is offered for transporting stolen vehicles in interstate commerce.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas rose.

Mr. REAVIS. I refuse to yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. RUCKER rose.

Mr. REAVIS. I refuse to yield to the gentleman from Missouri. [Laughter.]

Mr. RUCKER. Does the gentleman refer to automobiles taken from Missouri into Nebraska?

Mr. REAVIS. I refuse to yield to either gentleman. [Laughter.] I am very much in favor of making it a felony under the Federal law, not alone to transport stolen automobiles from one State to another but to transport any stolen property. I do not see the necessity of discriminating in favor of automobiles and leaving horses and all other sorts of property to go scot-free. I believe that if this Congress is to pass a law making it a felony to transport stolen property from one State to another, it should include stolen property of every character and not one kind specifically. I believe, further, that the fifth section of this bill practically nullifies the whole measure. The bill provides that it shall be a felony punishable by fine and imprisonment, or both, to transport a stolen automobile, knowing it to have been stolen, from one State to another, or from a Territory or the District of Columbia to another State. Now, gentlemen, the plea of autrefoits acquit—the plea that a man can not be placed twice in jeopardy for the same offense—has been one of the safeguards of the race. It has come down through the ages, protecting the rights of innocent men. But you have an application of that principle in this bill that I doubt very much has ever been equaled in any legislation ever presented to a legislative body. Bearing in mind that the offense defined by this measure is the transportation of a stolen automobile, knowing it to have been stolen, from one State to another, section 5 declares this:

A judgment of conviction or acquittal upon the merits under the laws of any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, of any defendant charged with stealing any motor vehicle shall, as against any such defendant, be a bar to a prosecution hereunder for transporting such motor vehicle in interstate commerce.

So you have a judgment of acquittal or a judgment of conviction in one character of offense a bar to a prosecution for an entirely different character of offense. For instance, in the community in which I live I might be operating a fence for the reception of stolen property. There are no crooks in Nebraska, but if any lived there they might bring stolen property to me, and I would rush it across into Kansas, where there is a ready sale for stolen automobiles. [Laughter.] If I should be arrested for stealing that car, I would say, "No; I did not steal it. I took it, knowing it to have been stolen. I transported it south to the State of Kansas, knowing it to have been stolen, and I sold it there," and under that I would have to be acquitted of the offense of stealing the automobile; and even though I had confessed to a violation of every word of this law, a prosecution against me for transporting the automobile, knowing it to have been stolen, would then be barred. It is an absolute defense, rather than a means of conviction. All you have to do is to secure a judgment of acquittal of the charge of stealing an automobile and you never could be convicted of transporting the automobile from one State to another, knowing it to have been stolen. I doubt if any Member of this body has ever seen the principle of double jeopardy applied in any such way, where a conviction or an acquittal in one kind of a case is an absolute bar to a prosecution in an entirely different kind of a case. I do not believe that the bill should be passed with any such safeguards to the crooks of this country as is contained in section 5. It is all right to say that when the bill goes over to the Senate that rather absurd provision can be straightened out; but, gentlemen of the House, I have grown a little tired of the constant reiteration that this House should do a foolish thing because the Senate will protect the people from the inefficiencies and absurdities of the House of Representatives. That is no excuse for our doing a foolish thing. As I have stated to you, I will be very glad indeed to vote for a bill making it a felony to transport stolen property of any kind from one State to another. I do not see why there should be special legislation in favor of the automobile, while horses and cattle and all other kinds of property are left free to the depredation of offenders.

Further than that, there is probably not a State in the Union that has not a statute making it a felony to receive stolen property, knowing it to have been stolen. Now, you make it a felony here to transport stolen property from one State to another, and then if you are acquitted or convicted of an entirely different offense, even though you confess that you have violated every provision of this law, the prosecution is absolutely barred.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. REAVIS. With pleasure.

Mr. JUUL. Is it not a fact that there have been acquittals in some States, and that there could not be a conviction anywhere for the transportation of an automobile as being stolen, if the court had decided that the automobile was not stolen?

Mr. REAVIS. But the court in an acquittal in a case of that kind does not determine that the automobile was not stolen. It only determines that the defendant did not steal it. Now, if I am charged with larceny, and if you fail to prove that I committed it, it is of no consequence so far as that case is concerned whether a larceny was committed or not. The automobile may have been stolen. I might admit that I transported it from one State to another. I might admit that it had been stolen. I might admit that I took possession of it knowing that it had been stolen. I might admit that I transported it from one State to another for the purpose of disposing of it, but you could not convict me under such testimony if, having been charged with stealing it, I had been acquitted of that charge. If under a mistaken idea of the facts I had been charged with the larceny of the automobile and acquitted, then you could not prosecute me for transporting the stolen goods from one State to another. I think for that reason the bill should be defeated.

I reserve the balance of my time, and I should like to inquire how much time I have used?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has used nine minutes.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. IGOE].

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I want to answer the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS] on section 5. Evidently the gentleman has not read it carefully or he would not have made the statements he has just made. The offenses punishable in this act are based on the stealing of an automobile and the transportation of that automobile in interstate commerce.

Mr. VENABLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. I yield, but I have only five minutes.

Mr. VENABLE. I can conceive of a case where you have two confederates—you and me. You steal the automobile and turn it over to me and I transport it. I am charged with the stealing.

Mr. IGOE. I am going to answer that.

Mr. REAVIS. I will give the gentleman one minute if he will answer a question.

Mr. IGOE. Very well.

Mr. REAVIS. How can a Federal law punish a man for stealing an automobile?

Mr. IGOE. We are punishing him for transporting the stolen automobile. Section 5 makes it a defense in a Federal prosecution for transporting a stolen automobile, to show that the same defendant has been charged in a State with having stolen the automobile and has been acquitted or convicted. Now, there may be another man who transports the machine after it was stolen, but section 5 only creates a defense to be invoked by a man who was charged with stealing it and who was convicted or acquitted. The offense sought to be reached in the act is the transportation, the taking it across the line, taking it from one State to another.

If a man steals an automobile and is convicted or acquitted, it was thought that it would not be proper to put him on trial for the offense of transporting the same automobile in interstate commerce. It was thought that it was only fair to accept the judgment of the court of the State in which the theft was committed.

If that machine was transported and the man who transported it was a different person, committed a different offense, it might well be possible that the witnesses on that particular feature of the crime could be produced in the Federal court, but could not be brought into the State court.

Mr. AYRES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. AYRES. Suppose two men were prosecuted jointly; they were prosecuted for stealing and it was shown that one was guilty and the other was acquitted. The one that was acquitted transported the automobile. Would not this be a bar against his being prosecuted for the transportation?

Mr. IGOE. If he was acquitted or convicted of the theft, then that individual could not be charged under this act.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. REAVIS. I will yield to the gentleman an additional minute.

Mr. VENABLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. VENABLE. What would be the situation under this state of affairs: There are two confederates who steal an automobile. You steal the automobile and turn it over to me. I am charged with the theft, and am acquitted because I did not do the stealing. But I am guilty of the transportation, and under this section the acquitting of the stealing would bar the prosecution for transportation.

Mr. IGOE. The man who is acquitted or convicted of the theft of the automobile can not be prosecuted under this act.

Mr. VENABLE. If I am acquitted of the theft, why should not I be prosecuted for the transportation?

Mr. IGOE. This is intended to supplement the State laws and reach cases that could not be otherwise reached. But it was thought that if a man was tried for a crime which is a part of this offense that the judgment of the State court might well be accepted.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KEARNS. Is the parliamentary situation such that an amendment can not be offered?

The SPEAKER. Under a motion to suspend the rules no amendment can be offered.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE].

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a suggestion to the House in reference to this bill. If there is one thing the American people have sustained and insisted upon it is the question of vicinage in the trial of cases where a man is charged with crime. This is a bill not subject to amendment under the peculiar way in which it appears before the House.

Let me illustrate a case. A man is arrested and charged with having received knowingly stolen vehicles upon the statement of some man, who in truth and in fact was the guilty party. This man lives in the State of Ohio while the other lives in the State of California. They hale him from the State of Ohio to California away from his vicinage, away from the place he is entitled under the Constitution and the laws to answer the charge, and try him in the Federal court.

That is one suggestion. Another suggestion that occurs to me is why single out automobiles? I make no appeal merely because it is an automobile, for the automobile is the vehicle of everybody. But why should a man be permitted to take a carload of cattle and transport them from Texas to Missouri and have the authorities to go through the slow process of extradition by the governor before he can be brought back into the State of Texas?

Why should we not include a carload of grain that might be stolen, or a bale of cotton, or a carload of hogs, or hundreds of other things that might be mentioned, as to which there would not be this privilege and allowance, but as to which they would have to resort to the slow process of extradition? Not as pertinent to the question, but as illustrating how far the tendency has gone to take away from the States the right and the power to try offenses committed within their vicinage, and how far we have gone to enlarge the scope of interstate commerce, I want to cite one thing.

A red-handed murderer, with the blood of his victim dripping from his hands, crosses the State line from Arkansas into Texas and stands in the sight of the officers while the processes of extradition are sent to the governor of Arkansas and from the governor of Arkansas back to the governor of Texas, and then back to the officers in Texarkana. That process is necessary in the instance I have cited, but where a man lays his hand on a motorcycle—and I notice that the bill says any vehicle propelled that is not upon rails—we make a different rule. I do not know much about the subject, but I have seen velocipedes that have self-propelling power. I do not know whether the gentleman means to include a velocipede as one of the vehicles for the stealing of which you can take a man 2,000 miles away.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that section 5, the section complained of by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS], is there for the very purpose of protecting the rights of the State to which the gentleman has referred. In other words, where an offense may be punished in a State, it is not the intention that the Federal courts shall take jurisdiction.

Mr. BEE. But suppose the Federal court takes jurisdiction before the State court takes jurisdiction? The Federal court's jurisdiction is supreme, and then the suggestion of the gentleman is of no weight and effect against the citizen.

Mr. DYER. This is for the purpose of giving some jurisdiction authority to bring witnesses from one State to another. You can not do that under existing law, but they can be brought to the Federal grand jury to testify.

Mr. BEE. Therefore the gentleman offers another suggestion. If a motorcycle or a velocipede or an automobile in somebody's barn is stolen, witnesses may be taken from the State of their residence at a dollar a day and mileage and carried to the State of Maine to testify against the man charged with the offense. I think the bill is vicious as it is drawn. If we could amend it in some way it would be different.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. NEWTON].

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the bill now under consideration is a good bill and ought to become a law. There is no evil from which there is a greater need for relief than the larceny of automobiles which is being perpetrated by bands of thieves throughout the United States.

The automobile business has grown in the past few years until it has become one of the great industries of the country. As a means of travel the automobile has almost entirely supplanted the horse and carriage and has become of such general use that to-day there are more than 6,500,000 automobiles being used in the United States, which have an estimated value of $7,800,000,000, and there is no article of value more attractive to a thief, more constantly exposed to larceny, or more easily carried away than an automobile; and there is no article which has a more ready sale, thereby rendering it easily disposed of by the culprit.

The larceny of automobiles in this country has grown to be a profitable business, and those engaged therein are finding the business so secure that they are rapidly increasing in number. I have not the figures available to show the total number of automobiles stolen in the United States during the past year but I have collected the figures showing the total number of automobiles stolen in 21 of the principal cities of the country in 1918, together with the total estimated value of such automobiles; also the total number unrecovered, together with the total amount of profits realized by the thieves in the 21 cities from which I have collected such data, and this information is contained in the following table:

City.	Population.	Stolen.	Total value.	Unrecovered.	Unrecovered value.
Boston	780,540	866	$796,720	259	$238,280
Buffalo	500,000	1,262	1,161,040	348	320,160

Omaha	200,000	1,043	959,560	347	319,240
Portland, Oreg	310,000	1,088	1,000,960	178	163,760
Philadelphia	1,800,000	2,960	2,844,155	576	576,000
Salt Lake City	118,000	797	733,240	7	6,440
San Francisco	550,000	1,122	1,032,240	41	37,720
St. Louis	800,000	2,241	2,061,720	688	798,560
Seattle	356,445	1,451	1,334,920	75	69,000
Total	18,098,213	29,399	27,087,301	5,541	5,102,740

So frightful has this menace become that automobile clubs and automobile protective associations have been formed, and they have been joined by chambers of commerce and commercial clubs all over the country in an effort to stamp out this lawless industry. Police officers and sheriffs together with prosecuting officials have joined hands and have conscientiously cooperated with these organizations, and yet any citizen in any part of the country who leaves his automobile upon the street while he goes to his office, to the church or the theater has the constant dread in his mind that when he returns his automobile may be gone.

All of the States have adequate laws for the apprehension and punishment of automobile thieves. But thieves are adroit and cunning in seeking a method of plying their trade with the least danger of conviction and punishment. They have learned that the Federal Government has no law providing for apprehension and punishment for the larceny of automobiles which are carried away and disposed of in interstate commerce, and they are now plying their trade with great industry in those cities and towns which are situated near State and border lines. Permit me to call your attention to the figures which I presented a few minutes ago and to urge you to give special attention to the difference in the number of larcenies perpetrated during the year of 1918 in cities situated in the interior as compared with those situated upon or near State lines. For instance Boston, which is an interior city, has a population of 780,540, and during the year 1918 there were 860 automobiles stolen in that city, while Detroit, which is situated upon the border and has 850,000 people, lost 2,639 automobiles by theft, and St. Louis, which is situated near a State line, with 800,000 people, lost 2,241 automobiles by theft.

It will be further observed that Indianapolis, which is situated in the interior of the State and has a population of 315,000, had 404 automobiles stolen in 1918, while Kansas City, which is situated near a State line and has a population of 375,000, had 1,144 cars stolen, and Omaha, which is situated near a State line and has 200,000 people, had 1,043 cars stolen, and Portland, which is situated within 6 miles of a State line and has a population of 310,000, had 1,088 cars stolen. An examination of the figures which I have given will show that this comparison prevails generally throughout the country. These figures further show that, in the 21 cities which I have enumerated, during the year 1918 the estimated value of those automobiles stolen in border cities amounted to more than $20,000,000, while the value of those stolen in cities located at points remote from State lines were valued at $7,000,000, a strong evidence that the auto thieves of the country are fully awake to the security and protection which they enjoy by operating in interstate commerce. Will Congress permit this protection and security to continue? The passage of the bill now under consideration will stop it.

There is no class of criminals enjoying more lucrative gain as a reward for their industry than the automobile thieves of the country. The figures which I have given show that the total population in the 21 cities enumerated amounts to a little more than 18,000,000 of people. That the total value of automobiles stolen and not recovered in those cities during the year 1918 amounts to more than $5,000,000. Automobile thieves are operating in the entire country, in the rural districts as well as in the cities, and if the ratio found in the cities given prevails throughout the Unted States, then their profit during the year 1918 must have been approximately $25,000,000, a large sum to be permitted to go to a criminal class, and a sum calculated to stimulate this evil to dreadful proportions unless drastic steps are taken for its eradication.

A business so lucrative as automobile larceny naturally attracts the most intelligent and cunning criminals, and an industry so profitable supplies them with abundant funds for protection and defense. In order that you may more readily understand the tremendous importance of legislation of this character and the total inefficiency of State laws to deal with the situation, permit me to detail to you some of the difficulties encountered by the police officers and prosecuting officials of St. Louis, which are fairly illustrative of the difficulties encountered by officials in every border-line city in the country. At St. Louis there are three public bridges and one ferry line between Missouri and Illinois, thus affording automobile thieves easy access to cross the State line, both day and night. Bands of thieves have been formed who operate in St. Louis, and as soon as an automobile is stolen it is transported across the river and stored with garage keepers in Illinois who are frequently in collusion with the thieves. The police officers of St. Louis have no authority to pursue these criminals across the State line, and the prosecuting officials of St. Louis have no power to compel witnesses, available around such garages to identify the thief who stores the stolen property, to appear in the St. Louis courts to identify such criminal. Thus the prosecuting officials when they attempt to prosecute the larceny committed on the Missouri side are helpless, because they have no power to compel witnesses from the Illinois side to attend the trial after the criminal has been apprehended and indicted. These criminals are abundantly able to make the most thorough defense to every charge. In some cases they bribe the witnesses to stay away from court, in some they intimidate them. If the witnesses can not be corrupted or intimidated, but are willing to voluntarily appear without process of law, then the defendants resort to technicalities and delay until such voluntary witnesses become worn out and disgusted and refuse to waste more time. Then, of course, the cases have to be dropped and the culprits go free.

If this bill is enacted into law and the Federal grand jury is empowered to investigate such larcenies, all the witnesses from anywhere in the United States can be compelled to appear and testify, and a full and complete investigation can be had in every case, and when a case is called for trial, the barrier of the State line having been swept away, the witnesses will be compelled to appear and testify in open court, with the result that conviction and adequate punishment will follow. Furthermore, every criminal dreads the Federal court. He feels that from Uncle Sam there is little hope of escape. His prosecutions are more vigorous and the penalties are more certain, and nothing will strike terror to the hearts of this rapidly increasing criminal class like the enactment of a law of this character.

So prevalent has this evil become that scores of antithief and auto locking devices have been invented, and inventors and accessory dealers are making huge profits in the sale of these devices, all at the expense of the automobile owners, and yet so ingenious are the automobile thieves of the country that as rapidly as devices are invented with which to thwart their evil work they devise schemes to overcome them. As a result of the risk to which every automobile owner is subjected, larceny insurance has grown by leaps and bounds, until to-day almost every owner in the land holds a larceny policy, and yet the losses have been so great that the premiums have steadily increased. Such premiums on the smaller cars were doubled in amount during the past year, and unless relief is given soon the rate of larceny insurance will soon become prohibitive.

That there is a crying need for relief from this rapidly growing evil there can be no question. That the States have been unable to effectively deal with the problem has been fully demonstrated. I have no doubt but that 90 per cent of the cars that are stolen and not recovered cross State lines before they are disposed of. The use which the automobile thief is making of interstate commerce takes him into a sphere which is beyond the reach of State control, and into a field where he can operate with security and where he will continue to do so until Congress asserts its power by the passage of a bill such as the one now under consideration.

But it has been seriously argued by Members of this House that Congress has no power to pass such a law; that such legislation is an invasion of the rights of the States. But if you will study the laws upon kindred subjects heretofore enacted by Congress and will read the decisions of the courts sustaining such laws I do not believe that a doubt will remain in the mind of even the most ardent States-rights advocate as to the powers of Congress upon this subject.

In the Minnesota Rate case (230 U. S., 398) the Supreme Court, in discussing the power of Congress to regulate commerce between the several States and the extent of that power, states the rule as follows:

> The general principles governing the exercise of State authority when interstate commerce is affected are well established. The power of Congress to regulate commerce among the several States is supreme and plenary. It is complete in itself, may be exercised to its utmost extent, and acknowledges no limitations other than are prescribed in the Constitution.

On page 399 of the same decision the Supreme Court further said:

> The authority of Congress extends to every part of interstate commerce and to every instrumentality or agency by which it is carried on, and the full control by Congress of the subjects committed to its regulation is not to be denied or thwarted by commingling of interest with intrastate operations.

In the case of Hopkins against United States, which is found in One hundred and seventy-first United States Supreme Court Reports, page 597, the court in defining the term "commerce" used the following language:

> Definitions as to what constitutes "commerce" are not easily given so that they shall clearly define the full meaning of the term. We know from cases decided in this court that it is a term of very large significance. It comprehends, as it is said, intercourse for the purpose of trade in any and all its forms, including transportation, purchase, sale, and exchange of commodities between the citizens of different States, and the power to regulate it embraces all of the instruments by which such commerce may be conducted.

In the case of Adair against United States, found in Two hundred and eighth United States Supreme Court Reports, page 176, the court defines "interstate commerce" as follows:

> The question has been frequently propounded in this court and the answer has been—and no more specific answer could well have been given—that commerce among the several States comprehends traffic, intercourse, trade, navigation, communication, the transit of persons, and the transmission of commercial intercourse among the several States, but not to that commerce completely internal which is carried on between man and man in a State or between different parts of the same State and which does not extend to or affect other States. The power to regulate interstate commerce is the power to prescribe rules by which such commerce must be governed.

In the face of the decisions which I have just read, can there be any question but what an automobile which is stolen in one State and transported across a State line into another State for the purpose of yielding a profit to the person transporting the same constitutes "interstate commerce"? It certainly constitutes "transportation and intercourse" between the States for the purpose of "trade, sale, or exchange" of articles of value. However, it may be argued that a thief gains control of an automobile in one State and that in transporting the same to another State only one person is involved and that after it has reached its destination he begins negotiations for the disposition of same, and that such a transaction does not constitute commerce between the States; but in the case of United States v. Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railroad Co. (149 Fed., 486), a case in which the Government sought to hold the railroad company liable for transporting cars with defective appliances in interstate commerce, the court said:

> A carrier operating its own construction train which hauls its own rails and products from a point in one State to a point in another State, for its own use, is engaged in interstate commerce.

Not only may an article or commodity which is a subject of sale or exchange become interstate commerce and subject to regulation under laws enacted by Congress, but the vehicles and instrumentalities by which such article or commodity is transported are held to be subject to regulation as interstate commerce; and at this point I desire to quote from Covington Bridge Co. v. Kentucky (154 U. S., 218), in which the court said:

> With reference to the second question, an attempt is made to distinguish a bridge from a ferryboat and to argue that while the latter is an instrument of interstate commerce the former is not. Both are, however, vehicles of such commerce, and the fact that one is movable and the other is a fixture makes no difference in the application of the rule. "Commerce" was defined in Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 189) to be "intercourse," and the thousands of people who daily pass and repass this bridge may be as truly said to be engaged in interstate commerce as if they were shipping cargoes of merchandise from New York to Liverpool.

Another subject which bears upon this question and which has been held to be a subject of interstate commerce is found in section 8694, United States Compiled Statutes, 1916, under the heading of "Interstate and foreign commerce," and is set forth in the following language:

> Nor shall any person, company, or corporation drive on foot or transport in private conveyances from one State or Territory into another, or from one State into the District of Columbia, or from the District of Columbia into any State any live stock knowing them to be affected with any contagious, infectious, or communicable disease.

Thus it will be observed that no particular vehicle of transportation is necessary in order to make the article transported interstate commerce, nor is it necessary that the article should be transported for any specific purpose. All that is necessary for it to become interstate commerce is that it shall be transported from one State to another, even though it be live stock driven on foot.

The diseased-cattle law, which was enacted by Congress and which I have just read, grew out of a situation somewhat similar to the one now under consideration. Diseases in cattle developed in certain sections of the country and such diseases were being distributed among herds in other sections of the country by persons driving such cattle overland. The State officials in the various States were unable to cope with the problem and a general dissemination of such diseases threatened the herds of the whole country. The result was the passage of the act which I have just read and which was held constitutional in an exhaustive opinion in the case of the United States v. Slater (123 Fed., 115).

If the driving of diseased cattle from one State to another is interstate commerce, as held in the decision just cited, and as held by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Railroad v. Huson (95 U. S., 465), then the driving of a stolen automobile from one State to another certainly falls within the meaning of that term.

Another subject which bears upon this question, and which has been held to be a subject of interstate commerce, is found in section 8813, United States Compiled Statutes, 1916, which is set forth in the following language:

Any person who shall knowingly transport or cause to be transported in interstate or foreign commerce any woman or girl for the purpose of prostitution or debauchery, or for any other immoral purpose, or with the intent and purpose to induce, entice, or compel such woman or girl to become a prostitute or to give herself up to debauchery or to engage in any other immoral practice, shall be deemed guilty of a felony, and upon conviction thereof shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment of not more than five years, or by both such fine and imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

The act of Congress which I have just read and which makes it a felony to transport a woman from one State to another for immoral purposes has been sustained in the case of United States v. Burck (226 Fed., 974) in the following language:

The transportation of persons has long been held to be "commerce." "Interstate commerce," then, is among other things the passage of persons or property from one State to another. It does not necessarily involve the idea of a common carrier or the payment of freight or fare. Interstate commerce being, therefore, in so far as applicable here, the passage of persons from one State to another, the declaration of the act "that any person who shall transport any woman in interstate commerce" is equivalent to the declaration "that any person who shall transport any woman from one State to another." It was in transportation from State to State, for the purpose mentioned, that Congress intended to prohibit, and did prohibit, and no such transportation need be by common carrier alone. In these days it is just as easy to transport a woman or girl by automobile as by rail, and the former method may in many cases be much more expeditious and clandestine than the latter.

If the transportation of a woman from one State to another, by means of an automobile, for prostitution, constitutes interstate commerce, then how can it be argued, with any show of color, that the driving of a stolen automobile from one State to another for profit is not interstate commerce?

Not only has Congress the power to act in this matter, but it is its duty to do so. For it has been shown that transporting a stolen automobile from one State to another in order to dispose of the same or for any other purpose is interstate commerce, and the power to assert legislative control over interstate commerce is vested exclusively in Congress. In support of this contention I beg leave to call your attention to the case of Railroad Co. v. Huson (95 U. S., 465), in which it was held that a statute enacted by the Legislature of Missouri prohibiting the driving of Texas, Mexican, or Indian cattle into the State of Missouri was unconstitutional because Congress alone has the power to regulate interstate commerce. The Supreme Court of the United States, in deciding the case, said:

It seems hardly necessary to argue at length that, unless the statute can be justified as a legitimate exercise of the police power of the State, it is a usurpation of the power vested exclusively in Congress. It is a plain regulation of interstate commerce, a regulation extending to prohibition. Whatever may be the power of a State over commerce, that is completely internal, it can no more prohibit or regulate that which is interstate than it can that which is with foreign nations. Power over one is given by the Constitution of the United States to Congress in the same words in which it is given over the other to the States, and in both cases it is necessarily exclusive. That the transportation of property from one State to another is a branch of interstate commerce is undeniable, and no attempt has been made to deny it.

It is apparent that something must be done to rid the country of these culprits and to protect the people from their depredations. It is evident that they are operating in a field which is beyond the scope of State control and which rests within the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress, a field where they will continue to operate with great loss and inconvenience to the people and with millions in profits to themselves unless Congress acts to curb them. And I hope this House will pass this bill, which, in so far as these interstate criminals are concerned, will strike down State lines which serve as barriers to protect them from justice, and which will give to the Federal courts the power to end their nefarious business.

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I want just a word further on this bill. As I stated a moment ago, there is no one more in sympathy with the proposition that a man should not be put in jeopardy twice for the same offense than am I; but the provisions of this bill, when they come to be construed, prevent the possibility of a man being put in jeopardy once, even though he admits the offense. For instance, take a case where a man is in possession of a stolen automobile. It is known in the community that the automobile has been stolen and the man is seen in the possession of it.

The unexplained possession of the property immediately after the offense is presumptive evidence of guilt which would justify the issuance of a warrant. He is prosecuted for stealing the car. He admits that he had it in his possession. He admits that he knew it was stolen. He admits that he transported it to another State. He admits every element which constitutes the crime as defined in the bill we are now considering. He is found not guilty of stealing the automobile. This bill operates as a bar to the prosecution for transporting the automobile, so that instead of preventing a man from being placed in jeopardy twice for the same offense, the bill would prevent his being placed in jeopardy once for an offense that he admitted that he committed. I do not believe that any such measure as that should pass this House. I do not believe that the Judiciary Committee gave this bill any consideration or any adequate consideration.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. REAVIS. I will.

Mr. DYER. I will say to the gentleman that the Committee on the Judiciary considered this at a number of meetings not only in the subcommittee but in the full committee. Of course, the gentleman was not there. I do not say it was his fault, because he was busy, perhaps, on other matters, but the committee did consider this and rewrote the bill three times.

Mr. REAVIS. Let me state this. The gentleman who is now addressing the House was not before the committee. He has been busy with the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department, but this bill was introduced on the 11th of this month, it was reported out on the 12th of this month, and it is now up for consideration to-day——

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. REAVIS. And it is up under consideration under the parliamentary status where you can not amend it on the 15th day of this month. That is the amount of consideration——

Mr. DYER. It has been considered for some six or seven weeks, and has finally been agreed upon with only some slight changes. The bill has been before the House more than five weeks.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman answer me this question? When was section 5 written into this bill?

Mr. DYER. Substantially it has been in the bill from the beginning.

Mr. REAVIS. This bill was not introduced in this House until the 11th. It was reported out of the committee the day after the bill says it was introduced. It is up now for consideration by this House under a parliamentary status that prevents an amendment, three days after the bill was reported out, and I think the bill should be defeated.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I have six minutes, and I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SAUNDERS].

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, this bill seems to be attacked on two inconsistent grounds. One objection is that it is too strong, or to use a favorite phrase that it has too many teeth in it, the other is, that it is not strong enough. Evidently the measure can not be justly amenable to both criticisms. The very objection that is urged by the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. REAVIS], ought to commend it to that portion of this House which believes in State rights, because that objection is urged to the reservation in the last section in the interest of such rights. That section provides that a conviction, or acquittal of the larceny of a motor-propelled vehicle in a State court shall be a bar to a Federal prosecution. Why should anyone who believes in the authority of the States object to a reservation which gives such authority to the findings of a State court that they will operate as a bar to a prosecution for a Federal offense? The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BEE] objects to the bill on the ground that it is too drastic, and far-reaching. Further he thinks that there are other articles of personal property to which a law of this character, if enacted at all, ought to apply. Grant that this bill ought to be enlarged to include specifically the cases cited, I fail to see why this suggestion furnishes a valid objection to the pending measure, conceding that present conditions justify the proposed action on our part, affecting automobiles. Certainly the facility with which property of this character may be stolen and moved in interstate commerce and the extent to which this is being done, affords a sufficient reason why, so far as this body is concerned, it should undertake to afford some adequate remedy to correct a nation-wide evil. Suppose the bill does provide that a man who has been convicted in a State court of the theft of an automobile shall not be prosecuted for the offense of transporting the stolen article, in interstate commerce, why should that reservation afford a ground for defeating the bill as a whole? That is all that this last section of which such complaint is made, undertakes to do. It provides that the Federal Government, in tenderness to the authority of a State, will not execute its own authority with respect to an offense against its own sovereignty, provided such State has taken jurisdiction of the State offense, as described, and a conviction, or an acquittal has been afforded.

Mr. REAVIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. With pleasure.

Mr. REAVIS. The State could not have an offense such as we find in the bill.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Certainly, I have admitted that.

Mr. REAVIS. And so the acquittal in one sort of prosecution under the State law would be a bar to any prosecution in an entirely different offense under Federal law.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Precisely. I have sought to emphasize that fact. I have sought to point out that this is an abdication on the part of the national sovereignty, in a sort of tenderness of regard for State sovereignty in that it declines to prosecute an offense against its own sovereignty merely because a State has prosecuted the offender for another and different offense in violation of a State law. This situation is unlike the situation which confronted us when we enacted the prohibition act. We are not dealing with a question of concurrent jurisdiction. There is one offense here against the laws of the State and another and different offense against the Federal statute. No question of double jeopardy can possibly arise.

The Nation says in substance: "While I have authority to convict in respect to this situation, and push a prosecution for the interstate offense, if I so will, to its logical conclusion, I surrender this right as to the offender provided one of the component States of the Union, has prosecuted such offender for the larceny of the article, either to acquittal, or conviction."

Mr. BEE. If a man steals an automobile in Texas and transports it to the State of Ohio, and he is indicted by the courts in Texas and indicted by the Federal court in Ohio, under this bill the Federal court will take the jurisdiction.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Not necessarily to a finality.

Mr. BEE. It will transport the witnesses to the State of Ohio.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Suppose the State proceeds to the final act, of acquittal or conviction. Such acquittal or conviction will be a bar to further prosecution in the Federal court. This bill says that the acquittal or conviction in a State court of the particular offense described shall be a bar to prosecution in the Federal courts.

Mr. BEE. I say when both cases are pending.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. Suppose they are pending, the final action in the State court may be pleaded in the Federal court.

Mr. HASTINGS. I want to direct the gentleman's attention to section 4. Suppose an automobile is stolen, say, in the State of Virginia at some one point and is transported to some other point in the State of Virginia and sold to some one there who knows that property to have been stolen, would that be a Federal offense under section 4?

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. I think not. How would it be? Up to that point what has been done has not reached the dignity of a Federal offense. The Federal offense begins when there is a movement in interstate commerce.

Mr. HASTINGS. Section 4 provides that anyone receiving stolen property knowing it to have been stolen, and it does not require it to have gone across State lines, as you will perceive if you read section 4 closely.

Mr. SAUNDERS of Virginia. The gentleman did not read the language in line 10, which says:

> Moving as, or which is a part of, or which constitutes interstate or foreign commerce.

And that answers the difficulty of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Will the House pass the bill under suspension of the rules?

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the Chair was in doubt.

Accordingly the House divided; and there were—ayes 85, noes 26.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays, and pending that I make the point that a quorum of the House is not present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama makes the point of order that no quorum is present. The Chair is of the opinion that a quorum is not present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absent Members. Those in favor of the passage of the bill will, as their names are called, answer "yea" and those opposed will answer "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 200, nays 40, answered "present" 4, not voting 186, as follows:

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to withdraw my vote of "yea" and vote "present." I am paired.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. KNUTSON, and he answered "Present."

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

On motion of Mr. DYER, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS MINNESOTA RIVER, MINN.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and to consider the bill H. R. 9091.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota moves to suspend the rules and consider the bill H. R. 9091, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9091) granting the consent of the Congress to the county of Hennepin to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Minnesota River.

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the county of Hennepin, in the State of Minnesota, and its successors, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Minnesota River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near the intersection of that certain public highway in said county commonly known and designated as Lyndale Avenue, with the said Minnesota River, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill under suspension of the rules.

Mr. ANDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to have that done, but I think we are entitled to have the question put as to whether a second is demanded or not.

The SPEAKER. Is a second demanded? If not, the Chair will put the question. Those in favor of the passage of the bill under suspension of the rules will say "aye"; those opposed will say "no."

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that two-thirds having, in the opinion of the Chair, voted in the affirmative, the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

CALENDAR FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Is it the intention to resume the consideration of the Unanimous Consent Calendar?

The SPEAKER. That is the purpose. The Clerk will proceed with the call of the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. THOMPSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty-six Members are present.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, we have done a pretty good day's work, and I do not think the Members should be kept here for roll calls at this hour of the day. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 19 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned, pursuant to the order previously made, until to-morrow, Tuesday, September 16, 1919, at 11 o'clock a. m.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury transmitting estimate of appropriation for rent of temporary quarters for Government officials at Nashville, Tenn., and Newport, R. SENATE.

TUESDAY, September 16, 1919.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we lift our hearts to Thee. In Thy providence we have been brought face to face with great issues affecting the life of the world. These issues have given rise to large differences of opinion, and as we face them to-day we would remember the divine order, for Thou hast taught us that we should seek first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, with the promise that all these things shall be added to us. So we pray that with a consciousness of our right relation to God we may address ourselves boldly and fearlessly to the tasks that have been committed to our hearts and minds, and may the outcome of our deliberations justify our place of leadership and power among the nations of the earth. For Christ's sake. Amen.

On request of Mr. BRANDEGEE and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal of yesterday's proceedings was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

POLICY OF UNITED STATES IN EUROPE.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a letter written by Frank H. Simonds, published in the New York Sunday Tribune, upon the European situation may be read by the Secretary. I would read it myself, but I am suffering from a heavy cold.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

[From the New York Tribune, Sunday, Sept. 14, 1919.]

"EUROPE RESENTS AMERICAN DOMINATION OF HER AFFAIRS—COMPROMISES VIEWED AS PROOF BRITAIN AND FRANCE HAD REJECTED LEAGUE PRINCIPLES—BITTER DISLIKE IS MANIFEST IN MANY INSTANCES OVER COURSE OF UNITED STATES POLICY IN EUROPE.

"[By Frank H. Simonds.]

"Unless all signs fail, the relations between the United States and the various countries of Europe are about to enter a new phase. All over the Continent there are indications that European peoples and governments are now seeking to escape from that virtual domination of European affairs by the United States which, to a greater or lesser degree, has endured from the moment when both the associate and enemy governments almost a year ago consented to an armistice following an acceptance of the 14 points. From that hour to the present America has consistently dominated the peace conference, and if American proposals have frequently been modified we are just reaching the point where they are being deliberately set aside.

"The immediate justification and warrant of President Wilson's journey to the peace conference was the acceptance by enemy and associated governments alike of his 14 points as the basis of peace. Mr. Wilson concluded that this acceptance meant that those who officially agreed actually subscribed to the principles expressed in these 14 points. He believed that the masses of the various nations, German quite as much as French, Austrian equally with Italian, saw what he saw in the league of nations, were prepared to make the sacrifices necessary to remove all the causes of rivalry and of grudge and to enter a new world without surviving antipathies.

"PROPOSALS NOT ACCEPTED IN SENSE OFFERED.

"Now, what were the facts? In the first place it seems reasonably clear, in the light of subsequent events, that the 14 points were not accepted by any people in the sense Mr. Wilson and a large number of American people believed they had been accepted by all. The Germans, on the edge of supreme political disaster, seized upon Mr. Wilson's proposal as the single alternative to invasion. They believed that Mr. Wilson would so press his 14 points that Germany would escape the logical consequences of her attack upon her neighbors, and they recognized that however far short of this the result might fall nothing could be worse than the future which stared her in the face in October, 1918.

"Our associates, on the contrary, recognized that any break with Mr. Wilson at that time, in the presence of their own war-weary people, would be fatal and might easily enable the German to escape his fate. They saw if the terms of the armistice were drawn by them that Germany would be disarmed and helpless, and that provided they continued to control the making and application of the armistice terms they could afford to leave to the future the discussion of the 14 points. Those 14 points were only officially accepted by our associates. They had never effected a lodgment in the minds of the statesmen or the soldiers controlling allied affairs, nor were they generally known or widely accepted by the populations of the several western nations.

"In point of fact, therefore, none of the European groups of powers accepted the American proposals in the sense in which they were made. To the Germans these proposals held out a promise of a reduction of the penalties they had incurred, a mitigation of the extent of their punishment.

"MEANT LITTLE MORE THAN WORDS TO THE ALLIES.

"To the Allies they meant little more than words of the precise sort which had been uttered from the very beginning of the struggle, not in insincerity, but with a frank recognition of the limitations which actuality always places upon abstract idealism. It was not in the minds of those who subscribed to Mr. Wilson's proposals for our associates that those proposals would be applied against them, nor were they yet able to think of anything except the single objective on which they had concentrated their attention for more than four years—namely, the defeat of Germany.

"When Mr. Wilson went to Europe he carried with him the conviction that the application of the 14 points and the creation of the league of nations would insure a peace of understanding among continental peoples and a future safeguard against war. He found in the welcome which awaited him from all the publics of the countries which had been associated with us in the struggle a further proof that the principles which he advocated had effected lodgment in the minds and hearts of the millions of European citizens of various nations. He was convinced that the French people, the Italian people, the members of the different races newly liberated, those who lived in countries only yesterday hostile would rally behind him in his deliberate purpose to translate the 14 points from language into fact.

"Now, it is essential to recognize that when Mr. Wilson went to Europe certain material factors assured him the position of commanding influence in the peace conference. Every associated nation around the table was our debtor. Not only this, but every associated nation was, by reason of its recent losses and war expenditures, bound to seek in America still further loans, still greater aids. Mr. Wilson represented the greatest Nation in the world in effective military resources and in unimpaired financial reserves. His country was at this precise moment still feeding millions of French, Belgians, Poles, and Italians, while each month saw further extension of American credit to various nations.

"DELIBERATE OPPOSITION TO WILSON IMPOSSIBLE.

"It was not possible in the circumstances for the Governments of the various associated nations deliberately to oppose Mr. Wilson. The material consequences of such a break would be obvious. Moreover, the break itself would be seized upon infallibly by the radical and Bolshevik elements seeking to overthrow the several Governments, while the masses themselves, seeing their Governments quarrel with that rich and generous America, on whose bounty many of them were now living, might easily be persuaded to join in the wave of anarchy which was brewing with dangerous violence over western Europe.

"On the other hand—and the point is capital—there was no public, there was no Government, which was prepared to or could without immediately falling accept Mr. Wilson's proposals as he now presented them to the Paris conference. The English people were in no mood to consent to the abolition or the regulation of that control of the sea which had been the basis of their independence and greatness for centuries. They had specifically excluded this point when called upon by the President to accept his whole scheme.

"The French people were in no mood, nor was their Government, to consent to any reduction in the reparations to be demanded of Germany that the cause of international peace in the future might be advanced. Their northern regions in ruins, their factories wrecked, their mines destroyed, their sole resource against permanent ruin was discoverable in the price to be demanded of Germany.

"As to the Italians, they had entered the war only when they had received from Great Britain, France, and Russia specific promises enabling them to acquire territory which they had long looked upon as rightfully their own. No acceptance of the 14 points suggested to any Italian, high or low, renunciation of Fiume, and the millions of Italians who cheered Mr. Wilson in January were capable, as the events showed, of cursing him in April when he called upon them for their performance under his interpretation of their acceptance of the 14 points.

"And if the great powers, associated and enemy alike, never did more than lip service to that American policy represented by Mr. Wilson, there was not even this degree of adherence by the smaller races. The Poles, the Czecho-Slovaks, the Roumanians and the Greeks, the southern Slavs, never for a single hour conceived the possibility of resigning any fraction of that dream they had cherished for their country and their ancestors had cherished over centuries and centuries.

"Now the progress of events at Paris, properly interpreted, clearly discloses the truth. When Mr. Wilson undertook to call upon the British for performance under the 14 points they politely but firmly indicated to him that the one point which transfixed their own most precious interest—namely, sea power—must be ignored. In the formation of a league of nations, with the limitation of sea power out of the question, they were prepared to give Mr. Wilson every assistance, even against their recent allies, but British support of the larger scheme was contingent upon the sacrifice of that point which concerned the freedom of the seas.

"Moreover, Mr. Wilson was presently to discover that the British in the course of the war and in association with the French had made a series of secret treaties, each of them in direct conflict with one or more of the 14 points and each of them representing a price assured to another nation as a reward for entering or remaining in the conflict. And Mr. Wilson was also destined to discover that while the British representatives at Paris were prepared to give him every possible moral assistance in forcing the beneficiaries of these secret treaties to abandon them, Great Britain still felt herself bound to stand by them if he was unsuccessful in persuading their allies to surrender.

"FRANCE DEMANDED GUARD AGAINST THIRD INVASION.

"When it came to France, Mr. Wilson discovered that the French, from the prime minister to the peasant, were agreed that Germany should be compelled to pay the last dollar that could be extracted from her to reimburse France for wanton injuries which were in the aggregate beyond the capacity of Germany to repair, and that in addition, as a consequence of two unprovoked assaults and invasions in less than half a century, France insisted upon her right to take precautions against a third invasion, precautions which involved territorial arrangements contrary to the 14 points.

"Americans associated with Mr. Wilson at Paris promptly denounced these British and French positions as revelations of an imperialistic purpose. This was grotesquely untrue. At bottom both represented precisely as justifiable a concern for national security as the United States presently disclosed in its insistence that the Monroe doctrine should be excluded from the purview of the league of nations. Without unrestricted sea power, if her fleet were under the direction of an international body Britain felt herself in instant jeopardy. Without the guaranty of the Rhine, France saw herself open to invasion, while without German reparation she saw herself ruined.

"Mr. Wilson, then, early in the peace conference faced a hopeless dilemma. He had either to surrender, so far as the 14 points were concerned, in the case of Britain in the matter of sea power, in the case of France in the matter of security and indemnity, or break with the French and British, with the absolute certainty that on these issues the British and French people would support their Governments.

"But if he should yield to the British and the French, both of whom were united in the matter of reparations, and if he should in addition fulfill his pledge in the matter of the Poles, then no peace of understanding with Germany was even conceivable. Deprived of 30,000 square miles of her richest territory, faced with the most colossal indemnity in all history, her eastern frontiers so mutilated that an enemy boundary was pushed within a hundred miles of Berlin, and a barrier interposed between East Prussia and the rest of Germany, there was not the smallest possibility that Germany would accept this peace in any other spirit than that of a conquered nation that momentarily bows to the irresistible power of the victor.

"American purpose, while controlling the Paris conference, by reason of material factors frequently confused with moral force, thus broke down at a very early stage in the peace negotiations. In those circumstances, vital to their existence, the British and the French representatives refused to accept the 14 points. Moreover, they jointly proclaimed a policy, the justice of which was patent, with respect to Germany which made the chance of a peace of conciliation illusory. The compromise which covered this crisis changed nothing. An agreement to waive the issue of the freedom of the seas, to consent to an alliance with France as a substitute for the Rhine barrier and to the recognition of French claims to indemnities, including the Saar Basin—comprises which, while they preserved the name of the league of nations and its existence on paper, were ultimate proofs of the fact that Great Britain and France had themselves refused to adopt the principles underlying the league, while the comprises insured German hostility and made certain German effort to escape by war whenever the opportunity came.

"ITALY AND JAPAN ALSO REJECTED 14 POINTS.

"Following the French and British examples came the Italian and Japanese episodes. Italy positively declined to permit the 14 points to be applied against her in the Adriatic, pointing to her treaty with Great Britain and France and calling upon her British and French allies to carry out their promises. Japan in Shantung made similar demands with a similar appeal to the same allies, and in both cases France and Great Britain signified their intention to stand by their written pledge, however repugnant it might be to them. Here again was irrefutable proof that two more great powers had accepted only with fatal reservations and limitations the American policy in the matter of peace and world reorganization.

"What the great powers had done the smaller powers now proceeded to imitate. The Serbs went into Albania; the Roumanians into Hungary; the Greeks gave unmistakable evidence of an unwillingness to surrender age-long claims in Thrace at American behest. Roumania went to Budapest against an American-procured veto of the conference of Paris and stayed there as long as she chose, meantime mobilizing other armies to drive her Serb neighbors out of that portion of the Banat awarded to the Serbs at Paris.

"Meantime, with ever-increasing clarity, there was manifesting itself in Europe an impatience with American policy which is becoming one of the most significant and dangerous circumstances in the European situation. So far as the British are concerned, American policy has in each separate instance yielded to British desires. We have waived the issue of the freedom of the seas, permitted the British to annex the greater portion of the German colonies, recognized a British protectorate in Egypt, and looked with complacency upon British possession of the large part of the Arab world. But if there has been no clash as a consequence there exists in Great Britain a very considerable and very influential element which looks with dismay upon a British foreign policy which in a large measure has supported America in a long series of conflicts with European nations who were recently the allies of Great Britain, and may, as a consequence of recent events, be driven into a new German alliance. Moreover, so far as the league of nations is concerned, the British Government has only accepted it when it has been so denatured as to carry no threat to any special British interest.

"AMERICAN POLICY VIEWED WITH SUSPICION BY FRENCH.

"On the part of the French, American policy is viewed and has been from the start with ever-increasing suspicion. American opposition, futile in the end, to French demands for reparation, American hostility to the French occupation of the Rhine barrier and the annexation of the Saar Basin have provoked deep resentment, while more and more thoughtful Frenchmen have viewed with alarm the fashion in which France, by consenting to various American decisions contrary to the desires of Italy, Roumania, and Greece, has been piling up dangerous hostility to herself on the part of these nations.

"Meantime the Roumanians, quitting the Paris conference, have resorted to arms to enforce their claims, and in this course they have the tacit sympathy of many Frenchmen and the open approval of the Italians.

"We have, then, in 11 months, during which we have endeavored to impose upon Europe an American conception of what just peace terms should be and of how the world should be reorganized to secure peace, failed in the case of Great Britain, France, Italy, and the Japanese, to coerce the Governments or persuade the people to accept our views. We have surrendered completely to the British and to the Japanese. We have compromised with the French by undertaking to send our troops to aid in the defense of France at the Saar rather than permit France to defend herself at the Rhine, and in the case of Italy we confront a deadlock which has existed for nearly half a year.

"We have incurred bitter resentment in Italy by refusing to recognize Italian claims, and whatever good will we might have earned in Japan by our surrender has already been destroyed by the course of the Senate in questioning that surrender. Having refused to recognize the French right to occupy the Rhine barrier, we shall now earn permanent French distrust and worse unless we agree to fulfill Mr. Wilson's promise to give American Armies in exchange for geographical advantages if the Germans strike again. Among the small peoples, the Roumanians and the Greeks, and even the Serbs and Poles, one holding us responsible for the bestowal of Slovene lands upon Italy and the other indicting us for the Danzig compromise, are denouncing us.

"RESENTMENT IN EUROPE TOWARD AMERICAN POLICY.

"On the other hand, can it be said that the German feels more kindly to us or is more willing, except under duress, to accept the decision of the treaty of Versailles? Does he not, as a matter of fact, indict us as a Nation for having failed to fulfill his conception of the meaning of the 14 points? Does he not hold us responsible for having persuaded him to surrender and then, when he had grounded his arms, allowed his enemies to despoil him? As to Austria, Hungary, and Bulgaria, dismembered however justly, the two former reduced from the conditions of really great States to that of pitiable principalities, is it conceivable that they will either regard the present settlement as permanent or have anything but hatred for the Nation which to all outward appearance, at least, dominated the Paris conference and accepted responsibility for its decision?

"In sum it seems to me that the course of American foreign policy in Europe between the signing of the armistice and the present moment has resulted in the creation of a resentment, rising to bitter dislike in many cases, in all European nations. We are to-day as unpopular among our recent associates, with the possible exception of Great Britain, and for obvious reasons, as we have been and remain among our recent enemies. Our solutions for the future reorganization of the world, accepted only after modification in the beginning, are now being set aside both privately and publicly. A peace of understanding, to procure which we went to Europe, has not been had. The Germans, the Austrians, the Bulgarians, and the Hungarians are not reconciled to the peace terms, most of all to those peace terms which conform most closely to the 14 points.

"Roumanian troops have seized Hungarian cities and territories; Italian troops still remain in Dalmatia and in Fiume. More and more Europe is going back to the old familiar method of dealing with its problems, and, what is more deplorable than all, that effort on the part of the United States to contribute to making peace permanent and to abolish hatred is resulting in the concentration of European dislike, to use no stronger word, upon the United States.

"EUROPE SEEKS FREEDOM FROM AMERICAN INFLUENCE.

'Underlying all this situation, not without its danger for the future, it seems to me there must be discovered a fundamental mistake. I did not find in the six months I spent in Europe any general or considerable acceptance of any part of the American doctrine as expressed by the American representatives at Paris. I do not find any belief in the league of nations, and it was plain that neither the British, the French, the Italians, nor the Japanese were ready to adopt the 14 points, save where these did not imperil a national interest.

"Now, it seems to me that Europe, slowly struggling to her feet once more, is both consciously and unconsciously seeking to free herself from the control of American policy and more and more to get back to those conditions which are the result of centuries of history and at least a working knowledge of the facts as contrasted with the theories of European life."

SURPLUS WAR DEPARTMENT EQUIPMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to a resolution of June 30, 1919, a report of the number and description of cars, trucks, and so forth, on hand, which are not needed by the War Department. The communication will be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The communication is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, September 15, 1919.

SIR: In accordance with Senate resolution No. 109, dated June 30, 1919, I have the honor to submit the following report on the question of the number and description of cars, trucks, etc., which are not needed by the War Department, and the steps which have been taken to inventory or classify such equipment and to sell and dispose of same.

On April 15, 1919, the Chief of Staff declared a surplus of 5,503 passenger cars, and 30,849 motor trucks.

Prior to this declaration and immediately subsequent thereto, there were transferred with funds to other Government departments, such as the Navy, Marine Corps, Department of the Interior, etc., approximately 600 vehicles.

Congress had enacted legislation prior to April 15 authorizing, under certain conditions, the transfer of motor vehicles and equipment as follows:

Public act No. 185, July 2, 1918, section 8, for use of the Postal Service.

Public act No. 299, February 28, 1919, section 7, to the Department of Agriculture (Bureau of Public Roads).

Public act No. 326, March 3, 1919, to the Treasury Department for the use of the Public Health Service.

Requisitions for the transfer of vehicles under these acts were submitted to the War Department and allotments made in accordance with the requisitions received.

The Post Office requisitioned 1,534 passenger cars and 5,343 trucks.

The Bureau of Public Roads requisitioned 3,466 passenger cars and 24,359 trucks.

The Public Health Service requisitioned 251 passenger cars and 892 trucks.

To fill these requisitions all of the remaining surplus vehicles were required, leaving none available for public sale. These requisitions, after receiving the approval of the Office of the Director of Sales, were delivered to the Motor Transport Corps for action. Up to August 29 there had been actually delivered, or in process of delivery, to the—

Post Office, 1,033 passenger cars and 2,727 trucks.

Bureau of Public Roads, 1,543 passenger cars and 11,289 trucks.

Public Health Service, 155 passenger cars and 480 trucks.

The sundry civil bill, passed July 19, 1919, section 5, has been interpreted by the Judge Advocate General and approved by the Secretary of War as prohibiting further transfers under section 7 of the Post Office appropriation act to the Department of Agriculture, in so far as transfers of motor-propelled vehicles and motor equipment to be made without the transfer of funds. Deliveries have, therefore, been stopped to the Bureau of Public Roads. The undelivered balance of 1,923 passenger cars and 13,070 trucks are now available for sale. Prior to offering these vehicles to the public the Bureau of Public Roads, as well as the other Government departments, are being given an opportunity to purchase such of the vehicles as they may require. As soon as the requirements of the other Government departments have been met the remaining vehicles will be placed on sale to the public. The unserviceable vehicles will be sold by the Salvage Division of the Motor Transport Corps at public auction. It is expected that the first sales will be held the latter part of this month. Used but serviceable motor trucks and passenger cars will be sold by the Surplus Property Division, Office of the Director of Purchase and Storage. There are no new passenger cars included in the War Department surplus.

The preceding information refers principally to trucks, motor cars, etc., which is understood to be the information desired primarily. Report on other war equipment and supplies is being prepared and will be submitted as soon as practicable.

Very truly, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

To the CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution:

S. 276. An act to amend sections 4 and 5 of an act entitled "An act to provide for stock-raising homesteads, and for other purposes," approved December 29, 1916;

S. 277. An act to authorize absence by homestead settlers and entrymen, and for other purposes.

S. 2624. An act to provide travel allowances for certain retired enlisted men and Regular Army reservists; and

S. J. Res. 75. Joint resolution authorizing the appointment of an ambassador to Belgium.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 5000. An act to allow credit for husbands' military service in case of homestead entries by widows, and for other purposes;

H. R. 5007. An act granting citizenship to certain Indians;

H. R. 8778. An act to amend and modify the war-risk insurance act;

H. R. 9091. An act granting the consent of the Congress to the county of Hennepin to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Minnesota River;

H. R. 9203. An act to punish the transportation of stolen motor vehicles in interstate or foreign commerce; and

H. J. Res. 175. Joint resolution to provide for the payment of travel pay upon discharge to men of the Regular Army enlisted prior to April 2, 1917.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I present a letter in the nature of a petition from James H. Pound, of Detroit, Mich., having reference to the league of nations. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Moundridge, Kans., and a memorial of sundry citizens of Lebo, Kans., remonstrating against universal military training, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Cherryvale, Kans., and a petition of sundry citizens of Chanute, Kans., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of Local Grange, Patrons of Husbandry, of Mound City, Kans., praying for the ratification of the proposed league of nations treaty, which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Homer J. Ball Post, American Legion, of Emporia, Kans., praying for the passage of the so-called Sweet bill, providing for lump-sum payments of war-risk insurance, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a memorial of the Commercial Club of Eureka, Kans., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation providing for the marking of cost and selling prices of merchandise, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Board of Supervisors of Los Angeles, Calif., praying for the construction of an all-American Canal for Imperial Valley, Calif., which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of Local Union No. 183, International Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Shipbuilders, and Helpers of America, of Chanute, Kans., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of McPherson County, Kans., and a memorial of sundry citizens of Moundridge, Kans., remonstrating against universal military training, which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McLEAN, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, to which was referred the bill (S. 2377) to amend section 1 of the act approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm-loan act, so as to provide for the payment of the expenses of the Federal Farm Loan Board and employees by the Federal land banks and joint stock land banks, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 191) thereon.

Mr. NEW, from the Committee on Territories, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 7417) to amend an act of Congress approved March 12, 1914, authorizing the President of the United to locate, construct, and operate railroads in the Territory of Alaska, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 189) thereon.

ISSUANCE OF BONDS.

Mr. NEW. From the Committee on Territories, I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 2609) to authorize the incorporated town of Petersburg, Alaska, to issue bonds in any sum, not exceeding $75,000, for the purpose of constructing and installing a municipal electric light and power plant, and for the construction of a public-school building, and I submit a report (No. 190) thereon.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill just reported by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW]. It gives authority to the town of Petersburg, Alaska, to issue bonds for securing an electric-light plant and for a public-school building in that town.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the incorporated town of Petersburg, Alaska, is hereby authorized and empowered to issue bonds in any sum, not exceeding $75,000, for the purpose of constructing and installing a municipal electric light and power plant, and for the construction of a public-school building.

SEC. 2. That before said bonds shall be issued a special election shall be ordered by the common council of the town of Petersburg, at which election the question of whether such bonds shall be issued shall be submitted to the qualified electors of said town of Petersburg whose names appear on the last assessment roll of said town for municipal taxation. Thirty days' notice of such election shall be given by publication thereof in a newspaper printed and published and of general circulation in said town before the day fixed for such election.

SEC. 3. That the registration for such election, the manner of conducting the same, and the canvass of the returns of said election shall be, as near as practicable, in accordance with the requirements of law in general or special elections in said municipality, and said bonds shall be issued only upon the condition that a majority of the votes cast at such election in said town shall be in favor of issuing said bonds.

SEC. 4. That the bonds above specified, when authorized to be issued as hereinbefore provided, shall bear interest at a rate to be fixed by the common council of Petersburg, not to exceed 8 per cent per annum, payable semiannually, and shall not be sold for less than their par value with accrued interest, and shall be in denominations not exceeding $1,000 each, the principal to be due in 20 years from date thereof: Provided, however, That the common council of said town of Petersburg may reserve the right to pay off such bonds in their numerical order at the rate of $5,000 thereof per annum from and after the expiration of five years from their date. Principal and interest shall be payable in lawful money of the United States of America at the office of the town treasurer, or at such bank in the city of New York, in the State of New York, or such place as may be designated by the common council of the town of Petersburg, the place of payment to be mentioned in the bonds: And provided further, That each and every such bond shall have the written signature of the mayor and clerk of said town of Petersburg, and also bear the seal of said town.

SEC. 5. That no part of the funds arising from the sale of said bonds shall be used for any purpose other than specified in this act. Said bonds shall be sold only in such amounts as the common council shall direct, and the proceeds thereof shall be disbursed for the purposes hereinbefore mentioned and under the order and direction of said common council from time to time as the same may be required for said purposes: Provided, That not to exceed $50,000 of the proceeds of the sale of said bonds shall be expended for the construction and installation of the electric light and power plant and not to exceed $25,000 thereof shall be expended for the construction of the public-school building.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STATE BUDGET SYSTEMS.

Mr. EDGE. On behalf of the junior Senator from Illinois [Mr. MCCORMICK], I submit a preliminary report from the special committee to devise a plan for a budget system. It is a digest of various State budget systems. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing with a view to having it printed as a public document.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made, without objection.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION INTRODUCED.

Bills and a joint resolution were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred, as follows:

By Mr. LENROOT:

A bill (S. 3006) to provide educational facilities for persons serving as members of the United States military or naval forces in the war with Germany and honorably discharged from such forces, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 3007) for the relief of Henry and William King (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. PHELAN:

A bill (S. 3008) granting a pension to George Bingham (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. MOSES:

A bill (S. 3009) granting an increase of pension to John A. Sargent (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HENDERSON:

A bill (S. 3010) to provide for an increase of salary of the United States marshal for the district of Nevada; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 3011) to protect interstate commerce in foods, drugs, and medicines, and to extend the provisions of the food and drugs act of June 30, 1906; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. SUTHERLAND:

A bill (S. 3012) granting an increase of pension to George B. Taylor; to the Committee on Pensions.

A bill (S. 3013) for the relief of Willis Cross; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 3014) granting an increase of pension to George W. Case (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHERMAN:

A bill (S. 3015) granting an increase of pension to Mary E. Abbott; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 3016) to authorize the disposition of certain grazing lands in the State of Utah, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. CALDER:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 109) to suspend for five years the operation of section 9 of the civil-service act; to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

WAR-RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. HARDING submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 8778) to amend and modify the war-risk insurance act, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

ADDRESS BY HON. HOKE SMITH.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, I present and ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] before the American Cotton Association at New Orleans, La., September 8, on the cotton situation.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF SENATOR HOKE SMITH DELIVERED BEFORE THE AMERICAN COTTON ASSOCIATION, NEW ORLEANS, LA., SEPTEMBER 8, 1919.

"Gentlemen of the American Cotton Association, we meet to consider the work for the American Cotton Association.

COTTON VALUE A NATIONAL ASSET.

"The immediate problem confronting the Southeastern States is marketing the cotton crop. It is more than a sectional question; it is a great national question.

"The export of cotton during the past century has brought back to the United States from foreign countries more than $20,000,000,000.

"Until the European war the exportation of cotton and its sale abroad met largely our yearly liabilities in foreign countries, and now the price of cotton exported is of great importance to the commerce of our entire country. We have almost a monopoly in the great raw material needed to clothe the world. Its value as a national asset can not be too highly appreciated.

"During recent years the Southeastern States have made great progress in raising food supplies and can feed their own people from their own soil. But cotton is still the money crop, and upon the profits from its sale depend the prosperity of all classes in these States and their contributions by purchases to the industry of all the other States. It is therefore important to consider the conditions which will surround marketing the crop to aid in determining at what price cotton should sell.

"The cotton farmer already knows that his last two crops have been cultivated at a higher cost than heretofore. Estimates from many localities place the cost at over 30 cents a pound. He knows that before the European war began, with the economic conditions then existing, 12 cents a pound for cotton meant an income of about $325 a year for a family consisting of a man, his wife, and three children. Twice that price for cotton at that time would only have paid the cotton farmer a reasonably decent living, and three times the ante bellum price now, with the increased cost of production, would give the cotton farmer a smaller income than that paid for work requiring the same intelligence in the cities.

BETTER PRICES OR QUIT RAISING COTTON.

"It is useless to cry 'Back from the cities to the farm' unless the prices for farm products offer opportunity from farm life reasonably to the opportunities furnished in the cities.

"The Southern States would be to-day in a vastly more prosperous condition if they had never raised a bale of cotton. Their farm lands are splendidly suited for raising food crops. In no section can cattle and hogs be raised at less cost. In these States pasturage is good nine months out of the year. Corn can be produced in limitless quantities. Peanuts and velvet beans fatten hogs and cattle at nominal cost.

"The farmers of the Middle West grew rich by producing foodstuffs. Their lands reached a value of $150 per acre, while lands in the Southern States, due to cotton, were worth less than $20 per acre.

"The culture of cheap cotton impoverished the southern farmer and depreciated the value of southern lands. While manufacturers were growing rich by changing lint cotton into material to clothe the world, the farmers of the section who produced the lint cotton eked out a pauper existence. The prices they received for their cotton kept them so poor they were compelled to sacrifice their cotton by forcing it upon the market as soon as it was gathered and to accept whatever was offered.

"I earnestly hope that the farmers will quit raising cotton in America, unless they can receive a vastly better price for it. You must stand together, collectively, organized by counties, and hold your cotton until it brings you a price that will compensate for the labor put into its culture and for the real value of your lands, or devote your time and your lands to other crops, if you expect to prosper.

"I shall intensely support the work of the American Cotton Association, because through it I hope for the financial freedom of the farmers of this section.

VALUE OF PRESENT COTTON CROP.

"The cotton farmer should, during the coming season, receive at least as high a price for his cotton as that at which cotton has sold at any time during the past 12 months, and I wish to discuss conditions that will affect the price.

"During the first week of September, 1918, middling lint cotton sold for 37 to 38 cents a pound.

"A study of conditions surrounding cotton sales show them to be more favorable to the seller now than they were in September, 1918. The supply of cotton on hand at that time was greater and the crop larger than this year.

"The war is now over. The markets of the world are all open for the export and sale of cotton, and they will remain open. Demand and consumption will be greater than last year.

HOSTILE INFLUENCES ENDED.

"When in September last year cotton reached the price of 37 to 38 cents a pound, the War Industries Board was in full operation. This was more than two months before the armistice. On the 4th of September the War Industries Board announced its purpose, 'with the approval of the President,' to appoint a committee to study the desirability and feasibility of affecting 'stabilization of cotton prices.' As the price of cotton at that time was steadily rising, this proposition to stabilize prices was an expression of disapproval of the rise in prices.

"On September 13, 1918, the War Industries Board issued another statement, declaring that 'the Government, through early agreement with the Allies, must act as a common buyer for allied purchases.' The statement further declared that, 'subject to the approval of the President,' a committee was to be appointed to protect against 'the present chaotic condition of the market' and to 'eliminate speculation and hoarding.' The statement further declared it 'may be a part of this committee's duty to recommend basic prices on cotton. After investigation upon the part of the committee, a fair price may be fixed.'

"This criticism of the price at which cotton was selling and threat to create a single purchasing agency for cotton exported to England, France, Italy, Japan, and the other allied countries was simply a threat to remove all competition among buyers and arbitrarily determine at what cotton could sell. Of course the market broke. It fell so low that finally it was concluded by those in authority that no necessity for a single purchasing agency existed. So the committee of the War Industries Board was disbanded and announcement was made that they had no authority to fix a price. But cotton had already been forced down to below 25 cents a pound by their action.

"The President during 1917 placed cotton on the embargo list, and it could only be exported under rules and regulations he made. He created the War Trade Board and intrusted to this board the issuance of licenses for the exportation of cotton. No cotton could be exported except by a license issued by the War Trade Board. This board continued to restrict exports long after the armistice. Indeed, the latter part of November they were not only restricting exports to countries contiguous to Germany but to Spain and to other points where no possible opportunity for the cotton to reach Germany existed.

"Not until in June of the present year were the restrictions of the War Trade Board removed from cotton export. Cotton responded to the broadened market and went rapidly to 36 cents a pound.

"No War Industries Board or War Trade Board can interfere with the markets or the price of your cotton during the coming year.

OTHER CONDITIONS IMPROVED.

"A year ago we had over 2,000,000 of men in France. Ships were necessary to carry them supplies, food, clothing, and munitions. Even after the war ended, almost to the present time, ship tonnage was required to carry food to France for our soldiers. It was often impossible to obtain ships to export cotton. The construction of many ships has been completed during the past 12 months. During the coming year there should be no lack of vessels with which to export cotton to foreign countries.

"Our farmers, merchants, and bankers are in better condition to hold their cotton than they were 12 months ago, and there will be no necessity to market more rapidly than the consumers require it.

"All these conditions, together with the high cost of making the crop, should be considered in estimating the price at which cotton will probably sell.

DEMAND WILL EXCEED SUPPLY.

"I ask your attention now to the most important factors which may influence the price. I refer to the supply and the demand, to the amount of American-raised cotton which will constitute the supply until the crop of next year can reach the mills, and to the demand which may be expected by the manufacturers for this cotton.

"I will deal with the cotton which concerns all cotton farmers and the trade generally without account of sea-island cotton or linters.

"Linters are frequently confused with lint cotton in the estimate of supply. Linters are really nothing but the scrapings of the cotton seed at the oil mills. They are not sold by farmers; they are not used by spinning mills; they constitute no part of the cotton from which cloth is made. They should no more be considered in estimating the supply of cotton than should cotton hulls.

COTTON SUPPLY.

"Various estimates have been made of the amount of American cotton in existence on July 31 last. They run from four to six million bales. The Department of Commerce has sought information on the subject by inquiry as to the quantity at mills, by inquiry as to cotton on board vessels, by inquiry as to cotton in the ports, and elsewhere. If these estimates are inaccurate, they are overestimates, as it is quite possible for the same cotton to have been reported at more than one place, and the mills would hardly underestimate their supply.

"One reason for questioning the existence of the amount of cotton shown by these estimates is the fact that, adding together the known production of American cotton during a number of years past, and deducting the known consumption, there would remain a less supply on hand July 31 last than that indicated by reports furnished to the Department of Commerce.

"I do not mean by this criticism to doubt that the Department of Commerce sought the most accurate information obtainable. I only show that other records would indicate the supply on July 31 last was substantially smaller than the figures I am using.

Estimate of probable stock of American cotton on July 31 last.

[From reports to Department of Commerce—500 pounds per bale.]

	Bales.
In American mills	1,252,000
In continental mills	175,000
In British mills	110,000
In mills of other countries	250,000
In continental ports	207,000
In British ports	503,000
At sea, going to Britain	254,000
At sea, going to the Continent	75,000
		2,826,000
In public storage in America	2,180,000
In ports and elsewhere in America	775,000
		2,955,000
Total		5,781,000

"While the cotton in continental and British mills is much less than that in American mills, the cotton in British ports and at sea is really for these mills, and can be treated as cotton in the mills.

"It is customary for statisticians who seek to keep down the price of cotton to add the entire estimated stock of July 31 to the crop of the current year and compare this supply of cotton with the consumption by the mills for 12 months. This calculation is erroneous.

"Little cotton of a current year reaches the mills until after the 1st of October. The cotton must be picked, ginned, compressed, and shipped before it reaches the mills. Practically no cotton of a current year reaches American mills during the month of August and little in September. No cotton of a current year reaches foreign mills in August and practically none in September.

"Distributed to the mills at all times there must be as much as 1,000,000 bales of cotton to keep them in a position to continue operation, and this amount must be on hand October 1 of the present year and October 1, 1920.

"American cotton is now being consumed by the mills at the rate of 1,200,000 bales each month, so that 2,400,000 out of the July supply will be consumed by October 1. This sum and the 1,000,000 bales which must always be in the mills should be deducted from the total supply of July 31, which gives us:

	Bales.
Estimated supply July 31	5,781,000
Consumption to October 1 and necessary mill supply then	3,400,000
Amount available from former crops for ensuing year	2,381,000

"The Agriculture Department last Tuesday estimated this year's crop at 11,200,000 bales. This estimate was made upon an estimate of deterioration of the crop, which many believe would have justified a lower estimate. The estimate did not take into consideration the fact that during the month of August, on account of continuous rains and boll weevil, much more than a normal acreage of cotton was abandoned as worthless.

"But, accepting the figures of the Agriculture Department as correct, we have as the supply for the next 12 months:

	Bales.
This year's crop	11,200,000
Amount available from former crops for ensuing year	2,381,000
Total for the year	13,581,000

CONSUMPTION.

"Now, let us turn our attention to the question of consumption. For five years the world has been engaged in war and production by the mills has not met the world's demand. There is a shortage of manufactured products needed for clothing and of other commodities made from cotton. The soldiers are out of the Army, and the facilities for production of goods manufactured from cotton are greatly improved. The world needs the manufactured product. There is every reason why the owners of mills should seek to meet the world's demand.

"It is conceded that there will be consumed by American mills 6,000,000 bales. Many place the amount larger.

"For four years prior to the war we averaged an export of 9,448,000 bales. During these four years Great Britain averaged 3,775,000 bales; Germany, 2,670,000 bales; France, substantially over 1,000,000 bales; Italy, over 500,000 bales; and Spain, over 300,000 bales. Last year Japan used 784,000 bales of American cotton.

"England to-day is earnestly striving to increase her foreign commerce. Active efforts are being made to use their cotton mills to full capacity.

"Germany has been practically without lint cotton for four years. There is every reason why Germany should seek to develop her cotton-mill production to full capacity. It is suggested that the condition of foreign exchange will hinder purchases by England and Germany. On the other hand, it is essential for these countries to develop their foreign commerce, and they can do this by manufacturing cotton goods for export.

"There are two bills now before Congress, which I believe will shortly pass, creating corporations intended to aid in financing foreign exports. England, Germany, France, and Italy each have commodities our people want. Potash alone from Germany, purchased for our use, should furnish the means of payment for a substantial amount of cotton to Germany.

"It is a conservative estimate to say that England, Germany, France, Japan, Italy, and Spain will consume 7,500,000 bales of American cotton during the coming year. I will not consider the other countries which take American cotton, but any study of their present consumption justifies the claim that they will take 1,000,000 bales, and foreign mills, which took an average of 9,448,000 bales yearly for four years before the war, may confidently be relied upon to require and to consume—if we have it to furnish them—8,500,000 bales during the coming year. The consumption of cotton during the next year may be conservatively estimated as:

	Bales.
In American mills	6,000,000
Export cotton	8,500,000
	14,500,000

"Our supply for the coming year can not be estimated at over 13,581,000 bales.

"The American cotton required for consumption during the 12 months before next year's crop reaches the mills in a substantial way will more than equal this year's crop and all of the cotton on hand. In other words, we should have an active market for all cotton remaining from the estimate of July 31 and all raised this year.

"Instead of the farmer being called upon to hunt a market, he can market only as the mills need it, relying upon the fact that all his cotton will be required for manufacture before the next crop reaches the mills.

FOREIGN COTTON SUPPLY UNUSUALLY SMALL.

"Some consideration should be given to the production of cotton outside of the United States.

"Prior to the war Russia furnished from the Provinces of Turkestan and Transcaucasia approximately a million and a half bales, but owing to the unsettled condition existing in that country, together with the shortage of food, the crop went down in 1917 to 500,000 bales. It is believed to have been still further reduced since 1917.

"Egypt produced last year nearly a million bales of long-staple cotton, but this cotton does enter into competition with the American cotton. It is used for thread and very fine fabrics, and competes with our sea-island cotton.

"India produced last year nearly three million bales of cotton. Approximately two million of the Indian crop is consumed by mills in India. Japan alone consumed last year 1,250,000 bales in excess of cotton received from the United States. This cotton is supposed to have been obtained from India and from China, so that the surplus Indian crop will not substantially compete with the crop of the United States. Besides, it has a short, coarse fiber, and can not be utilized in the manufacture of any except very low grade yarns.

"The supply for the mills of the world, of cotton not raised in the United States, during the coming year is much less than normal.

BAD MARKETING LOWERED THE PRICE.

"For a long time our farmers put their cotton on the market in two or three months. The manufacturer could not take it. It was forced on the market with only the speculator to buy it. It was a favorite pastime with cotton farmers to abuse cotton speculators, when the real criticism should have been placed upon the farmers' mode of marketing cotton. They did not hold their cotton until the consumer required the product.

MARKET AS MANUFACTURERS NEED IT.

"Our farmers have learned that a 10,000,000-bale crop will sell for more than a 16,000,000-bale crop, and that it is foolish to raise more than the consumption of the mills requires. They have furthermore learned that their lands are splendidly adapted to the cultivation of foodstuffs; that we can raise in the Southern States everything that the people of the section need to eat and a large amount in excess of local requirements.

"We can raise cattle and hogs cheaper than in any other part of our country, and I congratulate you upon the splendid herds of both that can now be found in every community.

"The farmers are to-day, most of them, able to carry their cotton crop until the consumer needs it, and this is a condition of great value when we seek to estimate what should be the market price for cotton.

"Farmers must adopt the policy of selling their cotton no faster than one-twelfth each month. Farmers can safely take this course now, as consumers will need all the supply.

"If our present crop is offered for sale only as the manufacturers need it, it should easily command a price equal to the best it brought during the past 12 months.

"Most of the cotton mills are in a position to operate during the next 12 months to their full capacity. Many of them have made immense profits during the past three years. The prices at which goods manufactured from cotton are now selling, I am advised, would justify a price of substantially over 50 cents a pound for cotton.

THE GREAT WORK OF THE ASSOCIATION.

"One of the great works of the American Cotton Association must be to unite farmers, merchants, and bankers to change the mode of marketing cotton and to put an end forever to depreciating the market price of cotton by selling it as soon as it is gathered and in such large quantities that the consumer can not absorb it.

"The American Cotton Association will inspire farmers to unite and prevent a sacrifice of the crop by sales faster than the manufacturers need it. If this is done, the time will have passed, never to return, when raising cheap cotton will impoverish the farmers of our country, and we will never again have prewar prices, based upon pauper compensation to those engaged in raising cotton.

"It should be the work of the American Cotton Association not only to inspire farmers, merchants, and bankers to see that the crop is marketed gradually as consumers need it, but I urge you to inspire our people with courage during the coming year.

"During the past year cotton sold in the early part of September for about 38 cents a pound. Adverse influences depressed the market, and it went down to below 25 cents a pound, but before the season was over it came back to 36 cents a pound.

"The market will fluctuate again this year. Do not be frightened by fluctuations. When the market goes off, keep your cotton, as all your cotton will be needed for consumption during the year. If you respond to a fall of price by keeping your cotton, you may be sure that the price will advance. Never sell on a declining market. Do not let it break your nerve. The price will return to just value.

"The cost of producing the crop, the present value of lands, the relative value of other commodities, the law of supply and demand applied to the present crop justify better prices for cotton during the coming year than any received during recent years.

"You must organize in every county in the cotton-growing States. Merchants, bankers, and even cotton manufacturers should realize the benefits which the sale of cotton at substantial profits will bring.

"Farmers should keep new cotton off the market entirely during the present month, and from the 1st of October on sell slowly, only as the manufacturers need it. Each county organization should see that of the total cotton raised in the county not more than one-twelfth is sold each month. They should help each other to bring about this result.

"You need not worry about the New York Exchange market if this is done. In 30 days the speculator would respond to your action, and the price there would rise. They are now compelled upon exchanges to meet future sales with spinable cotton, and if they see you intend to market slowly and wisely, they will quickly respond by putting up the prices on the exchanges.

"In the meantime, while gradually selling your cotton, plant foodstuffs and raise cattle and hogs. Let the world understand that you will meet the situation again next fall independent and owning your cotton.

"I view the situation with confidence, because I believe in the courage, the nerve, and intelligence of our people when once aroused.

"It is for the American Cotton Association to bring them into action.

"Ours is a section upon which the Almighty has, with lavish hand, bestowed His richest material gifts. Let us see that they are used to strengthen our people and our section, not alone for our own advantage, but that we may contribute to our Nation a full part in its growth and progress, and I earnestly hope that we may do so commercially, mentally, and spiritually.

"May you lead the farmers of the cotton-producing States to receive all the benefits which the conditions surrounding them justify."

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I hold in my hand an editorial from the Living Church, which strikes the keynote of international honor so finely, and represents the higher thought of the world so loftily, that I have thought it would be beneficial to Senators and other people to read it. I therefore ask unanimous consent to have it inserted in the RECORD. It is entitled "The honor of the American people is at stake."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"THE HONOR OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE IS AT STAKE.

"The American people ought seriously to realize that if the United States Senate should carry the recommendation of its Foreign Affairs Committee into effect, amending the pending treaty of peace by providing for the transfer of Shantung to China instead of to Japan, it would involve three things: A national dishonor to ourselves, an act of perfidy toward three of our Allies, Great Britain, France, and Japan, and an irritant to at least the latter that might be deemed a casus belli, and would certainly be viewed—quite rightly—as a very unfriendly act. On the other hand, since we would be powerless on our own motion to effect the transfer to China unless we chose to make the attempt by declaring war against the three nations mentioned and should win the war, the proposed change in the language of the treaty would be of not the slightest value to China, while by repudiating the treaty, as we should thus do, we should relieve Germany of all the obligations relating to ourselves which she has been forced to assume and should dissociate ourselves from the forces of civilization that are now compelling Germany to make some form of restitution for her misdeeds in the past.

"For it must be remembered that the chief issue involved in this Shantung matter, so far as the powers are concerned, is the sanctity of treaties. And the Senate committee is deliberately demanding that Great Britain and France make of their treaty with Japan a 'scrap of paper,' with the penalty that the United States will withdraw from the association with these powers in making peace with Germany if they refuse to do so.

"As representing the conscience of some considerable part of the American people, we unhesitatingly declare that position to involve national dishonor for the American Nation.

"Whatever wrong was done to China—and it was a genuine wrong—was done by Germany when, in 1898, she forced the treaty which gave her the 'lease' of the Kiaochow Bay section of the Province of Shantung; and it was a wrong in which Russia, England, and France immediately afterwards participated by seizing other desirable portions of the China coast and forcing similar 'leases' in their respective interests. If the United States had protested against this wrong at the time it was committed she would have some color, though not much, for the present demand of the Senate committee that Japan, as successor to the 'rights' of Germany, should be deprived of those 'rights,' while no such demand is made upon England or France. The United States made no such protest. The world has acquiesced in the wrong then committed. No nation, unless it be China herself, can intervene now, 20 years too late, and say that the lease to Germany can not be taken over by Japan, who ousted the Germans from their possessions in China precisely as Great Britain and her dominions ousted them from other German colonies, as incidents in the World War.

"That long before we entered the war Great Britain and France made a secret treaty with Japan guaranteeing to the latter her succession to the German lease on condition that she oust the Germans from it is regrettable to us, who do not believe in secret treaties, though entirely in accordance with the general practice of other nations than our own. But as we were holding ourselves carefully aloof from the nations that were straining their resources to repel the German invasion, we have very little right to criticize these for making the engagement. The fact that the treaty was a secret one does not relieve the signatory powers from their obligations under it. Moreover, even if these powers were bound by Mr. Wilson's denunciation of secret treaties made three years later, which, of course, is a preposterous position, it still remains that Mr. Wilson in his 14 points never demanded that secret treaties already made should be repudiated, but only that in future there should be no more of them.

"Mr. Wilson's attitude at Versailles with respect to Shantung, if we understand it aright, was an earnest plea to Japan voluntarily to recede from the rights she had won in China, in order to cooperate in the beginning of a new world era in which weak nations should no longer be despoiled by stronger nations. It would have been a magnificent thing for Japan if she had voluntarily accepted that principle. It would have given her the confidence of the world. It would have guaranteed to her such a moral influence in Chinese affairs as would have been of lasting value to her. It would have cemented her friendship with America. It would have made her the world's leader in dealing with the problems of territorial reconstruction.

"But Japan did not. She insisted upon her rights under the treaty. She had every legal right thus to insist upon them. Great Britain and France fulfilled their obligations to guarantee those rights to her. These nations would have shared in the perfidy of Germany if they had violated their obligation. And if Mr. Wilson had insisted that they do so, on pain of refusing American assent to the treaty of peace, he would have committed the American Nation to a demand that Great Britain and France, having profited by their treaty with Japan, now repudiate their obligations under that treaty.

"That is precisely what the United States Senate will have done if it amends the treaty in accordance with the recommendation of Mr. LODGE'S committee. But the Senate, in that event, will also adopt a peculiarly discourteous method in doing that which is in itself dishonorable. Instead of negotiating with Japan, England, and France in diplomatic manner in an attempt to undo their own treaty on the ground that we, whom it does not concern, disapprove of it, the Senate is asked by its committee to use its own constitutional power of force—for we will not call it a right—to refuse assent to the treaty of peace except on the condition that these nations comply with our demand.

"The United States, as the disinterested friend of Japan and China, was entirely within her rights in urging the former of these to recede from her rights under that treaty; but she has not the faintest color of right to demand that Japan do so. To formulate such a demand, even in a diplomatic manner, would be a national impertinence which would be, and ought to be, indignantly resented by Japan. And now, from being two years ago an appreciated friend of the nations that were in distress, we shall become, if this committee recommendation shall be made the action of the Senate, an international bully, selecting the most offensive way in which to accomplish that which is in itself dishonorable. And the absolute futility of the action is as conspicuous as its impropriety.

"Do the American people realize that this position has been deliberately avowed by a Senate committee and that there is grave danger that it will be accepted by the Senate itself?

"This is not a political issue; it is an issue in which the honor of the American people is involved, and it is the paramount duty of religious leaders of the Nation to demand that the Senate act both honorably and courteously toward those nations that have solemnly entered into treaty obligations with each other, which obligations now they must fulfill.

"And it should be made perfectly clear to those who are promoting this act of national perfidy in the Senate that the religious sense of the Nation will hold them personally responsible, and any political party which may uphold them politically responsible, for what will have become the blackest chapter in American history.

"All that our boys have won in France for American prestige and American honor is now being seriously imperiled by the men who bear the responsibility of the American people in the Senate.

"We shall hope that this may be thoroughly understood throughout the country, and that the conscience of the American people will assert itself in demands upon their Senators that they emphatically reject the amendment which has been proposed by their Committee on Foreign Affairs."

ADDRESS BY HON. WESLEY O. HOWARD.

Mr. CALDER. I ask unanimous consent for the printing in the RECORD of an address delivered by Hon. Wesley O. Howard, supreme court justice of the third judicial district of New York, entitled "The Destiny of the Stars and Stripes."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE DESTINY OF THE STARS AND STRIPES.

[By Wesley O. Howard, Supreme Court Justice, Third Judicial District.]

"Under the covenant of the league of nations the United States can never expand; under the Stars and Stripes it will expand.

"From the thirteen Colonies fringing the Atlantic seaboard, the United States has expanded across the continent; expanded over the Arctic Circle; expanded into the heart of the Pacific Ocean; expanded into the Orient; expanded across the Isthmus of Panama; expanded into the torrid zone. If the doctrine of the league of nations had been proclaimed at the close of the Revolutionary War, the United States would have been to-day, as Chile is, only a long, narrow strip of territory bordering the sea.

"But the first century of our existence was an age of rugged, primitive men. Stalwart statesmen lived then; statesmen who acted and conquered, who explored and expanded—and never dreamed.

"In these days of altruism, while the affairs of Europe are absorbing the activities of statesmen and sapping the energies of the Nation, and while the advice of Washington and the doctrine of Jefferson are being repudiated, and while foreign entanglements, instead of domestic development, are being cultivated, and while the frontiers of the British Empire, instead of the border lines of the United States, are being extended—in the midst of this astounding departure from our settled policy of government, it is well to divert the attention of the people for a moment from exotic problems and direct it to the history and fame of America.

WONDER OF THE AGES.

"Our long struggle for independence, our adoption of a republican form of government, our inimitable Federal Constitution, our sturdy resentment of foreign aggression, our marvelous growth and development, our rational laws and salubrious institutions, our firm cohesion after the turmoil and devastation of the Civil War, our limitless resources and enormous wealth—all these have excited the wonder and admiration of the world.

"Our wide expanse of fertile lands, our abundant crops, our railroads, our mines, our canals, our cities, our finances, our skyscrapers, our forests, our public buildings, our capitalists, our manufactories, our water powers, our scenery, our climate, are unsurpassed within the borders of any other nation on the earth. And all this has been attained by the policy of attending to our own business.

"Notwithstanding the altruistic dogmas of to-day, one can not help but admire the rugged, robust, picturesque, conquering characters of our early history. The thirteen Colonies constituted only a slender strip of territory along the Atlantic Ocean, extending from Maine to Florida. They each laid claim to territories far to the westward of their established habitations, but these territories were neither bounded, known, nor settled.

"The bold pioneers began to crowd westward toward the Mississippi. Before the revolution William Bean had crossed the Alleghenies and built a log cabin in Tennessee on the banks of the Watauga. Daniel Boone had invaded the primeval solitude of Kentucky, and John C. Symmes had settled in the wildness north of the Ohio. These were encroachments upon the lands of the Indians.

THE GREAT PURCHASE.

"But the expansion of the United States by the acquisition of alien territory from European powers did not commence until the administration of Thomas Jefferson. There was no provision in the Constitution either for the acquisition or the government of new domains. But Jefferson was a practical as well as a farsighted statesman. He not only looked into the future to some extent and saw the vast possibilities of the immense territory known as Louisiana, but he adopted measures not recognized by the Constitution for acquiring it.

"And thus in 1803, for the insignificant sum of $15,000,000—less than the cost to us of one day of the European war—1,000,000 square miles of the richest land on the surface of the earth were added to the dominions of the United States. In 1815 England undertook to wrest this splendid province from us, but Andrew Jackson, at the Battle of New Orleans, ignominiously defeated the invaders and drove them back into the Gulf of Mexico.

"Nearly three years before the purchase of Louisiana, in his inaugural address, Jefferson had reiterated Washington's doctrine that the United States would not meddle in European politics. He epitomized the great American principle in one laconic expression—'Honest friendship with all nations, entangling alliances with none.' Although Spanish interference with the free navigation of the Mississippi River was the immediate incentive to the purchase of Louisiana, nevertheless Jefferson, in a degree, anticipated the 'Monroe doctrine' when he acquired Louisiana, for his desire to purchase this French territory grew largely out of his wish to remove all temptation on the part of European nations to meddle in America.

MOVING ONWARD.

"Florida was added next as one of the realms of the Republic. The courage and impetuosity of Andrew Jeckson were the immediate cause of the acquisition of this beautiful land of sunshine, oranges, and flowers. In the War of 1812 the Creek Indians were the allies of England. Jackson drove them out of the United States and they fled to Florida and took refuge with the Seminoles. But they were not content in the security of that Spanish territory. Continuously hostile bands of savages burst over the frontier to maraud, murder, ravage, and wreak vengeance. Gen. Jackson was sent to the border to protect the American settlements; but he had never heard of 'watchful waiting,' and with characteristic decision he rushed over the Spanish boundary line, captured two Spanish forts, hanged two English spies, and dispersed the lawless Indians. This rashness evoked vigorous protests from Spain and finally led to the cession of Florida to the United States, in 1819, for the consideration of $5,000,000.

"Next came Texas. And this introduces another stalwart, resolute, dramatic, picturesque American hero—Sam Houston. Progressing by rapid strides to the very forefront in public life, Sam Houston, at the age of 34, was elected governor of Tennessee. Soon afterwards he was married to Eliza Allen, the daughter of a wealthy and aristocratic family, and one of the most estimable and accomplished ladies of the State. Three months afterwards, suddenly, dramatically, and without assigning any cause, Houston separated from his wife, resigned his office as governor of Tennessee, left the State, crossed the Mississippi River, plunged into the wilderness, joined the Cherokee Indians, adopted the costume of the savages, took a squaw to be his spouse, sat in the doorway of his wigwam while she parched his corn, assumed the Indian name of Co-lon-neh, became a subchief under the great Oolooteka, and for more than three years lived the life of a barbarian.

TWO PIONEERS.

"Then he went to Texas. Andrew Jackson was at that time President of the United States. He was a friend of Houston, and he greatly admired the daring, erratic, picturesque frontiersman and adventurer. The age of altruism had not yet arrived. Americanism was rampant then, and Andrew Jackson and Sam Houston were Americans of the primitive type. It was their policy not to meddle with European boundary lines, but to expand the American frontiers. They were not interested in the Jugo-Slavs, but they wanted Texas, and they proposed to take it. Secretly, Jackson lent aid to the Texas rebels. Houston was chosen commander in chief of the rebel army; he defeated the Mexicans in the decisive Battle of San Jacinto; he captured their president, Santa Anna; and he secured the independence of the Lone Star State.

"The annexation of Texas followed, and then came war with Mexico and the conquest of that Republic. A vast area covering more than 500,000 square miles was wrested from Mexico and added to the public domain. This included what is now California, Nevada, Utah, most of New Mexico and Arizona, and parts of Wyoming and Colorado. Later the 'Gadsden Purchase' was negotiated, and another area about as large as the State of New York was acquired from Mexico. In the meantime England withdrew from her 'joint occupation' of Oregon, and that rich region became absolutely American.

"In 1867 Alaska was purchased from Russia for $7,200,000. In 1898 the Hawaiian Islands were annexed. The Spanish War brought us Guam, Porto Rico, and the Philippines. In 1904 Theodore Roosevelt 'took the Panama Canal Zone,' to use his own expression, 'while Congress debated' the subject. In 1917 the Virgin Islands were purchased from Denmark.

"And this completes the far-flung dominions of the United States. Not one foot of this territory do we regret having acquired; not one foot of it will we ever surrender. Every American feels proud of every province, and every province feels secure under the American flag.

WHEN WASHINGTON SPOKE.

"Washington's advice to the United States to keep out of foreign entanglements, and Monroe's scheme of keeping foreign entanglements out of the United States, have become welded together into a rigid fundamental American doctrine which has been observed by every President of the United States up to the inauguration of Woodrow Wilson. By adhering to this basic principle of government, and by devoting our energies to our own development and expansion, the United States has progressed with amazing strides until she is to-day one of the giants among the Governments of the earth.

"But suddenly this wise policy pursued by a long line of American Presidents is to be reversed and we are to step our feet into a network of foreign entanglements covering the surface of every continent on the globe. This precipitate plunge from the solid planks placed under our feet by the fathers of the Republic, this reckless leap into the intricate meshes of European intrigue and oriental duplicity, stagger the sober-minded American citizen. The standing armies, the enormous navies, the huge national debts, the ominous war clouds, the rival dynasties, the dubious frontiers, the crowding populations, the racial hatreds—all these European plagues which we have looked upon at a distance now loom up immediately before our eyes. These are the foreign entanglements which Washington foresaw and which Jefferson dreaded and Monroe shunned.

"But we are rushed on so hastily from the paths of prudence into the quagmires of danger that we are not allowed to halt and inquire whither we go. In fact, scarcely anybody dares to inquire. It is almost lese majesty to inquire. Therefore the timid and the irresolute go along with the multitude. Now and then a robust character halts to warn the thoughtless throng. He stops to examine the chart of the Republic, but his temerity rouses the voice of intolerant clamor. He assumes to quote the words of the early patriots, but he is met with ridicule and contempt. He protests at the desertion of Ireland, but he is told that England, the mandatory of small nations, is to continue to act as the benefactor and ruler of the Celtic race. He is shocked at the betrayal of China and the barter of Shantung, but the unselfish and philanthropic purposes of Japan have convinced the President that this apparent perfidy is in fact probity, and the common citizen should ask no more.

IN HEADLONG HASTE.

"And so, with headlong haste, the Nation rushes on. The citizen who stops to reason and inquire is overwhelmed with resentment. The subtleties and complexities of the covenant of the league of nations are answered by the ambiguities and generalities of Executive eloquence. The obligations imposed by article 10 appear far-reaching and momentous. Even the partisans of the President hesitate to espouse this provision of the charter. Perhaps the ordinary mind can not accurately analyze the purport of this significant clause, but construed by the common standards of interpretation it would seem that the United States has contracted to equip armies to assist in policing the world; contracted to help guard the frontiers of France and picket the outposts of England; contracted to guarantee the stolen borders of imperial Japan against encroachment by the republican armies of China.

"And what are we to get out of this? How are the tax-burdened people of the United States to profit by assuming these heavy obligations? The enthusiast, the partisan, and the sycophant do not wish to know. 'The President wants it,' they say, and that is enough. Serious citizens, however, some of them, pause occasionally to ask, under their breath, why it is that the fundamental principles of our Government, our individuality, and our national life are to be abandoned suddenly and the doctrine of internationalism espoused? Has Americanism failed us? Has the Constitution of the United States become inadequate? Let us see.

"There is some reason, other than chance, why the United States has grown to such immense proportions. All the nations on the continent of South America combined together do not equal us either in population, resources, wealth, or power. No nation in Europe or in the world, barring Great Britain, approaches us in magnitude. In population there are only two that surpass us—Great Britain and China. Up to the time we launched into the European war not one of the great powers of the earth was so free from the crushing burden of national debts as the United States.

"To what must we attribute this unparalleled progress? The answer is apparent. It is chiefly to the wisdom of our forefathers in adopting the Constitution of the United States and thus laying the foundation stones of the Republic that our grandeur must be ascribed. It must not be supposed, however, that the Constitution was agreed upon suddenly or unanimously. Indeed, the exact contrary is the fact. It took the convention at Philadelphia four months to frame it, and many times during that memorable session the delegates despaired of the result. Finally, in September, 1787, the imperishable document was completed and submitted to the people. But then the most violent opposition broke out against it.

GIANTS OF THOSE DAYS.

"Patrick Henry—eloquent, powerful, patriotic, impassioned—denounced it. John Randolph of Roanoke, with the blood of Pocahontas running in his veins, tall, lean, eccentric, sarcastic, although a mere boy at that time, opposed it. Luther Martin, the 'most formidable of American advocates,' but so improvident that every other lawyer of Maryland was forced by statute to contribute $5 a year toward his support—he bitterly attacked it.

"The great weight of Washington's influence was cast on the side of the Constitution. Calm, patient, dignified, trusting in the hand of Providence, he reasoned with his countrymen. Benjamin Franklin, gray haired, sagacious, philosophic, exerted his powerful logic in favor of its adoption. But Alexander Hamilton was the foremost champion of the Constitution. Born in the West Indies, he was, at the age of 30, the genius of that momentous epoch. He wrote most of the able arguments which afterwards became the Federalist, and he swung the New York Legislature into line, and the battle was won.

"There can be no doubt that this solid foundation gave stability to the superstructure of state. But in no less degree did the policy of our first President give it stability, the policy of avoiding European entanglements. Those early patriots were gifted with almost supernatural penetration. They read the future; they saw the shoals of danger.

"But it was their fortitude that contributed in no less degree than their wisdom to the straightforward progress of the ship of state. They were neither opportunists nor idealists. Doggedly they stood steadfast against the storms of public clamor. In 1793 England, Prussia, Austria, and other allied monarchies were waging war on the newborn Republic of France. Washington was President. Only 12 years had elapsed since Lafayette, at the head of the French forces, stood by the side of Washington at the surrender of Cornwallis. The sense of gratitude to France was fresh and keen in the heart of every patriot. A great tidal wave of sympathy rolled over the land for France. The people were overwhelmingly in favor of lending assistance to the infant Republic in her day of needs, as she, while yet a monarchy, had lent it to us in our hour of disaster. But with calm determination Washington resisted the uproar and indignation of the people, and on April 22, 1793, he issued his famous 'Proclamation of Neutrality.' This seemed to the people of the United States like the most despicable ingratitude, but with a depth of understanding which transcends the vision of the idealist Washington saw that the integrity of this Republic, as well as its prosperity, depended upon its standing absolutely aloof from the tangles and turmoils of European politics.

TIMES HAVE CHANGED.

"One hundred and thirty-nine years have elapsed since France helped us to win our independence. Gratitude to France was a thousand times more urgent when Washington was President than it is to-day, and yet the Father of his Country proclaimed at that time that gratitude should not urge the United States into a war in Europe. Nevertheless, assigning gratitude as his only incentive, and in direct contravention of the precedent established by Washington, and at a time when neither gratitude nor public clamor demands it, Mr. Wilson signs a treaty of alliance in Paris pledging the United States to fight in the wars of Europe in case of the invasion of France. Thus not only is the doctrine of Washington abrogated, but his reasoning is repudiated.

"The covenant of the league of nations is a world constitution. If it is ever adopted, it will supersede the Constitution of the United States, not in every particular, it is true, but in many of the most essential particulars. The Constitution of the United States will no longer be the supreme law of this country. To the extent that the United States does not surrender its sovereignty in the new document to the league of nations, the Constitution will, of course, remain intact; and then the remnant of our Constitution will bear much the same relation to the covenant of the league of nations as our State constitutions bear to the Federal Constitution.

"The league of nations is a scheme of stagnation. No nation is to grow, none is to diminish. The great nations are to remain great; the little nations are to remain small. The powerful nations are to remain powerful; the weak nations are to remain insignificant.

"And not only is the league of nations a scheme of stagnation, but it is a contrivance of subjugation. Under article 22 the peoples of the greater part of Africa are forbidden to bear arms, build fortifications, establish naval bases, or practice military training. This is the most dangerous device of tyranny. It has been employed by the strong against the weak in every age of the human race. It is a device not only of civilization but of savagery. The Iroquois Indians knew the deadly effect of forbidding subjugated peoples to bear arms. Three hundred years ago they formed a league of nations—'the five nations'—and in their league of nations they pursued exactly the same device of oppression which is ingrafted in the covenant of the league of nations. The most notable instance of this was in their overthrow of the Lenapes. This conquered nation was not only held in subjugation by the Iroquois and compelled to adopt the name of women, but was forbidden to bear arms.

SEES EXPANSION'S END.

"The end of our territorial expansion has come if the league of nations be adopted. Inertia, not energy, will henceforth mark the national life. Ambition can no longer urge America on to her destiny. Her boundary lines will be fixed forever. But that can never be. The Stars and Stripes is more potent than the league of nations, and under this banner the United States will march on to future achievements.

"To the south of us lies Mexico, a country blessed with every advantage of nature and cursed with every defect of government. At the time of the discovery of America a vast empire, stretching far and wide over the land, occupied much of the same territory now included within the borders of the Mexican Republic. Populous cities, immense public buildings, spacious open squares, great highways, standing armies, formidable ramparts, imposing temples, luxuriant gardens, laws, courts, police, turrets, baths, aqueducts, causeways—these constituted the empire of the Aztecs.

"The ancient City of Mexico itself lay in a splendid valley approximately 7,500 feet above the sea level, and at the time that Cortez invaded the country it contained, according to the estimate of historians, 60,000 buildings and 300,000 inhabitants and was twice as large as the city of London was at that time. Like Venice, Mexico was built on an archipelago of small islands and was penetrated by a system of canals. It was planted in the waters of a magnificent lake on the bosom of which floated innumerable wandering islands covered with voluptuous flowers, delicious fruits, and luxuriant verdure. This metropolis of the Aztec empire was founded in 1325, nearly 200 years before its conquest by Cortez.

"In November, 1519, Cortez, with his soldiers, entered the palace of Montezuma, treacherously seized the person of the emperor, overthrew the government of the Aztecs, and established the rule of Spain in the empire. From that day to this, barring the period of the dictatorship of Porfirio Diaz, Mexico has been the scene of misgovernment, oppression, disorder, bloodshed, revolution, confusion, and chaos. No stable government has ever been established. There is no security for life, liberty, or property. For the last five or six years the country has writhed in the throes of revolution. One bloodthirsty chieftain succeeds another, and the land is distracted by rapine, murder, famine, and disease. The ferocious Mexican soldiery are not content with butchering each other, but repeatedly they make forays across the border, murdering, robbing, and outraging American citizens.

"This condition of affairs can not last. The period of 'watchful waiting' is almost ended. Soon the American Army will cross over the Rio Grande as it did when Zachary Taylor was in command, and soon our battleships will enter the harbor of Vera Cruz as they did when Gen. Scott marched to the Mexican capital over the route of Cortez. And then, when we invade Mexico the next time, the Stars and Stripes will be once more unfurled over the site of the ancient palace of Montezuma, never to be hauled down again.

"When this is accomplished Mexico will enjoy the blessings of good government. With lands, forests, mines, harbors, climate, oil wells, and other natural resources unsurpassed on any continent of the globe, Mexico will then be one of the most prosperous regions of the earth.

"When the subject comes up squarely for consideration, as it inevitably will in the near future, there will be much opposition to the annexation of Mexico. Internationalism, instead of expansion, is the policy to-day of the Democratic Party. Thomas Jefferson, however, the founder of the Democratic Party, was an expansionist; but his vision of expansion reached far beyond Mexico. In a letter to James Monroe in 1801 he said:

"However our present interests may restrain us within our own limits, it is impossible not to look forward to distant times, when our rapid multiplication will expand itself beyond those limits and cover the whole northern, if not the southern, continent.

"When Jefferson made this prophecy the doctrine of inertia propounded by the league of nations had not yet been proclaimed. But notwithstanding that doctrine, Jefferson's prediction will come true, for it is destiny, not treaties, that shapes the course of nations. And destiny has decreed that the Stars and Stripes shall float over every foot of North America from the Arctic Ocean to the Gulf of Darien."

TRAVEL PAY IN THE REGULAR ARMY.

H. J. Res. 175, joint resolution to provide for the payment of travel pay upon discharge to men of the Regular Army enlisted prior to April 2, 1917, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, in regard to the joint resolution just received from the House and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, I desire to say that I have taken the liberty of polling the Committee on Military Affairs in order to ascertain their judgment on the measure and secure action, if possible, to-day, and a substantial majority of the committee have signified their assent to the terms of the joint resolution.

There is an excellent reason, I believe, why the joint resolution might probably be passed to-day, if the Senate consents. It authorizes the payment to men of the Regular Army whose terms of enlistment in active service are about to expire of the same travel pay and bonus that has been paid to soldiers of the emergency Army under similar circumstances. It so happens that a ruling from the department is to the effect that these men who were members of the Regular Army before we went into the war against Germany are not to have the same benefit with respect to travel pay and bonus as men of the emergency Army. The law thereby discriminates against these veteran soldiers, many thousands of whom are in the First Division, which is to parade here to-morrow. I was about to, and do now, ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 175) to provide for the payment of travel pay upon discharge to men of the Regular Army enlisted prior to April 2, 1917, reporting it, as I do, from the Committee on Military Affairs, and I submit a report (No. 195) thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. The joint resolution is reported from the committee, as I understand?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; I report it back favorably.

Mr. SMOOT. And the Senator asks unanimous consent for its immediate consideration?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, and it was read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That those enlisted men of the Army who enlisted in the Regular Army prior to April 2, 1917, and who have accepted or may accept their discharge from such enlistment in order to reenlist under the terms of the act entitled "An act to authorize the resumption of voluntary enlistment in the Regular Army, and for other purposes," approved February 28, 1919, shall upon such discharge receive travel pay at the rate provided in the act entitled "An act permitting any person who has served in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the present war to retain his uniform and personal equipment, and to wear the same under certain conditions," approved February 28, 1919, from the place of such discharge to their actual bona fide home or residence or original muster into the service, as they may elect. The Secretary of War is authorized to discharge any or all of these men enlisted prior to April 2, 1917, who desire discharge from their old enlistment for the purpose of so reenlisting, regardless of whether or not the period of their original contract or enlistment has been completed: Provided,

That in case any enlisted man has been or hereafter shall be discharged for the purpose of reenlisting in the Regular Army, he shall be entitled to the payment of $60 as provided in section 1406 of the act entitled "An act to provide revenue, and for other purposes," approved February 24, 1919.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 5000. An act to allow credit for husbands' military service in case of homestead entries by widows, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

H. R. 5007. An act granting citizenship to certain Indians was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

H. R. 9091. An act granting the consent of the Congress to the county of Hennepin to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Minnesota River was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

H. R. 9203 An act to punish the transportation of stolen motor vehicles in interstate or foreign commerce was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

HEIGHT OF BUILDINGS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I should like to ask a question of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia.

I note that a few days ago Senate bill 2945, with reference to the height of buildings in the District of Columbia, was reported from the committee and is now on the calendar. I desire to ask if the Senator would have any objection to having that bill recommitted to the committee, in order that the persons affected may have an opportunity to be heard?

Mr. SHERMAN. The bill is one introduced by the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN]. I have no objection, if the Senator from California has none, to having the bill recommitted to the committee, in order that hearings may be had upon it.

Mr. PHELAN. I have no objection to the recommitment of the bill for the purpose of having hearings. There seems to be some question as to the measurements. The bill was prepared by the Fine Arts Commission, I think, under the impression that where the building adjoins Meridian Hill Park it was to reach a height of 85 feet. As a matter of fact it reaches a height of 77 feet, and the bill calls for a height of 75 feet. I think, under those circumstances, it would be well to have a hearing.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill will be recommitted to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

THANKS OF CONGRESS TO GEN. PERSHING.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 211) tendering the thanks of the American people and the Congress of the United States to Gen. John J. Pershing, and to the officers and men of the American Expeditionary Forces, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res 211) tendering the thanks of the American people and the Congress of the United States to Gen. John J. Pershing, and to the officers and men of the American Expeditionary Forces, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am authorized by the members of the Committee on Military Affairs to report back favorably the joint resolution, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the thanks of the American people and of the Congress of the United States are due, and are hereby tendered, to Gen. John J. Pershing for his highly distinguished services as commander in chief of the American Expeditionary Forces in Europe, and to the officers and men under his command for their unwavering devotion and heroic valor throughout the war.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning business is closed and the calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Hale	McNary	Smith, Md.
Beckham	Harding	Moses	Smoot
Brandegee	Harris	Nelson	Spencer
Calder	Harrison	New	Stanley
Capper	Henderson	Newberry	Sterling
Chamberlain	Hitchcock	Norris	Sutherland
Colt	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nugent	Swanson
Culberson	Jones, N. Mex.	Overman	Thomas
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Page	Townsend
Curtis	Kenyon	Phelan	Trammell
Dillingham	Keyes	Phipps	Underwood
Edge	Kirby	Pittman	Wadsworth
Fletcher	Knox	Pomerene	Walsh, Mont.
France	Lenroot	Sheppard	Warren
Gay	Lodge	Sherman	Watson
Gerry	McKellar	Simmons	Williams
Gronna	McLean	Smith, Ga.	Wolcott

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent from the Senate on account of illness in his family. I desire also to announce that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] is detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], and the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] are detained from the Senate on public business. The junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] are also detained from the Senate on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Sixty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business in open session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. LODGE. I now call up the treaty of peace with Germany.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the treaty of peace with Germany.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to announce that on Friday, if the Senate is in session, I shall address the Senate on certain phases of the league of nations.

Mr. SHERMAN. Is it agreeable for me to proceed on the treaty?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; I expected the Senator from Illinois to proceed.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the treaty and the league of nations are so printed and referred to us as to constitute one document. The report of the minority, made September 11, 1919, printed as Report 176, part 2, on page 5, makes a general summary of what the league, as well as the treaty, would do.

It is the only plan proposed to redeem the world from war, pestilence, and famine.

These are very extensive claims, Mr. President. Since the beginning of history those scourges have devastated the world. If we have now discovered a cure or a preventive for those calamities to which the human race has been subject it certainly marks an era in the history of the world. I wish it were so. Very gladly would I support any measure of that character.

It has been assumed, however, in the discussion of the league and the treaty by its advocates, that these desired blessings would instantly result from its ratification and adoption by the various nations sought to be brought under its benign sway. The assumption of these manifold benefits constitutes, however, the substance of the discussion. We do not grant the assumption.

There are various phases of this discussion presented. Today I particularly wish to keep in mind the alleged indebtedness this country owes to Europe, or possibly, as claimed, to the whole world.

Mr. President, while seeming to labor under the impression that the chief aim of the American people is to serve as hewers of wood and drawers of water for Europe, the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] addressed the Senate September 3, 1919, demanding the immediate ratification of the German treaty. Through his entire discourse runs a somewhat querulous note admonishing us we had not done enough for the expectant peoples of the Old World. They would be grievously disappointed if we do not continue to pour out our wealth and spill our blood in all their future controversies. He repeats our good President's belief that their hearts will break unless we mingle in their frays forever.

Deserters it is suggested we would indeed be, the Senator cried out, unless we gave even to our ultimate extinction. Having already given the service of 3,700,000 of our country's young men, 2,000,000 in actual service and 1,700,000 in camps awaiting further call, and $35,000,000,000 of our taxes in a war made exclusively in Europe, the Senator stigmatizes a refusal to give if required all we have left as the acts of poltroons and even cowards. This great sacrifice the President, in his Boston address last February, called "a little essay at generosity." If this be a little essay at generosity, Mr. President, then a more extensive essay would leave us bankrupt and exhausted.

The future generations, however, who pay war taxes and keep alive the memory of their dead will, like the living, resent such an allusion. The good Samaritan is smitten with a dog-day madness when he unlooses his fancy thus to run away. Because we fought this war with our associated nations against a common German danger, it is now demanded we pledge ourselves to fight in every future war whether our own safety is concerned or not. After reflecting that our strength contributed to win a great war, with no annexations and no indemnities, the Senator insists we devote the remaining energies of the American people to taking territory, making reparations, and collecting indemnities for the victorious powers of Europe and Asia.

Long ago the President sounded the altruistic slogan of peace without victory to any of the European belligerents. What a mighty gulf yawns to-day between the time of that demand—January 22, 1917—and this treaty! Then he sought to commit us to an indecisive end of the war with no terms imposed and no penalties inflicted. We were then a neutral country, but its President sought to meddle with and to advise the belligerents to conclude their hostilities, leaving Germany wholly unpunished. At that time Germany's crimes against humanity were accomplished.

The book of fate had been closed, and nothing remained but for the impartial historian to record upon his tablets what had occurred.

Her guilt called as loudly for expiation as when our President sat at the peace table, or when he proclaimed his now extinct fourteen points. On one principle, and one only, the Senate and the President have agreed. We ask no material gain for our country.

Yet after the President sat with the representatives of the Allies he stripped Germany of her territory on three continents and every sea. Vast quantities of property and huge sums devoted to reparation are exacted. Not only is such a victory interwoven with the peace terms embodied in this treaty but the entire gigantic spoil of war is given the Allies. Our responsibility is solely to join in enforcing the treaty and securing those benefits for others. Germany's punishment is merited. Weighed by Old World standards, and particularly by Great Britain, France, and Belgium, Germany deserves the tremendous penalties inflicted. Bismarck set the example and history is filled with precedents. The victors' stern decrees ought not be abated or mitigated by so much as a single article. It is for those who impose such terms to weigh their value and calculate well their future power to enforce them. If the President's responsibility be gauged by all his known utterances, the punishment imposed is not of his making. Why, then, should we weight ourselves and our posterity with the bloody service of inflicting it, because so surely as this planet circles in its orbit time will harvest the usual result. I oppose pledging our Government to defend Europe's spoils of war, which are not the pledges of peace but gages of battle.

This is the sole question discussed by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX]. He explicitly avows the justice of the terms from the angle of the Allies. He is unwilling to impose the huge burden of this treaty on the American people.

We receive no benefits except the incidental one in the event of the future occurrence of a like danger, and of a friendly ally to be met when that emergency shall have presented itself.

For this same attitude his course has been assailed as one of cowardice and poltroonery. Such a charge to me, Mr. President, seems characteristic of those who would rather do a foolish act of their own than adopt the wise act of another, for we have now reached that crisis in our affairs where we must choose between exhausting ourselves to make the Old World safe for some of its nations and making the United States safe for the American people.

No such colossal prize of conquest ever before passed from a vanquished enemy by the fortunes of war. Every map of the Old World's three continents and the islands and waters of their seas must be retraced by the cartographer to delineate the mighty changes wrought by this treaty.

If its articles be executed and kept without bloodshed in the years to come, then, indeed, has man, in his essential nature, been changed. If this treaty shall endure, Great Britain has reached the summit of her world empire in the thousand years since Alfred drove the Danes from England and set his nation on the course of her imperial dominion. For this great people we have no envy, no jealousy of power, no unfriendly rivalry in her wide sway on land and sea. We believe she will in the fullness of time rule temperately and administer justice to all her possessions.

But we can not forget the elemental difference between our country and Great Britain. We inhabit a continent, not an island. Our domain is compact, sufficient in itself to supply all our wants and furnish every necessary instrument of self-defense. Providence never before so abundantly endowed a nation with the facilities to be and continue great and powerful by remaining at home and attending to its own business. Nothing requires us to scatter our strength over earth's seven seas and dissipate our energies and resources in crusading in the affairs of every warring people except an impossible idealism drunk with phrase making and cajoled by European diplomacy into spending our national strength to underwrite the war risks of Europe, Asia, and Africa.

But, exclaims the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK]:

> The United States is young; the United States is strong; the United States is rich. It alone of all the nations of the world is able at the present moment to confer upon the world, the distressed and despairing world, benefits such as no other nation can confer.

Because we are young and strong and rich, shall we therefore beggar our people, bankrupt our industries, and exhaust our resources? If we had before this time mingled with Europe's ceaseless wars, all her quarrels, we would long since have squandered our inheritance and been unable to care for ourselves or help others in this great crisis as we have done. The Senator advocates prodigal obligations and further heavy burdens imposed upon the American people. When we reply that we have sacrificed enough life, borne enough of war taxes, that we are content for the benefits of victory to pass to other powers, leaving us the security of self-defense incident to a joint victory and friendly relations if like dangers recur, the Senator declares that such a course is that of deserters and poltroons.

What would be the burden falling upon us by the most natural method of computation under the league and the treaty if both were ratified by the required two-thirds majority of this body? We are at present, outside of two oriental nations, one a colony and the other an independent nation subject to the aggression of every power in the world—we are, with the exception of British East India and the Chinese Republic, the largest one Nation in the world excepting only Russia. It is a mixed population and at present no one knows its future. With 110,000,000 population, with a wealth estimated last July by the Census Bureau at this Capital of $250,000,000,000 of private taxable wealth, I ask what would be the share apportioned to this country if the burdens under this treaty and league be assumed? I know in peace of but one way of distributing burdens. It is by exercising the sovereign power of taxation. In war we exercise both the power of taxation and the taking of our men. What is the basis of contribution? We contribute taxes in proportion to our means, and we contribute men in proportion to our military population. Based upon those two inevitable grounds, the burden put upon this country would exceed that of any other country in the league. We have the largest population of any of the proposed signatory nations—32 signatory and 13 to be invited. Of all those powers our military strength is the greatest. We have as much private taxable property as almost the entire European continent. When it came to the distribution of financial burdens of carrying out the obligations of these various articles, we would pay in proportion to our taxable wealth. As we are supposed to be the wealthiest Nation in the world, we would pay more than all the powers in Europe, either the Central Powers or the Allies, when it came to the financial contribution. There is always a practical way which statesmen and diplomats adopt in distributing these burdens.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SUTHERLAND in the chair). Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator has quoted me, and I wish to refer to that for a minute. The Senator is in error in assuming that the advocates of the treaty believe that it will impose burdens upon the United States. We are firmly of the opinion that in reduced taxes it will save the United States immense sums of money, because we believe, if the league of nations is not established, the United States, like other nations of the world, must take the only alternative that remains and prepare for war upon a larger scale than ever before. We believe that can be escaped and all those great burdens of war saved to this country if we enter into the league. So I wish to assure the Senator at the outset that instead of being willing to assume great burdens as a member of the league of nations, we believe it will save the United States thousands of millions of dollars in future expenditures.

I should like to ask the Senator, in conclusion, to what section of the treaty he refers or to what article of the league of nations he refers in assuming that of the small burdens that will be involved in maintaining the league of nations the United States must pay the largest part? Of course, he must have some warrant for making that statement. I ask him to point it out.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will gladly do so. It is because the council, in the event of emergencies arising, shall advise the means by which the threatened emergency may be averted. The President has said that such advice becomes not obligatory but consists in the nature of a moral obligation. The council have entire discretion in advising. They can apportion the financial burdens and the military levies, as well as the Navy if it be required, that the nations shall contribute to meet any pressing emergency which they consider. That power in the league, Mr. President, is all-sufficient as the foundation of the criticism I am making.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I shall come to article 10 in a minute, but I wish to remind the Senator that the only provision in the league of nations for the raising of expenditures consists of a statement that they shall be borne by all the nations of the world on the same basis that postal charges and expenses are provided for in the Postal Union. There is no other provision made for ascertaining and paying the expenses of the league of nations.

Then, coming to article 10, from which the Senator quotes, I wish to call his attention to the fact, in the first place, that the United States is named as the first member of the council. It is a member in perpetuity, always there, and the council, when an emergency arises, is charged with the duty of advising the nations what they should contribute in forces that may be necessary to preserve the peace of the world. That council can only act by agreement; that is, by unanimity. It requires the vote of the representative of the United States on that council even to give the advice, and the representatives of the United States on that council is under the control of the Government of the United States. So the advice can not even be given to the United States without the approval of the Government of the United States, and after the advice is given it still remains for the constitutional authorities in each country to decide whether the advice shall be accepted or not.

Mr. SHERMAN. The expenditures contemplated by the Postal Union basis are merely the operating expenses of the secretariat of the league. I do not think, I am certain, they do not cover the expenses incident to any great emergency, whether it be a demonstration to avert war or the actual levy to conduct the war. War, when it proceeds to that extremity under the league, is not an expense of the league that is referred to in the distribution provided in the Postal Union basis. That is merely for the operating expenses of the league. The secretary general of the secretariat, which is the executive body that always remains, is apparently a fixed perpetual charge upon the league. To Sir Eric Drummond's salary we must contribute. To all of his staff of helpers we must contribute. To the building, the rents, the clerical help, the printing bills, the telegraph, the telephone, all the incidental charges to the maintenance of that office, the United States must contribute in proportion as provided by the rules of the Postal Union. The last paragraph of article 5 expressly limits the expenses to be apportioned on the Postal Union basis to the expenses of the secretariat.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. In just a moment. But if it came to war, that is a matter which is in the discretion of the council of the league, and is not limited by the reading of article 5 to the Postal Union basis.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator is mistaken. It is not in the discretion of the council. The council has no power except to give advice, and the advice can not be given except by unanimity, and unanimity can not occur except with the vote of the representative of the United States, who is under the control of Congress.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will come to that in a moment. The Senator in part quoted that before. I yield to the Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Before the Senator from Illinois goes further in the discussion of that feature of the matter, I desire to correct the statement made by him concerning the attitude of the President with relation to article 10, to which he has referred. The Senator has stated that the duty devolves upon the council to advise concerning the means by which the obligation of that article is to be fulfilled, and he has quoted the President as saying that our country would be under a moral obligation to observe the advice so given. The Senator will not find any statement of that kind made by the President. The President declared not that the obligation arising under the second sentence of article 10 is a moral obligation, but the obligation arising under the first sentence of article 10, namely:

> The members of the league undertake to respect and preserve as against external aggression the territorial integrity and existing political independence of all members of the league.

The President declared there was a moral obligation upon this country to observe the provisions of that sentence; and he described it as a moral obligation because there was no provision for the enforcement of the obligation; it was left to the conscience of the country. The President never declared that there was a moral obligation to observe the provisions of the second sentence of that article, which reads:

> In case of any such aggression, or in case of any threat or danger of such aggression, the council shall advise upon the means by which this obligation shall be fulfilled.

And the President has repeatedly declared that we are at liberty to take the advice or not to take the advice as we may then determine.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Montana, in speaking of the moral obligation applied to article 10, limits that moral obligation, on the interpretation of the President, to that part of the article alone. I have understood the Senator correctly, have I, that the moral obligation is limited to that part of article 10?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. The President used the expression "moral obligation" with respect to article 10, and with respect to sentence 1 in article 10, not with respect to sentence 2.

Mr. SHERMAN. As to article 10 let it be so. There is little distinction in such a matter between a moral obligation and a duty resting in our discretion; to illustrate, we may or may not, as we see fit, obey the advice of the council under that article.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I think the word "obey" is not accurately used by the Senator from Illinois. We obey only those who have the right to command. The council has no right to command.

Mr. SHERMAN. Observe or comply with it, if the Senator prefer; obedience to a moral obligation or a discretionary power is accurate. But outside of article 10 there is no moral obligation arising from action under the other articles—for example, article 11, article 15, or article 16. Take article 16, to be specific. I am in the habit of summarizing by saying that that is the ipso facto declaration of war article, because it provides that any covenant-breaking State that commits certain acts upon another State is ipso facto declared to have committed an act of war against all the member nations of the league, and thereby we are found at war not by declaration of our constitutional authority, but we are declared to be at war by the ipso facto provisions of article 16. Whenever a covenant-breaking state has perpetrated certain acts, we are declared to be at war.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I think we are not. Article 16 merely declares that it is "an act of war."

Mr. SHERMAN. That it is "an act of war?"

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Yes; but an act of war may be perpetrated against this country without this country being at war. This country can not be at war until Congress declares war.

Mr. SHERMAN. Taking the Senator's own interpretation and assuming, then, that we are living under the league and that a covenant-breaking State commits an act of war against us, we must either go to war or must acquiesce in the insult or the injury, whichever it may be. This article binds us to join the other member nations in an economic boycott against the offender. It is true we have been so habituated by the customary aggressions on the Mexican border to acts of war being committed upon our sovereignty without paying attention to them that possibly our feelings or our national sentiments have become calloused and dead, but I shall assume that in proper time they will be made quick and alive. So an act of war under article 16 perpetrated against this country will be accepted, if we enter the league, as an act of war, and our conduct thereafter will be measured by the enormity of the act. Therefore it is either a moral obligation under article 10, or it is something to which we can pay attention as an act of war under article 16, or we can pay no attention to any of it under the provisions where there is no moral obligation. In that event the whole value of the league becomes no more than that of The Hague convention, either the one of 1899 or that of 1907. We already have what is equivalent to that interpretation of the league. If we are possessed of discretion to ignore or heed outside of article 10 at our discretion, then there is nothing binding in this league more than in the last Hague convention of 1907; in fact, it is not so good a document for general international purposes, because that does declare a code of international law. It prohibits certain barbaric practices under the ban of all civilized nations; in effect it declares a nation that perpetrates the forbidden act an international criminal that puts itself outside the pale of civilized consideration. The Senator's interpretation of this power converts it into a theory or a mere subject for debate.

Now, to recur to the matter referred to by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], that in the apportionment of expenses there will be no undue burdens placed upon us, because they must be distributed by unanimous consent of all who are sitting in the council of the league. We are one of the five permanent members of the league; we will have a representative in the league so long as it shall endure, and therefore it is argued—and it is a fair matter to be presented to the Senate—that no undue burden can fall upon us unless we consent to it, and, having consented it it, we have no further complaint to make.

There are five members of the league representing the principal allied and associated powers. They are the permanent members. It is a self-perpetuating body. When vacancies happen in the other four places they are filled by the five permanent members. Therefore the five sit on the question of distributing the burdens either of money or of men. Suppose the three European countries, Great Britain, France, and Italy, and the one Asiatic country, Japan, sitting in the council, oppose our view of the distribution. If four of the members of the council should impose upon us a certain burden to meet a given emergency and if the United States, exercising its right to veto the action of the other four, should refuse to accept the responsibility under article 10 or article 16, as imposed by the other four, then we would assume the burden of whatever error or reprobation is contained in that refusal, and there would be put upon us a moral pressure under which I would not for a moment place my country. While the requirement of unanimous action would stay the order, still it would put upon us the sole responsibility of opposing ourselves to the entire league's council, at least the European and Asiatic members of the council, because the other four being countries of Europe and Asia will reflect the sentiment of the greater part if not all the member nations of those two great continents.

There is such a thing as moral pressure upon a country, and it is always prudent to avoid being placed in that attitude. So, while the requirement of unanimous action is often invoked as our complete defense against any unfair burden, as a matter of practical affairs it is not a defense, and we ought not to put ourselves, even if there be moral pressure only, in that attitude or permit others to place us there. I am not therefore mistaken. The council does impose its will upon us if we enter the league. If we find a majority of the council against us it would be most embarrassing for us to refuse. If we were alone in our dissent it would be impossible to remain a member and refuse compliance.

I repeat, then, there is a danger that the distribution of the burden financially will be upon us; that we will have, because we are the wealthiest Nation in the world, the greater part of the burden to bear. If we refuse we will be assailed for refusing to bear our share. For instance, in article 16 it is recited:

> It shall be the duty of the council in such case to recommend to the several governments concerned what effective military, naval, or air force the members of the league shall severally contribute to the armed forces to be used to protect the covenants of the league.

That is a complete discretion in the council, subject only to be vetoed by the opposition of our country—a single voice raised against the recommendations of the council in some emergency.

In the matter of the Army or Navy we will pay in like manner in proportion to our military strength; and I repeat that we incur the obligation, moral in its character, as all obligations on a sovereign are, of paying the larger part of the financial burden and the military and naval obligations as well by going into this arrangement.

The President therefore, Mr. President, denounces all who do not follow him as contemptible quitters and vacillating time-servers, as ostriches with their heads in the sand; and the chairman of the Democratic national committee, not to be a laggard in the distribution of proper descriptive epithets, refers to those who do not support the league and the treaty as senatorial imbeciles and wretched creatures of the Senate. So we have all been properly classified. We have been under observation in the detention cell long enough to have our apt designation. Gentlemen whose orientations are perfect, political alienists, have examined us and found out, as they conceive, where we properly belong. The President himself, when it comes to quitters—and I am not disposed, when it is a mere matter of descriptive language, to lag in the rear myself—the President himself is the crowned monarch of quitters, without a rival in the Western Hemisphere. No man in public life, to say nothing of Presidents only, ever quit quicker, oftener, or so profoundly as he. His silence and speed when escaping from his imperishable principles of yesterday, to which he has just sworn his followers in eternal fealty, is as abysmal and swift as primal chaos or a fallen angel sweeping to his predestined doom. His executive echoes—a general description, Mr. President—lacking the agility and silence of their chief, make a considerable exhibition of themselves in the subordinate rôles of beating a more vociferous retreat.

What do we now owe the Old World, Mr. President? Our indebtedness to the Old World is a theme of constant discussion. Why are we charged by the Senator with desertion and poltroonery when we declare it is time we safeguarded our own country as every other country is now doing? No nation can be a Republic as our perpetual dependent ward. Who would be free himself must strike the blow. That is not only good poetry but it is good statesmanship, and it is immemorially a historical fact. Switzerland has survived amid intrigue and revolution while thrones have toppled to their fall and rulers have been swept away in the wars that have reddened Europe for 400 years. It is because she carries in her population the instinctive principles of republicanism and free government. Hereafter she survives, as she has in the past, by the strength of her own population. Shall we declare ourselves the conservator of all the nationally incompetent and unfit in the Old World? And still the league and the treaty do so. Hereafter, if we answer the President's call, mothers will but cradle their sons to fill the muster rolls of armies to give their lives in foreign wars. The future seedtime and harvest, our industrial and commercial strength, must be poured out, it is insisted, to restore the decrepit organisms arrested and smitten by despotic misrule. We must spend our substance, it is further insisted, to resurrect and redeem peoples stunted by racial faults and vices and schooled for generations in chronic revolt and general insubordination against the tranquillity of peaceful life. We are undertaking to become the guardians of all the failed nations in the world, whether they fail by their own inherent vices or by the superior strength of an aggressive power.

When we decline to undertake such burdens, which we think will ruin ourselves, wreck our Government, and destroy our country by a mad crusade around the world as the guardian general of mankind and knight-errant of oppressed humanity everywhere we are denounced as quitters and poltroons by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] and our Executive Don Quixote.

Are they not now trying to make up by the clamorous zeal of the neophyte for the wise foresight of the statesman so lamentably and conspicuously absent between 1914 and 1917? What were they doing during this fateful period when the German legions swayed and bent the line that stayed their advance to Paris and the Atlantic coast? How did those distinguished internationalists busy themselves when a half century of Prussian preparation, equipped for scientific and desolating warfare, suddenly burst on defenseless, unprepared western Europe? How did their clarion voices ring out when Belgium's woes cried to Heaven and eastern France sank under the invader's savage heel? Did they beat the skies with blatant phrase of poltroon and coward when the submarine rose from its silent depths and sent American women and their babes to their unmarked ocean grave or when the bloody, restless border hordes of Mexico left our dead in a pillaged city in the gray dawn on the soil of an American State? Then it was these valorous knights of oppressed humanity spoke earnestly of neutrality—aye, neutrality in word and act. Secure we were, far removed from the death grapple of nations. Let them alone in their struggles, which belonged and would remain across the sea. They drew about them the mantle of what they now call insular nationalism and loudly proclaimed our duty to remain within our own shores. When a systematic policy of frightfulness defied the laws of civilized warfare and shamed the savagery of barbaric ages, these distinguished vicegerents of a universal mundane protectorate declared three days after the Lusitania tragedy we were too proud to fight. They contemplated unmoved the butchery of innocence and saw with tranquillity the assaults on the only free Governments of Europe by a military despotism whose avowed purpose was to subjugate all other nations.

Against this common peril, which cast its sinister shadow across our continent, the President said:

> There is such a thing as a nation being so right that it does not need to convince others by force that it is right.

And this to the American people May 10, 1915, three days after the Lusitania went down. There were then more red-blooded Americans who felt that then was the time to assert the dignity and power of this Government in defense of our rights than at any other time upon a single given provocation.

If this principle, announced by our beloved Executive, possesses great strength, why not trust to it to enforce this treaty? He repeatedly has said it was the greatest document in the world. If this treaty is so right that its very justice will enforce it at the bar of civilized mankind, then provide no such articles as 16, as 15, as 12, as 11 in the league of nations, because they all have in the background military and naval force.

Our President opposed preparedness, and insisted that we had not been negligent in our national defense. He informed us—and we all remember the occasion—that he would not alter his attitude because some were nervous and excited. When this was uttered, December 8, 1914, the storm had already burst on Europe, and four months of destruction had laid waste Belgium and eastern France. Why, even his Secretary of War Baker nonchalantly dismissed strengthening our Army when, before a Senate committee, with a wave of his hand he made the smug statement that the war was 3,000 miles away. We went into the war pitifully unprepared. There is not a Regular Army officer that does not know it. There is not an average well-informed American citizen that did not feel it, even if he did not know it. We paid the penalty for electing a candidate who both kept us out of war and kept us from being ready to go to war. We must remember that we got both in the same operation. All who decline to engage in every war are now poltroons, contemptible quitters, and ostriches; to be more specific, with a submerged thinking apparatus. The last classic phrase would no doubt go at Princeton in a course of rhetoric as a figure of speech that has not been known hitherto to the classics.

At St. Louis September 5, 1919, the President believed we ought to advance four or five billion dollars to put Europe on its feet. We have been putting Europe on its feet for two and one-half years, either by loans or by gifts.

Is this the same official who, in 1913, compelled American banks to withdraw from the six-power Chinese loan because it might involve our Government in foreign affairs? Where are the four or five billions to come from? Taxes, more taxes—Europe's rehabilitation, taxes; the world's rehabilitation, taxes without end!

At Kansas City we learn from the President that the ratification of the peace treaty and the league is a cause greater than the Senate, greater than the United States. Our Government is created by and exists under the Constitution. The President's oath binds him to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution.

He seems to have abjured that oath and sworn a new allegiance to an alien government, created in Europe, whose capital is at Geneva. To decline to follow him abroad is to incur his epithets.

We who oppose the league and the treaty in its present form would rather desert our beloved President than to desert our country. If we must take our choice, we will let the President travel his journey alone along the course indicated by the league and the treaty. We will remain under our own Government. We believe it is greater and better for us than the instrument he brought from Paris.

So long as Senators are quoted in what they said on some occasions, it is eminently fit that I quote from an address of the Executive, delivered on May 6, 1914, when Commodore Barry's statue was unveiled at the park facing on Fourteenth Street, in Washington, when the President took occasion to make the following remarks:

> There are just as vital things stirring now that concern the existence of the Nation as were stirring then—

Referring to the time when Barry furnished his naval service—> and every man who worthily stands in this presence should examine himself and see whether he has the full conception of what it means that America should live her own life. Washington saw it when he wrote his Farewell Address. It was not merely because of passing and transient circumstances that Washington said that we must keep from entangling alliances. It was because he saw that no country had yet set its face in the same direction in which America had set her face. We can not form alliances with those who are not going our way; and in our might and majesty and in the confidence and definiteness of our own purpose we need not and we should not form alliances with any nation in the world. Those who are right, those who study their consciences in determining their policies, those who hold their honor higher than their advantage, do not need alliances.

> When we go out from this presence we ought to take this idea with us, that we, too, are devoted to the purpose of enabling America to live her own life, to be the justest, the most progressive, the most honorable, the most enlightened Nation in the world.

In his message of December 8, 1914, after the war had been declared, the President said to Congress:

> We mean to live our own lives as we will, but we mean also to let live.

On October 11, 1915, the President addressed the Daughters of the American Revolution. This was five months after the Lusitania sank, and at that time he thus advised us:

> America has schooled its heart to love the things that America believes in, and believing that America stands apart in its ideals, it ought not to allow itself to be drawn, so far as its heart is concerned, into anybody's quarrel.

Our merchant ships had been sunk, the lives of our citizens abroad had been taken, when that was uttered.

In his message to Congress in December, 1915, he further announced:

> We have stood apart, studiously neutral. It was our manifest duty to do so. Americans must have a consciousness different from the consciousness of every other nation in the world.

He was an American President when he so declared our traditional attitude. It is equally true now. The principles of the American Government have not changed since then. He was an American then, but he has changed since then. Now we are stigmatized as poltroons for adhering to the same changeless traditional principles he announced then. I submit war has not destroyed one of them. Neither will we permit the President to destroy any of them, even if he does think his league greater than our Government.

April 2, 1917, in his war message to Congress he found a united body in this Chamber and in the House when he said:

> There is one choice we can not make, we are incapable of making—we will not choose the path of submission and suffer the most sacred rights of our Nation and our people to be ignored or violated. We enter this war only where we are clearly forced into it because there are no other means of defending our rights.

In response to that statement we voted him power unbounded in armies and navies, in vast appropriations, in great delegations of domestic authority, both of which shamed the gold of Croesus and the scepter of imperial Rome. Some of us voted not because ordinarily we believed in it as a governmental principle, but because he asked for the power, and we gave him everything he asked in order that he might successfully prosecute the war.

In Congress the people of America spoke in the unbroken voice of our solid ranks because it was to defend our country, and we would not permit the most sacred rights of our Nation and people to be ignored or violated by an alien power. The spirit of Lexington and Gettysburg lived in a worthy posterity that massed themselves behind our President in the hour of national peril.

We who responded to our country's call heard with amazement the President's statement at Boston last February when he returned with the first and imperative draft of the constitution of the league of nations. We learned he had pledged our people to redeem the whole world. He is no longer Wilson, the American President of the United States. Now he is Wilson, the internationalist aspirant for first president of the world's league of nations. Our country has sunk below his horizon, and the Republic of Washington, of Jefferson, of Lincoln, is forgotten. Hear the new evangel of the international creed:

> The sweet revenge, therefore, is this: That we believed in righteousness, and now we are ready to make the supreme sacrifice for it—the supreme sacrifice of throwing in our fortunes with the fortunes of men everywhere.

Now we are told "we are ready to insist that everywhere men shall be champions of liberty." "At present we have to mind our own business. Under the covenant of the league of nations we can mind other people's business, and anything that affects the peace of the world, whether we are parties to it or not, can by our delegates be brought to the attention of mankind. We can force a nation on the other side of the globe to bring to the bar of mankind any wrong that is afoot in that part of the world which is likely to affect the good understanding between nations, and we can oblige them to show cause why it should not be remedied."

Again he inquires, "Shall America redeem her pledges to the world?" Who made those pledges? Did we make them when we declared war? Did we declare we went to war to secure the right to mind other people's business, to meddle everywhere in everything? Did we believe in the Senate April 6, 1917, we had voted to keep 40,000 American soldiers in Poland, 150,000 in Armenia, no one knows how many in Russia? Did the President think so when June 14, 1917, he declared:

> It is plain enough how we were forced into the war. The extraordinary insults and aggresions of the Imperial German Government left us no self-respecting choice but to take up arms in defense of our rights as a free people and of our honor as a sovereign Government.

How far he has departed from this original purpose can only be known by following his fugitive, evanescent interpretations of the league and treaty. All who will not go with him in his flight around the world are classified under the well-known Executive epithets. We can escape his sovereign displeasure only if we make our country forever "the fruitful mother and the copious nurse" for the whole world.

January 22, 1917, we listened in his message to him saying "that no right anywhere exists to hand peoples about from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were property." To-day we read his treaty delivering 36,000,000 Chinese to an alien despotism.

The same arrogant power that drove us to war to save our rights severed them from their mother country. Again we see him deny Italy her historic national rights redeemed by her loyalty and sacrifice in the great struggle against a common foe. Again we hear the President saying on December 4, 1917, that no nation or people shall be robbed or punished because of irresponsible warfare or damnable wrong. Each descending sun sees a new revelation extorted from a reluctant Executive or published in the capitals of Europe for our official information.

An ancient and friendly nation dismembered! The pledges of three great powers to Italy broken by an ex post facto edict of a dreamer and a novice, the twin crusaders in the bloody chaos of internationalism, President Wilson and Col. House. Here the self-determination of peoples would solidify, stabilize, preserve, build up States against future despotisms; it is scouted and ignored. In the Balkan region, where it is a firebrand of domestic tumult, it is invoked as a sacred maxim of popular rights. The very gods must smile at the huge contradiction of aspiring mortals chained in personal self-interest or lost in the bottomless egotism reaching out for a passport to the regions of international immortality. All must pass under the yoke of his epithets who will not respond to his flight into the dim world of Wilsonian dreams. A Chief Magistrate of this Republic an accomplice of the active receiver of stolen territory, the betrayer of an outraged, plundered people, associated with a cut-purse of empires in a coalition of powers to divide and share three continents! Having picked their defeated enemy of the last available pound of flesh, which we do not question, they turn upon and rob one friendly ally and betray and desert another. This we do question.

They not only inveigle in the Old World our President into a perpetual covenant to defend all those evils but charge him to the capacity limits with the thought that our Government owes them a vast moral debt pledged by our Executive in total disregard either of his powers or of the verdict of the American people, and at last the public must bear the burden, both in men and in money. A numerous school echoes this false assumption that we are still indebted to Europe, and all this cavern of counterfeit moralities and this cock-loft of scholastic gabble has the sublime assurance to asperse Senators who refuse to abase themselves before the tottering throne of the chief rhetorician whose metaphysical thunder no longer inspires either respect or fear, in this Chamber or elsewhere. Let the swarm of satellites basking in the sunshine of patronage and sniffing the fragrant trade winds of administration favors gratify him with their anthems of ineffable perfection. It is all he wishes to hear, and the man who does not sound it incurs his suspicion; he is no longer loyal "to my administration." So be it; let them proceed. The louder their hallelujahs now, the more fervent the maledictions at the inevitable end.

Hundreds of millions of our food, clothing, and money have gone in charity to relieve the distress of war victims. No nation ever gave more generously or promptly. Nearly $10,000,000,000 in loans attest our financial support at a critical time in allied credit. All our soldiers sent abroad at last to our war-worn Allies. All these are dismissed by our President as a "small essay at generosity." Well, in the name of human life and worldly treasure, if this be a small essay at generosity, when will something large begin? It could be well asked if such an Executive is longer a safe guide for the American people.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] charges us with a change of front. He asserts that we have fallen from the heights of unconditional surrender last autumn to the depths of unconditional peace. The Senator wars with words and not with principles. He is a victim of form, not of substance. We opposed a negotiated peace when we remembered the President's peace without victory dictum. We labored under the delusion that we must pay some attention to what he had deliberately said. We know better now. An indecisive end threatened to make our sacrifices in vain. We recalled his vacillations, his delays, his fatal propensity to pursue the ignis fatuus of academic phrases until lost in the morasses of interminable notes and documents. The American people instinctively feared, the Senate well knew, the bootless goal of all our efforts, if our President in an evil hour were permitted to engage in deadly verbal combat with a German metaphysician.

Not a quotation cited by the Senator does more than ask that war continue until the enemy is defeated and reparation made as a guaranty of the permanent removal of the German menace. So spoke the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] and the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW]. The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] knew the danger when last October he declared the best diplomatists in Europe were the armies of the Allies and ourselves and "that unconditional surrenders are not obtained by clever discussion and exchange of notes. They are won by armies in the field."

No Senator whose vision sweeps the whole field of the then potential danger doubts what these Senators had in mind. Can we question what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] meant when he stated, October 7, 1918, "the mischief is in any discussion of the principles upon which peace should be debated"?

Likewise the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] when he favored "an unqualified victory of subduing the military power of Germany and of imposing upon her a peace and a reestablishment of conditions after the war to be dictated by the Allies."

The apprehension then was the inadequacy of negotiations, the dangers of a negotiated peace, as against an unconditional surrender and a dictated peace. This was the attitude of the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. Does this apprehension commit us to an eternal pact with the Allies to enforce a negotiated peace, the far-reaching terms of which no Senator on the other side of the Chamber even now knows? Scarcely a day does not bring to light a new connection or concealed compact, a hidden relation, inextricably woven into the tangled web of a European diplomacy and territorial and racial feuds. Does not an unknown treaty, offensive and defensive, rise to view with each successive day? Mesopotamia confronts us one day, a British protectorate over Hedjaz another. The future of Egypt is on yesterday or for to-morrow as mysterious as her sphinx, and to-day a hitherto unknown treaty with Persia is made known to us from the usual unofficial sources. We learn from London, the principal source of our knowledge, of what our President has been doing in our foreign relations, that we have a treaty binding us in all probability to defend Belgium. We must conjecture on the nature of the treaties with Austria, Hungary, Bulgaria, and Turkey. The declaration of June 16, 1919, on the military occupation of the Rhine, to which we seem to be bound to contribute, was submitted to the House of Commons last 4th of July. The President declines to submit it to us, although Congress, if it be binding upon us at all, must furnish men and money to execute it. Yet the treaty and the league engage us irrevocably to defend and make secure these undivulged coalitions and protectorates. Where do those alien obligations end? Who can measure the illimitable scope to which we may be committed, the draft on the young life of America for foreign service, the vast gulfs into which we must cast the tax levies of future years if we follow the President, who has subordinated our Government to second place in his zeal to bind us in a league of nations.

Not only the unknown covenants of foreign Governments schooled in intrigue and trained in the diplomatic ability and disposition to care for themselves give us concern. Our President pursues the devious path of stealth and concealment in dealing with the Senate. Our embarrassment and risks are multiplied by his habitual secretiveness and distrust of those who are his constitutional and necessary advisers and colleagues. The French treaty came to us grudgingly with an Executive breach of faith manifest on its face. The reasons for the Shantung articles were given to the public before the Senate. We now hear of an agreement he seeks to impose on us in an Armenian mandate. His Secretary of War estimates 150,000 men will be required to administer it. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], of the Committee on Military Affairs, rising in his seat September 10, 1919, informs us two regiments are now being recruited for foreign service—where, no one in this Chamber knows. How many clandestine arrangements he has made binding us, so far as Executive commitments can do so, to engage us in boundless responsibilities incurred to foreign Governments, no one can tell. Every week witnesses a fresh obligation, a new price promised to be paid by him to obtain another vote for his league of nations and for his concealed swarm of foreign obligations. To what interminable lengths can mad ambition drive an aspirant for a dusty chapter in the history of our age! The American people may well distrust a leader who so conceals his motives and suppresses what so vitally concerns them. Let us end these sight drafts on disaster. May not Senators well pause in assuming the mighty and lasting obligations seen and known to be assumed by this treaty?

Is not the Senator from Pennsylavnia [Mr. KNOX] rendering an inestimable public service to the country in revealing those obligations found in this momentous document? Add the unknown entanglements reaching out from this treaty and enmeshing themselves in the triple-bound continents, islands, and archipelagoes of the Old World, and our doubts increase. Upon these place our President's habitual, reluctant, secret course in dealing with the Senate and our doubts accumulate and deepen into an anxiety that matures into an inexorable opposition to this document. For voicing these prudent conclusions to safeguard the American people the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] is accused of a policy of scuttle and run, of folly and poltroonery. We have helped fight the Allies' enemy to defeat. They have framed the treaty, gathering the fruits of the victory for themselves. It is their victory as well as ours. President Wilson did not write the treaty embodying the terms of the victory. His usefulness ended in procuring the armistice that saved Germany from invasion and retribution for her crime. His high function was to agree to it.

The wily diplomats, grizzled and old in the ways of this naughty earth, soon discovered our President wanted a league of nations more than anything else. They wanted a treaty; they cared but little for the league. What the President promised to get his league—an adopted child of British paternity—no Senator knows. Our information comes on the installment plan, and we must be content. We will take it as we can get it, but I think the required majority to ratify will withhold their votes until we are sufficiently informed, notwithstanding the mad clamor for instant ratification.

But the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] appeals to our pecuniary instincts. We can have no indemnity for the Lusitania dead unless we ratify the treaty. Read article 232 of that document. Under it Germany only undertakes to make compensation for "all damages done to the allied and associated powers and to their property during the period of the belligerency of each as an allied and associated power against Germany by land, by sea, and from the air." Annex 1 limits the "damages to injured persons and surviving dependents by personal injury or death of civilians by acts of war by the two groups of belligerents wherever arising." The United States was a neutral, not a belligerent, when the Lusitania was sunk. Under this treaty we can not collect a dollar from Germany for our dead in this disaster. For all our merchant ships sunk, for all of the crews and passengers on those merchant ships that found violent deaths before we declared war, not one pound sterling can be collected from the defeated enemy under this treaty. We can collect only after the 6th day of April, 1917, when we assumed the status of a belligerent.

The Senator likewise suggests our nationals can not recover their losses from Germany or her nationals without the treaty. We do not need to ratify for that. Our claims are secure. This Government holds a billion dollars of German nationals' property seized under an act of Congress. This is security for damage to our nationals and their property. We can cover this by future negotiations on our own account. The Allies are entering into treaties and manifesting considerable thrift in their affairs, it seems. If the Germans want their property sooner, let them come and get it. I do not share in the Senator's alarms. We can abundantly care for our exports and damages. We need no guardian in Europe if we stay out of the league.

On January 27, 1916, the senior Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] supported an embargo on the export of arms and ammunition. It was known that Germany had accumulated immense stores of war munitions. For many years the Central Powers had prepared to assail and annex the territory between Germany and the Atlantic. The Allies were not ready to meet the attack. Great Britain's navy, fortunately for us and the other free Governments of the world, controlled the seas. Without this check on the Germans the Senate would in all probability be debating another subject to-day. Yet in this crisis in the affairs of France, Italy, Belgium, and Great Britain the Senator's action would have prostrated them helpless at the feet of long-prepared Germany. His embargo would have paralyzed the British Navy and continued the German advance toward Paris and the channel ports. The Senator then thought it more important to move American grain in domestic shipments than to permit the unprepared Allies to buy arms and explosives in our neutral market to defend their sorely beleaguered countries. This, of course, was before the Senator's altruism was born. His chief had not begun to hear voices in the air, nor the Senator himself to demand the last pound of German flesh to be removed by us and given to others. We show our noble unselfishness and our altruism in applied form by guaranteeing the beneficiaries of the spoils against the hatred of the defeated nations. The limit of the Senator's altruism in 1916 was the hauling of a few grain cars and leaving the Allies to fight empty handed. Now he wishes to make a general assignment of our country to them in perpetuity. Something has come over the spirit of the Senator's dreams. Whether it is an ascent from the deserted levels of neutrality and embargo to the sublime heights of article 10 or a precipitate descent from grain freights to exhausting ourselves for the benefit of foreign governments the Senator can decide at leisure.

His course then gave such satisfaction to the German element that his portrait appeared on the front page of Vierick's Fatherland. Laudatory mention of the Senator's valuable services appeared there. Indeed, whenever the rafters rang with the Senator's denunciation of keeping our markets open to the Allies to supply them in their desperate struggle while converting their industries to a war basis the Fatherland echoed a heartfelt response.

The Senator introduced Senate bill 380 December 7, 1915, Sixty-fourth Congress, first session, to prohibit the sale of war munitions in our markets to any belligerent. This by force of conditions denied to Great Britain and France access to indispensable supplies. Germany could not buy because she could not break the Atlantic blockade by the British Navy. This bill was supported by the German-American Alliance, the German press, and the German embargo conference. The stream of petitions that congested Congress was the result of a crusade conducted by those pro-German agencies. They were all for bill 380. It was a crisis in Europe. The submarines were sinking our merchant ships as well as those of the Allies, although we were still nominally, at least, at peace; the campaign of frightfulness was under way, nameless atrocities disgraced the German name, the extremity of the Allies was well known. The Senator wished to exclude them from our market. But a presidential campaign was approaching. The President and the Senator were industriously engaged in keeping us out of war, and incidentally in reelecting themselves. No altruistic sentiments for the democracies of Europe or the world's suffering humanity were permitted to interfere with the campaign of our distinguished fellow citizens. The French and British line that held back the Hun might fight barehanded with their backs to the wall if our worthy friends could be reelected. The Senator denounced in ringing tones sending them supplies from our market as a "damnable trade" and the breeder of a "heritage of hate abroad." He feared, too, it would breed hate among our different races at home "to behold the great resources of our country dedicated to the manufacture of deadly weapons to be sent abroad to kill their relatives in the Old World." If an embargo had been laid under the Senator's bill, the Allies would have lost the war before either of them could have kept us out of it before their election or got us into it afterwards.

Yet the Senator now charges the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] with defending the German cause and adopting their argument before the peace conference. He is driven to the ungenerous reflection, "It is only necessary to read those communications to see where the Senator from Pennsylvania derived his thoughts." This does not answer the latter's denial of the justice or wisdom of committing the American people and future generations to defend a treaty made in Europe by Europe for the benefit of the Old World. This is his contention and not a criticism of the terms of the treaty. For loyalty to America the Senator is accused in substance of pro-Germanism. It comes with singular infelicity from one whose prior acts sought to cripple the Allies in the crisis of their mighty struggle.

It must have become notorious to even the casual observer that an influential group of international bankers are exerting their silent pressure to the limit of their great power to ratify the league and treaty. Their affiliated banking houses are showing results throughout the country. Quietly the lines are tightened, communications established, reasons marshaled, and avenues of approach to Members of the Senate are surveyed. The subtle campaign is on. I can not mistake the communications I receive from bankers who know no more of our foreign questions than I know of the detailed operations of their banks. I can not be mistaken in the systematic crusade of certain bond and security houses, of the great life insurance companies that hold liberal investments of foreign bonds, who are opening their advance now upon Members of this body. They have already crumbled some of the opposition to this league before their insidious touch. It is difficult to name or locate the details, but it is material and powerful and is moving steadily toward the accomplishment of its purposes. To them, Europe and Asia offer an immense field for profit. Development following the recovery from war promises investments at remunerative rates. The United States has no such field to be exploited or developed. We are now a creditor Nation. No one appreciates it more than the international banker. The time for the American to become an international banker seems to this group to be at hand.

But the league and the treaty must be the basis of all such undertakings. Great Britain is an instructive teacher on this subject. Her colonies and her merchant shipping have built up the island empire. Her great navy has served a double purpose. It defends her in war and convoys a cosmopolitan commerce in peace. With Great Britain, stability and the reign of law and justice are indispensable. Give her full credit for becoming the lawgiver of nations, but with her philanthropy and commerce often go hand in hand.

The American international bankers know the United States Government must be the silent power to guarantee their undertakings. Our traditional policy of continental isolation is a barrier in the world-wide plan. The league and the treaty are a breach in that policy. It therefore happens most agreeably that the Utopia of universal peace and profitable banking are in complete accord. As with Great Britain, the relief of oppressed humanity and attractive investments resulting from trade and foreign promotions become synonymous.

Let commerce go where it will. Investments and the rights of American property must be protected by our diplomacy and our Navy abroad in every reasonable way. Mexico has long given us a melancholy example of what not to do. But from the criminal indifference of our Government in Mexico to the frenzied intermeddling with Europe and the whole Eastern Hemisphere is too great a transition. We have been able to see too many things on the other side of the world and too oblivious to the outrages occurring on our home border. I respectfully direct the attention of the pro-leaguers to the situation. I will not heed the demands of international bankers to give them the league and treaty to serve as the instruments to underwrite their adventures by our Government. It commits us to an army and navy perpetually in foreign service. The rights of person are with me superior to the rights of property. To the former all other things are subordinate. The blood of an American soldier or sailor is more sacred to me than the bonds of all the international bankers in the country.

Mr. President, I wish to read a letter in relation to this subject. It gives us an insight into the interest of Great Britain. It is dated September 13, 1919. The name of the writer I do not wish to make public. Senators may learn of it if they are sufficiently interested, but I will not insert the name in the RECORD.

The following incident may throw some light upon the cause of the advocacy of the projected league of nations which is so pronounced in influential financial circles. I relate it precisely as it occurred.

Early last May there called upon me at my office a Mr. J. J. O'Neil, whose engraved card described him as London manager of the Manchester Guardian, of Manchester, England. Mr. O'Neil, who was a stranger to me, immediately introduced the subject of the league of nations and took me to task because of my opposition to that project. Upon inquiring of him why an Englishman should be in this country instructing an American in the latter's national duty and receiving no clear answer, I asked him bluntly what was the actual purpose of his visit to the United States. He replied that he was here upon a mission connected with the internationalization of the war debt. I asked him if he meant me to understand that he was here upon the business of inducing the United States to guarantee the war debt of the nations recently at war, including that of Great Britain and that of Germany. He said he was. I told him that he would find little sentiment in this country favorable to such a project. This seemed to surprise him; he said that I was the first American he had met who did not favor it. I then asked him whom he had seen, and he replied that upon the previous day he had seen Mr. J. P. Morgan, and that Mr. Morgan had expressed himself as being in favor of the plan.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to state that that sounds very much like Henry A. Wise Wood?

Mr. SHERMAN. Well, the Senator can adapt the euphony of the situation to suit his own auditory nerves.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thought the Senator guarded it so carefully, and yet there is not a Senator who has not received the same letter—not one.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the other Senators want to give the name, they can do so. I am not in the habit of divulging correspondence until I am authorized to do so, even if it is also addressed to every one of the other 95 Senators.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think Henry A. Wise Wood has no objection to his attitude on this subject being known. Certainly he has not, as evidenced by the vast number of letters he has written.

Mr. SHERMAN. He can give his name to his epistolary activities if he wishes. I now offer some additional evidence, to which I commend the Senator's kindly attention.

The great life insurance companies of the United States, doing business on the level-rate premium plan, have the largest individual investments of any enterprises in the world.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield.

Mr. CURTIS. This is a pretty important question; and I wanted to know if the Senator would yield in order that I might make the point of no quorum, so that we will get a quorum here to hear him.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no objection to the Senator's making the point——

Mr. CURTIS. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. SHERMAN. But I dislike greatly to have Senators think that I called them over here just because I am making an address.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Hitchcock	McNary	Sherman
Calder	Johnson, S. Dak.	Nelson	Smith, Ga.
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Spencer
Cummins	Jones, Wash.	Newberry	Sterling
Curtis	Kellogg	Norris	Sutherland
Fall	Kendrick	Nugent	Swanson
Fletcher	Kenyon	Overman	Townsend
France	Keyes	Owen	Trammell
Gay	Kirby	Page	Walsh, Mass.
Gronna	Knox	Phipps	Walsh, Mont.
Hale	Lenroot	Pomerene	Warren
Harding	Lodge	Reed	Watson
Harrison	McCumber	Robinson	Williams
Henderson	McKellar	Sheppard	Wolcott

Mr. REED. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is detained from the Senate by illness.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are absent on public business.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] is detained from the Senate by illness. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] are detained on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I have received communications from many of those enterprises, not from the executive officers, but from those who represent a very numerous constituency, the agents, the local soliciting agents, the district agents, and the general managers of States and given areas, all of them directly connected with the life insurance business. I do not criticize them for making their preference known. They ought to do so. If they have opinions about the league or the treaty, in discharging their duty as citizens they have a right to communicate with their Representatives and Senators.

But there is a remarkable unanimity in the views entertained by this great body of influential citizens. I took occasion a few days ago to incorporate in the RECORD three letters. Two of the letters were from Chicago and one from Springfield, Mass. The one from Springfield, Mass., was from a person interested in the life insurance business. The one from Chicago was from a person interested in the life insurance business, quite an old-established house. They are a thousand miles apart. The letters are precisely the same.

They are form letters, furnished to each of the writers of the letters from some central authority. A broker in bonds and stocks in Chicago wrote me on precisely the same blank, making the same request. I took those three as typical of the organization that has begun in this great international bankers' movement.

One life insurance company in the United States has nearly one billion of assets to-day. Others are not far behind. These assets represent the reserves, in large part, that secure the policyholders. Those reserves must be invested. They are invested in every known form of safe security. Sometimes the securities fluctuate, of course. They have invested very liberally, not only in our own bonds—Liberty bonds and Victory bonds—but they have invested in the bonds of the allied powers of Europe. Whether from the desire to make a good investment at a reasonable rate or expressing their sympathy with the Allies at an early time, some of these large life insurance companies made very large investments in British bonds, in Anglo-

French bonds, in French bonds—the Republic and its municipalities—and in other forms of securities that were liberally offered on our markets prior to our entering the war. They bought those bonds as investments. They yet hold them as investments. By turning to the market quotations I find that those securities, like our own bonds, are quoted at less than par. In estimating the value of those securities, actuaries will be obliged to take them at their now market value. There is a depreciation between the cost price of those securities and the present market price. In other words, the assets of the companies have shrunk by so much.

What I say of the life insurance companies is true of many of the large metropolitan banks. The banks in New York, Philadelphia, and Chicago have invested liberally in foreign bonds. They, too, have experienced the same depreciation in the fall of securities on the market.

There is a well-grounded movement on foot in this country, keeping step with the movement among the allied powers of Europe. It is to internationalize the entire war debt. It will not be many months before that project will appear in Congress. There will be suitable public sentiment created first. After that shall have been done, by both approaching the individual and by prepared articles in the public press, the proper legislation, or, if legislation is not necessary, under the provisions of the league and the treaty, the debt will be internationalized as one of the means of binding the signatory nations together in an indissoluble league, held together by an indebtedness. The entire war debt of the several nations will be assumed by the league of nations or underwritten by the joint act of all the signatory powers. It is known that a common public debt is a binding tie between nations, the strength of which can hardly be estimated. The Turk would not be in Europe to-day—he would not exist even in Asia—were it not for the fact that the Turkish debt is held in every capital in Europe, and some in this country. In other words, Turkey's strength has been her public debt not her weakness; but her strength, because some of the great powers must protect the holders of her securities.

Therefore, Mr. President, the international banker is not overlooking the main chance. The first bill in this world-wide undertaking passed this Senate a few days ago. I am not opposed to that bill on principle. There is nothing objectionable in the bill by itself. But it is the first step in this great world-wide undertaking, financed and promoted by the international bankers of the country, and bottomed, the international bankers erroneously believe, on the league and the treaty.

That is why these communications are coming to me. It is why others have received them. It is why many more will receive them in the days to come. They propose to exploit and develop Europe. From being a debtor nation we have passed to the position of the greatest creditor nation in the world. The international banker is quick to perceive the change. He sees the business opportunity. Those who have been content to do merely a domestic banking business are approached, and there are converts made daily among them by the alluring prospects spread before them by the international banker.

Therefore, Mr. President, it is with that in view that this crusade is beginning. It is an additional pressure being brought upon Members, which will develop in the weeks to come, to ratify the league and the treaty. It is purely selfish. There is in it not one element of patriotism. There is nothing in it but cold coin and resulting profits.

The international banker ever sees his bonds and his gold before he sees the blood of the sons of America that will fight the battles of this league after we are bound by it, by his schemes, his promotions, his investments. For myself, they can take care of their bonds; that is a secondary matter. I think more of the blood of my own people than I think of the bonds and securities of all the international bankers of the United States and Europe.

Selfishness and philanthropy, assumed in this league and treaty, are walking to-day as handmaids in the same common enterprise. Instead of such vast schemes, let us give some regard, Mr. President, to the present conditions of our commerce in Europe. The third of the 14 points declares for the establishment of an equality of trade conditions. Peace exists among Great Britain, France, and the United States, at least, including Italy, Belgium, and some of the smaller powers. We believe friendly relations now prevail and will continue to prevail among those powers.

Let me call attention to what has occurred among friendly powers in relation to our commerce. This letter, I am reasonably certain, has not been received by all the Senators, probably, as the last one I quoted from has been. It is dated August 28, 1919. It is written from a well-known house in Chicago. I have no authority to make it public, and therefore will only recite the facts. It is one of the largest type founders and manufacturers of printers' specialties in the world. I have known either the founders or the present head of this house for more than 25 years. I take that what they write in the letter is true.

Last June a French agent from Paris was in the United States intending to buy a large amount of printing material. This house sold the agent, for his employer, a large bill of merchandise. Other orders through American houses were made about the same time. The French agent, just before sailing for home, wrote the American house at Chicago that France had added from 30 to 35 per cent to its tariff on such merchandise coming in from the United States and 15 per cent on the same kind of merchandise coming into France from Great Britain. This is a difference of double the rate of duty at the customhouses which our manufacturers must meet in order to compete with the British manufacturers of the same type founders and printers' specialties. This is certainly reciprocity and gratitude, Mr. President, both in the same breath.

I should greatly like, when they are asking us for more, when the Senator says that we owe them a great moral debt, more, more, if they are to be in the attitude of the Oliver Twist of the world, I beg them to give us fair treatment at the customhouse under at least the most-favored nation clause or the third of the forgotten 14 points an equality of commercial conditions.

This is not the only complaint. Other exporters in Chicago have met with like experiences. In other words, our friends who are asking us to go into the league of nations to protect their frontiers, to finance them, to internationalize the war debts, to restore them to power, to help to build up their industries are to-day engaged in open, shameless discrimination against our exports when we reach their customhouses. I would like for them to practice a little of the Christian charity, at least the equality that they ask us to practice every day and which I think we have in the days and years past abundantly shown.

It will not be long. As soon as the treaty has been signed we will find Germany enjoying preferential rights against us if we continue exhausting ourselves for Europe's benefit. The reply is we must ratify the treaty and league to open the door to this equality. Even the singular suggestion is made that we can not ask the Allies to credit Germany with what we release of a conqueror's share unless we are a party to the treaty. In the ledger of civilized governments the United States is not, or ever will be, reduced to the poor necessity of signing obnoxious treaties to make itself heard in the audit of nations. Such logic is worthy of a Middle-Age casuist. By some still more cryptic reasoning the distinguished Senator concludes unless we ratify the treaty we can forego taking it with or without the treaty, which leaves it in Germany's hands. The Allies will surely not overlook this additional asset in the enemy's possession in calculating how much more Germany can pay and survive. Those who make such distinctions a lifelong study may estimate the difference in the result.

December 4, 1917, we listened to our President's saying to us "You catch with me the voices of humanity that are in the air." When our Chief Magistrate begins to hear voices in the air it is time for the rest of us to keep close to mother earth. I have been acquainted with men in private life who have a habit of hearing voices in the air. Most of them are incarcerated in State institutions. Alienists say that their orientation is bad. I think that is what is the matter with our distinguished gentlemen, many of them abroad, who are engaged in urging the immediate ratification of the league and the treaty. Their orientation, especially on foreign affairs, is very bad. While the President is swinging around the great American circle he is hearing more voices in the air. We quote some of them. July 13, 1919, my esteemed former colleague, Senator Lewis, then on a visit in Washington, said, referring to the President's then-recent message, it "creates a new alignment of politics in the United States. The dividing line will be the Wilson foreign policy. The people will not regard him as a third-term candidate, but a first-term candidate on the new issue for America." Translated into campaign language, here is the way I put it, "President Wilson has resolved to run for a third term on this platform: European internationalism against obsolete Americanism."

The President's second hegira from the Capital is the threshold of that candidacy. We think it is swinging around the circle for the league and the treaty. It is the beginning of 1920 and the third term. We may just as well settle it that way as any other. I delight in meeting the main issue. When I was preparing pleadings at common law, which we have in my State, I sometimes disliked the method of pleading by which at times we were led on to try an inconsequential issue on a false plea, something that did not settle the case.

This way we try the main issue, something that will settle the case and give the American people a chance to express themselves. I do not want to hear voices in the air. I want to know how many votes will be counted in the ballot box on this question. This will be final.

The President has announced that the league and the treaty are greater than our Government. He is ready to die for it. Never have I heard him say in his most exalted heights of altruism or self-devotion that he has been ready to die for our Government. Many of our people have died for the Government within the last two and a half years, but he is the only one willing to die for the league.

Let me read something. I would like to quote it, but it might not be deemed so authentic. It is a favorite passage of mine. This is act 1, scene 2, of the great dramatist in portraying the tragedy of Julius Cæsar. The scene opens with Casca and Brutus.

BRUTUS. Ay, Casca; tell us what hath chanced to-day, that Cæsar looks so sad.

CASCA. Why, you were with him, were you not?

BRUTUS. I should not then ask Casca what had chanced.

CASCA. Why, there was a crown offered him; and being offered him, he put it by with the back of his hand, thus; and then the people fell a-shouting.

BRUTUS. What was the second noise for?

CASCA. Why, for that too.

CASSIUS. They shouted thrice; what was the last cry for?

CASCA. Why, for that too.

BRUTUS. Was the crown offered him thrice?

CASCA. Ay, marry, was't, and he put it by thrice, every time gentler than the other; and at every putting-by mine honest neighbours shouted.

CASSIUS. Who offered him the crown?

CASCA. Why, Antony.

BRUTUS. Tell us the manner of it, gentle Casca.

CASCA. I can as well be hanged as tell the manner of it; it was mere foolery; I did not mark it. I saw Mark Antony offer him a crown—yet 'twas not a crown neither, 'twas one of these coronets—and, as I told you, he put it by once; but, for all that, to my thinking, he would fain have had it. Then he offered it to him again; then he put it by again; but, to my thinking, he was very loath to lay his fingers off it. And then he offered it the third time; he put it the third time by; and still as he refused it, the rabblement hooted and clapped their chapped hands, and threw up their sweaty night-caps, and uttered such a deal of stinking breath because Cæsar refused the crown, that it had almost choked Cæsar, for he swounded and fell down at it; and for mine own part, I durst not laugh, for fear of opening my lips and receiving the bad air.

CASSIUS. But, soft, I pray you: what, did Cæsar swound?

CASCA. He fell down in the market place, and foamed at mouth, and was speechless.

That the Executive never did; he never became speechless yet.

BRUTUS. 'Tis very like; he hath the falling sickness.

CASSIUS. No, Cæsar hath it not; but you and I and honest Casca, we have the falling sickness.

CASCA. I know not what you mean by that, but I am sure Cæsar fell down. If the tagrag people did not clap him and hiss him, according as he pleased and displeased them, as they used to do the players in the theater, I am no true man.

BRUTUS. What said he when he came unto himself?

CASCA. Marry, before he fell down, when he perceived the common herd was glad he refused the crown, he plucked me ope his doublet and offered them his throat to cut. And I had been a man of any occupation, if I would not have taken him at a word, I would I might go to hell among the rogues. And so he fell. When he came to himself again, he said if he had done or said anything amiss, he desired their worships to think it was his infirmity. Three or four wenches, where I stood, cried, "Alas, good soul!" and forgave him with all their hearts; but there's no heed to be taken of them; if Cæsar had stabbed their mothers, they would have done no less.

So goes the third term now. It is in process of being offered the third time, and my esteemed colleague gave the opening cry to this adventure.

A third term he puts by again and again. He is loath to speak of it when it is mentioned, but each time that he refuses, it is gentler, as it was in the tragedy, than the other.

To save the greatest document in the world's history no sacrifice will be refused. A third term on an issue of subordinating our Government to the league is as little as an internationalist patriot can offer to the world. Who would not hear voices in the air on such a proposal? The gravity of such a service will justify him in doing anything. The issue is joined now. As he exalts the league above our Government, as at Kansas City, so he exalts himself above the Constitution and the acts of Congress under which he was elected and which he has sworn to preserve, defend, and obey.

Section 9, Article II of the Constitution, declares:

No person holding any office of profit or trust under the United States shall, without the consent of the Legislature, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title of any kind whatever from any king, prince, or foreign State.

It is worthy of note this section was unanimously adopted in the Federal Convention of 1787.

Our anniversary of the adoption of that document will be to-morrow, 132 years ago.

In order to make this article more prohibitive it was expressly provided by the act of August 18, 1856:

No diplomatic or consular officer shall * * * ask or accept, for himself or any other person, any present, emolument, pecuniary favor, office, or title of any kind, from any such (foreign) Government.

President Wilson sat at the peace conference either as President or as a diplomatic officer or representative of this country, or both. As either or both he was within the inhibition of the law. If he was President, he is covered by the Constitution. If he was a diplomatic officer, he is within the statute. If he was both, he is within the Constitution and the statute both. Either singly or jointly he can not rise above or escape the law, either constitutional or statutory.

Last December, on the occasion of the President's first departure for the peace conference, I remarked upon the illegality of his absence. He left our shores attended by nearly 1,400 persons in military and civilian life. The pomp and magnificence of his journey have no equal in the hitherto simple annals of our Republic. I have sometimes wondered, Mr. President, what has become of Jeffersonian simplicity. It has fallen likely with many of the traditions under which we have so long lived. Amid a splendor and ostentatious display he proceeded to Paris and the scene of his subsequent achievements. The palaces and gold plate, the lackeys, the furniture and tapestry of emperors and princes of departed days were devoted to his accommodation. This Government, through its Congress, had given him what is known in England as a civil list during the war of $150,000,000. It saw no such dissolute extravagance when it trusted him with this vast sum.

Who had in his wildest flight of fancy thought the Executive would abandon his seat of government and remain in Europe for months. But saith some defenders of the only true faith, the Constitution does not prohibit it. Neither does it prohibit him from staying on foreign soil the whole of his term. Neither does the Constitution prohibit Congress from convening in Peking, China. It could convene at any place except as provided by statute, which it could repeal, for the same parliamentary authority that enacts a statute can repeal it. No parliament can bind the hands of subsequent parliaments, nor can any Congress bind the hands of any subsequent Congress. Congress could repeal the statute and go where it pleased. There is nothing in the Constitution that in express terms prohibits us from meeting at any alien capital; but any constitutional Dogberry who affirmed it could lawfully do so would not be regarded as distinguished authority. The implied prohibitions of the Constitution are of equal power, dignity, and significance with the express written ones. The violation of an implied power ranks in its turpitude or danger with the deliberate guilt of breaking an express power. The President has broken both.

On April 18, 1919, the Washington Times contained the following:

PRESIDENT'S GIFTS HERE FROM EUROPE.

A carload of European gifts to President and Mrs. Wilson has been received at the White House. The shipment is in about 40 large boxes and will not be unpacked until the Wilsons return.

These boxes entered at Boston or the port at that point. They paid no duty and they were not valued or even inspected unless in the most informal way. The value no one in this country knows. Cloakroom gossip, however, that beats a free press in speed and universality of service lays the value at half a million dollars. Who will ask for an investigation of the alien bounty bestowed on our long-absent President, who now says the league of nations and the treaty are greater than the Government of the United States. From what source did he absorb that alien view? Is the President above the laws? Is he already acting under the league of nations so as to absolve himself from all obligations under our Government? We ask him not to die for the league but to live under the Constitution and laws of our country. That will do more good.

When the President went abroad he took with him a full uniform of the Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States, so veracious local wiseacres have it. So far as we know he contented himself with citizen's clothes. This is the only mitigating circumstance appearing in the overseas pilgrimage of our chief. The Treasury is charged with his and his retinue's expenses. All the former appropriations are exhausted. He has asked the House for $825,000 more and been refused until an itemized report of his expenditures is made. How have these millions been used?

There has been filed a general expense account, which reminds me of the general prayer at the conclusion of a bill in chancery, "and your orator prays such other and further relief as the premises may require and as to the court shall seem meet." There is not anything in the report that gives any information. Whose names are on the pay roll? Only rumor hath it so far, somewhat buttressed by a vigilant press. I understand that Col. House's brother-in-law is on the commission; that his son-in-law has been present in Paris, and also his son-in-law's partner. If there are any uncles and cousins and aunts their names have not yet been divulged, but I have no doubt that the ancient play of "Pinafore" will be rivaled when the truth is known.

Whose names are on the pay roll? What is their compensation? What have they done? What were their qualifications when they undertook to perform the service? Were they experts? No doubt they were. This country swarms with fiat experts, made overnight by passing resolutions; but we wish to know whether they are real experts or whether they are those created by the breath of potentates or executives.

But the President returned to our shores—we are all agreed on this—with every dollar of the fund spent. He brought with him gifts presented him in Europe besides which the generosity and glory of Solomon and Crœsus seem a beggar's pittance. The golden sands of Pactolus never poured down greater wealth for the sovereigns of an antique age than that given by the American Republic to its President. In return for all this he exalts this alien league exotic above the Government of his own country and swears allegiance to a hybrid power across the sea. If this be his conception of official duty, fortunate indeed would it have been for this Republic if he had never returned to his native shores but had remained in the arms of his foreign friends and associates.

God grant we may return to the Government built by our fathers and preserved by their successors. Let, too, the simplicity and love of country, the frugal customs and lowly habits under which the Nation grew from colonial days to the memorable day in April, 1917, when we called to arms from this historic Chamber to preserve, protect, and defend the American people against the German Empire return once more to the hearts of all. As we received it from our predecessors, a government of free people, regulated by law moving in the established orderly channels of the Constitution, with no one so great as to be above it and none so humble as to be beneath its watchful care, with but one allegiance to one government and those abiding beneath it a rule of law above labor unions, socialism, soviet, or lawless multitude, so will we deliver it to posterity, the priceless gift of our sacrifice and the patriotic devotion of our generation. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair reminds occupants of the galleries that it is contrary to the rules of the Senate to manifest approval or disapproval.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I desire to occupy about 10 minutes of the time of the Senate in brief answer to some statements made by the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN] who has just taken his seat.

LET US BE FAIR.

Ever since the armistice was signed on November 11, 1918, many Senators in this Chamber have seen fit on innumerable occasions to criticize and abuse the President of the United States for his conduct of the war and his terms of peace. Sometimes criticisms have been made for which there was some foundation, but more often criticism and abuse have been hurled at him and his policies without rhyme or reason and without regard to facts. The remarks to which we have just listened are an illustration in point. Before the armistice, when we were fighting, as these very gentlemen admitted, for a victorious war and an enduring peace, everything the President did or said was exactly right—the 14 points, the league of nations, a dictated peace, and all the rest. But when the armistice was signed guaranteeing a complete surrender by Germany and her allies, and a victorious war won by the United States and her allies, his political enemies immediately changed front, and, an election being seen in the distance, in all their plans politics superseded patriotism. They knew, of course, that the chief honor of winning the war would naturally fall to President Wilson, and immediately upon the realization of that fact every one of those who during the war had claimed to be his friends but who were not, who claimed to be for his policies but who were not, began their tirade of abuse and vilification and their machinations to prevent his getting credit for winning the war or for securing peace. Immediately, in their eyes, nothing that he had ever done or ever would do was or could be right. He was not only wrong when they said he was wrong, but he was wrong even when they, during the war, for their own political reasons, had said he was right.

During the war, when Wilson demanded a dictated peace, they applauded the utterance as the personification of American patriotism. When Wilson secured a dictated peace, immediately they turned turtle and said it was too harsh on Germany. During the war they all claimed they wanted an enduring peace and a league to guarantee it. Wilson secured this, and immediately it was all wrong. During the war they wanted an ending of it that would primarily be satisfactory to the two great English-speaking countries. After the armistice and after Wilson had obtained what they asked in this respect they found that this was just what they did not want—England ought not to have anything to do with the treaty or league.

During the war they always demanded that France should have every protection. At the peace table Wilson gave France every protection. Immediately they changed their minds and wanted no entangling alliances with France. During the war they demanded that the five great allies should always act in concert. Wilson secured this demand, and immediately they changed their minds and wanted to substitute China for Japan, though China had had practically nothing to do with winning the war, and doubtless the most of her people hardly knew it was won. During the war and even when the peace conference was assembled they constantly urged that the United States should in all things act in concert with her allies. Wilson did this, and now they have repudiated and deserted our allies. During the war, either publicly or privately, they criticized the Irish in Ireland for not going into the war as they believed they should. After the war was over, and an election in sight, they have had nothing but praise for the Irish and condemnation for the English. The Irish have more votes in this country than the English. Those of us who genuinely sympathize with and favor the Irish must not be misled by this change of front. Many of these gentlemen are not now and never have been the real friends of Ireland. They shout in one breath that America must not meddle in European affairs, and in the next breath that Fiume must go to Italy. They shout in one breath that America must isolate herself, and in the next that it will be a crime if America does not in this treaty restore Shantung to China.

During the war when Wilson gave out his 14 points they praised them all. When Wilson secured their enactment into a treaty they immediately said they were all wrong, and then blamed him for not getting all of them into the treaty. The conclusion is inevitable from all these changes in position that if they were sincere in their views toward the President's policies during the war they are not sincere now. If they are sincere now, they were not sincere in their pledges of patriotism then. They can take either horn of this dilemma.

That President Wilson has made many mistakes can not be successfully controverted. No man who does not make them ever gets very far. That he has accomplished some of the greatest things that have ever been accomplished by any President is just as undeniable. Under these circumstances ought we not all to be fair to him?

Take the case of his celebrated 14 points. These applied only to the settlement of the war with Germany. I am not going to discuss those 14 points, but I am going to submit to his opponents in the Senate and in the country his 14 other American points and challenge these opponents to controvert them. I have arranged these 14 points in a very simple way. They are arranged in 14 questions with a blank for the answer. I am going to ask that they be published in the RECORD this way, so that any Senator or any citizen may have the opportunity of writing in the name of the President which, in their judgment, answers the question. All that I ask it that they be candidly answered.

I here and now promise to give as full publication as I can to the answers.

THE 14 AMERICAN POINTS.

1. During whose administration has the American farmer received the greatest returns for his toil? _____

2. During whose administration has the American laborer had his fullest dinner pail and received his greatest pay? _____

3. During whose administration has the American business man made his largest profits? _____

4. During whose administration has the American banker and American stockholder in other corporations received their largest dividends? _____

5. During whose administration has America enjoyed her greatest prosperity? _____

6. During whose administration has the greatest merchant marine ever owned by America been built? _____

7. During whose administration has the greatest banking system ever known been created? _____

8. During whose administration has the wealth of America been made to bear its just proportion of taxation by the passage of income-tax laws? _____

9. During whose administration did America become the great financial center of the world? _____

10. During whose administration has the American Navy reached its highest efficiency? _____

11. During whose administration was it found that American citizens, untrained in times of peace, could be transformed in a few short months into better soldiers than those trained for a lifetime in the standing armies of Europe? _____

12. During whose administration did America achieve for herself and aid in achieving for allies the greatest victory of all the ages? _____

13. During whose administration was America changed from the greatest debtor nation to the greatest creditor nation in the world? _____

14. During whose administration has America made her greatest strides toward becoming the first world power and has a President of the United States become the acknowledged peer of any ruler on earth? _____

I ask both Republican and Democratic opponents of President Wilson to answer these 14 questions fairly. To those Senators who oppose him I address myself particularly. He is the head of our Government. Under his leadership this Nation has been prosperous and successful at home and victorious abroad, and it has progressed as never before in its history. If under his leadership has been accomplished the 14 American facts indicated in these questions, surely every 100 per cent American should be willing, in all fairness, to accord him the justice of an answer. These facts are the result of Wilson's 14 American policies. If all 14 European policies are all wrong—and I believe they are all right—still every American must admit these 14 American policies are what the American people wanted, and every true American takes the greatest pride in each and every one of them. You can not set aside these 14 American points.

Political opponents of the President in every part of our country, be fair! You worked with him in declaring the war. You worked with him to make that war a success. You agreed with him as to the announced principles for which we were fighting. Now that under his leadership the war has been a success, when we have gained everything we went into the war for, do not act the part of a cuckoo. There is no place in our country for cuckoo Americans. Be men enough to complete the job in the same patriotic spirit in which the war was declared and carried on.

Farmers, laboring men, bankers, business men, great and small, I want to warn you. Your conditions have been the best you have ever known. You have no just cause of complaint, taken as a whole. Do not you think it unwise to interfere with these conditions? By reason of delay, conditions are getting unsettled. Do you not think you had better advise your representatives to quit quibbling over details and get our affairs settled? Our people want peace and rest and normal conditions in this country.

Full-blooded Americans, think it over! One hundred per cent Americans, let us give our President and his policies a square deal! His policies have made us great at home and the first power abroad. His policies have honored us in every land. They have made the name America the synonym of all that is fair and just wherever civilization exists throughout the world. Free peoples and would-be free peoples of every clime look to America for guidance in every upward movement.

Americans love fair play. We are not being fair to our greatest citizen and our most successful leader. He has been faithful both in war and in peace. He has been most successful in both our domestic and our foreign affairs. We have had a long and destructive war. Our people are tired of war and its attending disturbing conditions. Mr. Wilson has negotiated a reasonable peace, honorable alike to ourselves and our allies and our former enemies, and giving the greatest assurance of enduring permanence. It is probably better than could be gotten if we tried it all over again. Let us not send it back to conference. Let us take it as it is, without reservations and without amendments. In the words of Gen. Grant, "Let us have peace," and have it without delay. [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair suggests that the rule of the Senate is constantly being violated.

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegee	Harding	McKellar	Sheppard
Calder	Harris	Nelson	Simmons
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Newberry	Smith, Md.
Chamberlain	Kellogg	Norris	Smoot
Cummins	Kendrick	Nugent	Spencer
Curtis	Kenyon	Overman	Sutherland
Dillingham	Keyes	Page	Swanson
Fall	Kirby	Phipps	Thomas
France	Knox	Pittman	Trammell
Gay	Lenroot	Pomerene	Walsh, Mass.
Hale	Lodge	Robinson	Williams

Mr. GAY. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], and the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] are necessarily absent on public business.

Mr. MCKELLAR. The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is detained from the Senate by illness. The senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM], the junior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] are temporarily absent on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-five Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. HITCHCOCK and Mr. MCNARY answered to their names when called.

Mr. KIRBY. I desire to announce the absence of the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], who is unavoidably detained on public business.

Mr. BALL entered the Chamber and answered to his name.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-eight Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. SMOOT. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. NEW, and Mr. WARREN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-one Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, during the debate which has been going on here now for some time Senators on the other side have quoted frequently from a speech that I made at the Union College commencement exercises in 1915, and I think it must have been printed in the RECORD fifteen or twenty times. It did not seem to me worth paying any attention to it. It helped many a laboring hour, and it did not disturb me, because I think personal inconsistencies, if they exist, have absolutely no importance as to the merits of a case. The mere fact that a man happens to have changed his mind, if he has changed it, does not bear on the merits of any question; and even if a man happens to be a convert, some good work has been done by converts from the days of St. Paul to the present time.

Mr. President, the President of the United States has now seen fit to refer to the speech that I made in 1915, and as he has done that, I think perhaps it is worth while for me to say a little about it. I think I can not put it better or any more briefly than I did the only time I alluded to it—in a debate I had with President Lowell, of Harvard, in Boston, on the 19th of March last—and I will read a brief extract from that speech. I said then:

"I have also been charged with inconsistency. In the autumn of 1914 Theodore Roosevelt made a speech in which he brought forward the idea of a league of nations for the prevention of future wars. In the following June, of 1915, speaking at Union College in New York on commencement, I took up the same idea and discussed the establishment of a league of nations backed by force. I spoke of it only in general terms."

I may add I did not say anything about sacrificing the interests of the United States in order to obtain it.

"I spoke again in favor of it in the following winter before the meeting of the League to Enforce Peace.

"But the more I reflected upon it and the more I studied it the more difficult the problem appeared to me. It became very clear to me that in trying to do too much we might lose all; that there were many obstacles and many dangers in the way; and that it would require the greatest skill and self-restraint on the part of the nations to make any league that would really promote and strengthen and make more secure the peace of the world.

"In January, 1917, the President of the United States brought forward a plan for a league to enforce peace in an address to the Senate, and I discussed it at some length, showing the dangers of the proposition and the perils which it would bring, not only to peace but to the United States."

I shall refer to that again, and ask that I may reprint it at the end of what I am now saying.

"During all this time, I may say, I was in consultation or I was talking with Theodore Roosevelt in regard to it. His position and mine did not then differ.

"On December 21, 1918, I made a speech in the Senate in which I discussed the 14 points and some of the momentous questions raised by the proposition for a league of nations.

"Col. Roosevelt wrote an article in the Kansas City Star upon that speech, approving it and commending it. I read a single paragraph from it."

I did this at the time and I do it now because Col. Roosevelt's position was the same as mine. He, too, was charged with inconsistency and he, too, has been misrepresented and misquoted. I read a single paragraph from the article in the Kansas City Star written by Col. Roosevelt:

"Our need is not as great as that of the vast scattered British Empire, for our domains are pretty much in a ring fence. We ought not to undertake the task of policing Europe, Asia, and northern Africa; neither ought we to permit any interference with the Monroe doctrine or any attempt by Europe or Asia to police America. Mexico is our Balkan Peninsula. Some day we will have to deal with it. All the coasts and islands which in any way approach the Panama Canal must be dealt with by this Nation and by this Nation in accordance with the Monroe doctrine.

"On January 3 of the present year—the Friday before his death—he dictated another editorial which appeared in the Kansas City Star after his death. I wish time would permit me to read it all, but I will read only one paragraph:

"* * * Let each nation reserve to itself and for its own decision, and let it clearly set forth questions which are nonjusticiable. * * * Finally, make it perfectly clear that we do not intend to take a position of an international Meddlesome Mattie. The American people do not wish to go into an overseas war unless for a very great cause and where the issue is absolutely plain. Therefore, we do not wish to undertake the responsibility of sending our gallant young men to die in obscure fights in the Balkans or in Central Europe or in a war we do not approve of. Moreover, the American people do not intend to give up the Monroe doctrine. Let civilized Europe and Asia introduce some kind of police system in the weak and disorderly countries at their thresholds. But let the United States treat Mexico as our Balkan Peninsula and refuse to allow European or Asiatic powers to interfere on this continent in any way that implies permanent or semipermanent possession. Every one of our Allies will with delight grant this request if President Wilson chooses to make it, and it will be a great misfortune if it is not made.

"Two weeks before his death I was with Theodore Roosevelt for some hours, seeing him for two mornings in succession. The draft now before the country was not then before us, but we discussed fully the league of nations in all its bearings. We were in entire agreement.

"The position that I have taken, and now take, had his full approval. The line I have followed in the Senate and elsewhere was the one he wished to have followed. I do not say this to transfer any responsibility from my shoulders to his. All I do and all I say is on my own responsibility alone. But it is a help and a strength to me to feel that I have behind me the approval, the support of the great American, the great patriot, the great man whose death has been such a grievous loss, not only to the United States but to the entire world in this hour.

"Now, just a word in regard to inconsistency. I do not think I have been inconsistent, but it does not matter whether I have or not. Individual inconsistencies have no relation to the merits of any question. If nobody ever changed their minds it would be a stagnant world. The only difficulty comes, as it comes with many habits, harmless in moderation, but dangerous in excess.

"When inconsistencies become excessive they are apt to suggest self-seeking and insincerity or lack of real conviction. I think it is hardly worth while to discuss inconsistencies. No one can tell where the discussion may lead.

"On May 6, 1914, at the unveiling of the Barry monument in Washington, President Wilson said:

"There are just as vital things stirring now that concern the existence of the Nation as were stirring then, and every man who worthily stands in this presence should examine himself and see whether he has the full conception of what it means that America should live her own life. Washington saw it when he wrote his Farewell Address. It was not merely because of passing and transient circumstances that Washington said that we must keep from entangling alliances.

"I pause a moment to say that Washington did not say that we should keep clear from entangling alliances in the Farewell Address. He said that we should keep clear of permanent alliances, and that temporary alliances would be sufficient to meet an emergency—as they were in the war just closed.

"I merely mention this because the phrase 'entangling alliances,' which is so familiar to the country, was the utterance of Thomas Jefferson in his first inaugural. He warned us from entangling alliances. He, too, like Washington, I know is considered antiquated by many people. I merely recall it for the benefit of Jeffersonian Democrats, if any still survive.

"In Washington, on January 6, 1916, addressing the Pan American Congress, President Wilson said:

"The Monroe doctrine was proclaimed by the United States on her own authority. It always has been maintained and always will be maintained upon her own responsibility.

"I think I am not to blame for wishing it to be maintained now."

That is what I said then, but I think perhaps if we are investigating inconsistencies I will go a little further to-day. In a speech at Shadow Lawn September 30, 1916, the President said:

The certain prospect of the success of the Republican Party is that we shall be drawn in one form or another into the embroilments of the European war.

I now quote from the interview at the White House on August 19, 1919:

Senator McCUMBER. Would our moral conviction of the unrighteousness of the German war have brought us into this war if Germany had not committed any acts against us without the league of nations, as we had no league of nations at that time?

The PRESIDENT. I hope it would eventually, Senator, as things developed.

Senator McCUMBER. Do you think that if Germany had committed no act of war or no act of injustice against our citizens that we would have gotten into this war?

The PRESIDENT. I do think so.

Senator McCUMBER. You think we would have gotten in anyway?

The PRESIDENT. I do.

On the 19th of August, 1914, the President said:

The United States must be neutral in fact as well as in name during these days that are to try men's souls. We must be impartial in thought as well as in action, must put a curb upon our sentiments as well as upon every transaction that might be construed as a preference of one party to the struggle before another.

When we entered the war, on the 6th of April, 1917, evidently the President had seen reason to change his mind—very fortunately, as I think, and greatly to his credit. But if we are looking for inconsistencies they can be found even in the greatest men.

The Great War—

He said again in an address before the League to Enforce Peace, at Washington, May 27, 1916—

The Great War, that broke so suddenly upon the world two years ago, and which has swept within its flame so great a part of the civilized world, has affected us very profoundly, and we are not only at liberty, it is perhaps our duty, to speak very frankly of it and of the great interests of civilization which it affects.

With its causes and its objects we are not concerned. The obscure fountains from which its stupendous flood has burst forth we are not interested to search for or explore.

On the 19th of August, 1919, he stated to the committee, as I have just read, that we should have gone into the war anyway even if Germany had not committed acts which required us to go into the war. Again, I think, I may have pointed out certain inconsistencies.

He then said in his speech at Des Moines on February 1, 1916:

There are actually men in America who are preaching war, who are preaching the duty of the United States to do what it never would before, seek entanglements in the controversies which have arisen on the other side of the water—abandon its habitual and traditional policy and deliberately engage in the conflict which is now engulfing the rest of the world. I do not know what the standard of citizenship of these gentlemen may be. I only know that I for one can not subscribe to those standards.

And yet to-day he is urging upon us a treaty which involves our entanglement in every European broil that comes up.

He said, at Kansas City, on February 2, 1916:

It would tear the heartstrings of America to be at war with any of the great nations of the world. We can show our friendship for the world and our devotion to the principles of humanity better and more effectively by keeping out of this struggle than by getting into it.

Subsequently we got into it. Now we are preparing to get into some more, as I think.

We have been neutral—

He said in the speech accepting renomination—

We have been neutral not only because it was the fixed and traditional policy of the United States to stand aloof from the politics of Europe * * * but because it was manifestly our duty to prevent, if it were possible, the extension of the fires of hate and desolation kindled by that terrible conflict.

That was on the 2d of September, 1916, and the following April we were at war. He said in Chicago on the 31st of January, 1916:

I believe that we can serve the nations at war better by remaining at peace and holding off from this contest than we could possibly serve them in any other way. Your interest, your sympathy, your affection may be engaged on one side or the other, but it is your duty to stand off and not let this Nation be drawn into the war.

That was on the 31st of January, 1916, and in April, 1917, a little over a year later, we were at war, justly, rightly, and I commend his doing it; I do not criticize him because he was inconsistent, but he was inconsistent a year later.

In the first Lusitania note of May 10, 1915, he said:

Long acquainted as this Government has been with the character of the Imperial German Government and with the high principles of equity by which they have in the past been actuated and guided, the Government of the United States can not believe that the commanders of the vessels which committed these acts of lawlessness did so except under a misapprehension of the orders issued by the Imperial German naval authorities.

He then said on May 10, 1915:

The example of America must be a special example. The example of America must be the example of peace, not merely because it will not fight, but of peace because peace is the healing and the elevating influence of the world and strife is not. There is such a thing as a man being too proud to fight.

On October 11, 1915, he said:

America stands apart in its ideals; it ought not to allow itself to be drawn, as far as its heart is concerned, into anybody's quarrel.

We went to war in April, 1917, and now we are making a treaty which involves us, by its terms, in literally everybody's quarrels for an indefinite future.

On the 24th of October, 1918, he said:

If you have approved of my leadership and wish me to continue to be your unembarrassed spokesman at home and abroad, I earnestly beg that you will express yourself unmistakably to that effect by returning a Democratic majority in both the Senate and the House of Representatives.

I do not charge him with any inconsistency there. That was simply a misapprehension and a misfortune—a misfortune for him in making the appeal.

On May 17, 1916, he said:

Since the rest of the world is mad, why should we not refuse to have anything to do with the rest of the world in the ordinary channels of action?

To-day we are supposed to have the ordinary channels of action. Peace has come. He thought the rest of the world was mad, but now he does not seem to be in favor of having nothing to do with the rest of the world in the ordinary channels of action. We are told that all the hope of humanity is there.

On December 8, 1914, he said:

More than this, proposed at this time, permit me to say, would mean merely that we had lost our self-possession; that we had been thrown off our balance by a war with which we have nothing to do, whose causes can not touch us.

I do not say whether he was right or wrong. This is not the time to debate merits or demerits. I merely want to point out that when we come to inconsistencies, they can be found in many places.

On July 23, 1915, he said:

The Government of the United States and the Imperial German Government are contending for the same great object; have long stood together in urging the very principles upon which the Government of the United States now so solemnly insists. They both are contending for the freedom of the seas.

At that time we were contending for the same great principle for which Germany was contending, and the principle for which she was contending at sea was the submarine and the mine and interference with every form of neutral commerce. I have found nothing that contradicts that statement; it has never apparently been changed; but the freedom of the seas has gone with much else in the Paris treaty—well gone, I think, for it was a German freedom of the seas for which the President was then standing.

On February 3, 1906, the President said:

We believe that we can show our friendship for the world and our devotion for the purposes of humanity better by keeping out of this trouble than by getting into it.

On January 25, 1919, he said:

This was a war not only to redeem France from an enemy but to redeem the world from an enemy.

In 1916 he thought to show our devotion to the world we ought at all hazards to keep out of the war then raging, but in 1919 he thought we were wise and that it was right that we should go in to redeem France and to defeat Germany. I think his second opinion was correct, and I am glad he changed his first opinion.

On February 3, 1916, he said:

I have no indictment against any form of government.

And on June 14, 1917, he said:

They (the German Empire) impudently denied us the use of the high seas and repeatedly exercised the threat that they would send to their death any of our people who ventured to approach the coasts of Europe. * * * This flag under which we serve would have been dishonored had we withheld our hand.

I think that is a very good imitation of an indictment against a certain form of government. I sympathized with the indictment but not with the refusal to indict. On December 20, 1916, the President said:

I take the liberty of calling attention to the fact that the objects of the statesmen of the belligerents on both sides are virtually the same, as stated to their own people and to the world.

On April 1, 1917, speaking of the German war, he said:

It is a war against all nations. * * * The challenge is to all mankind.

On the next day he said:

The world must be made safe for democracy. Its peace must be planted upon the tested foundations of political liberty.

Again an inconsistency. I think the second decision was right, and it would have been unfortunate if the President had not changed his mind. On April 2, 1917, the President also said:

We do not wish to fight her (Germany) either with arms or hostile arrangements of trade, if she is willing to associate herself with us and other peace-loving nations of the world in the covenants of justice and fair dealing. We wish her only to accept a place of equality among the peoples of the world—the new world in which we live—instead of a place of mastery.

On December 4, 1917, he said:

This intolerable thing of which the masters of Germany have shown us the ugly face, this menace of combined intrigue and force, which we now see clearly as the German power * * *.

Mr. President, I have merely introduced a few quotations. I could go on at great length piling up contradictions as to other matters, but I do not think the fact that the President has changed his mind in regard to the war in Europe, in regard to entangling alliances, and in regard to our mixing in the broils of Europe has any relation whatever to the merits of the case. I never should have thought of citing these instances if the President had not become distressed about my inconsistencies.

Mr. President, in conclusion I wish to read just a few words from the close of the speech to which I have referred, and which was delievered by me in the Senate on Thursday, February 1, 1917:

As an example of what I mean, let me call your attention to the resolution offered by the Senator from Idaho. It meets with my full approval at the present time, for I now see in this tortured and distracted world nothing but peril in abandoning our long and well-established policies, which have behind them not only the authority of Washington and Jefferson and Adams and Monroe, but a long acceptance by the American people. Let it not be forgotten that if we pass that resolution we close the door for the time being, so far as the Senate is concerned, upon a proposition that we should join a league for peace backed by the organized major force of mankind.

That was the President's proposition.

This resolution commits us without reserve to the policy, in regard to foreign nations, of Washington, Monroe, and Jefferson, whose statements are as clear as the unclouded sun at noonday, and are not collections of double-meaning words under which men can hide and say they mean anything or nothing. Let there be no mistake about what we are doing in this direction. I would not have our action misunderstood there any more than I should wish to see a mistake made if resolutions were adopted in a sense to which I was opposed. There is no lurking place for a league for peace "supported by the organized major force of mankind" in the sentences of George Washington and Thomas Jefferson set forth in the preamble to which the resolution of the Senator from Idaho declares our allegiance.

This war will end; the passions of mankind will die down; individual ambitions will vanish with the evanescent beings who cherish them; but the Republic and the American people will remain. Let us beware how we take any steps which may precipitate this country and the people who are to come after us, and whose inheritance it is, into dangers which no man can foresee. We can not secure our own safety nor build up the lasting peace of the world upon peace at any price. The peace of the world, to be enduring, must be based on righteousness at any cost.

That was the prediction which I made and the position which I ventured to take in February, 1917, before we entered the war. From that position at least I have never swerved. One of the reasons why I object to the provisions of this treaty is that it endangers the sovereignty and the independence of the United States. I think now, as I always have thought and believed, that the United States is the best hope of mankind and will remain so as long as we do not destroy it by mingling in every broil and quarrel that may desolate the earth. [Applause in the galleries.]

I ask to have printed at the conclusion of my remarks the speech delivered by me in the Senate on February 1, 1917.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The speech referred to is as follows:

THE PRESIDENT'S PLAN FOR A WORLD PEACE.

[Speech of Hon. HENRY CABOT LODGE, of Massachusetts, in the Senate of the United States, Thursday, Feb. 1, 1917.]

"Mr. LODGE. Let me say, first, Mr. President, that I shall make no allusion whatever to the note from Germany which has startled the country this morning. That note is in the hands of the President, in the hands of the Chief Executive. It places upon him a great responsibility, and no word shall fall from my lips which by any possibility could embarrass him in dealing with that note. I shall confine myself absolutely to the propositions of the recent address by the President to the Senate.

"Mr. President, I have cherished an earnest hope that we might conclude the necessary business of Congress before the 4th of March and spare to ourselves and to the country the misfortune of another summer session. It is therefore with extreme reluctance that I venture to take any time in discussing a subject not immediately connected with the measures now demanding action if we are to avoid an extra session. I can find justification for doing so only in the extreme seriousness of the questions forced upon the attention of Congress by the President's address delivered in the Senate Chamber on Monday, the 22d day of January. Moreover, the President was kind enough to say that he sought this opportunity to address us because he thought that he owed it to us, as the council associated with him in the final determination of our international obligations, to disclose to us without reserve the thought and purpose that had been taking form in his mind in regard to the duty of our Government in the days to come when it will be necessary to lay afresh and upon a new plan the foundations of peace among the nations.

"The President has thus recognized the duties imposed upon the Senate by the Constitution in regard to our foreign relations and has invited an expression of our opinions. We have abundant evidence of the gravity of the questions thus presented. The newspaper press and others, employing generous if inaccurate language, have decorated the speech with the adjective 'epochal,' which calls at once to mind the movement of glaciers and vast tracts of geologic time. I shall content myself with a simpler word and say that the President's utterances in this Chamber, especially as he declared that he said what the people of the United States would wish him to say, and that he was setting forth the principles of mankind, are in a high degree important. I do not think that the failure on the part of the Senate to discuss the President's statements would imply either approval or disapproval or would by implication bind either the Senate or the country to any given course of action. But none the less it seems to me most desirable that as we were chosen in this instance to be the medium of communication with foreign nations and with the people of the United States we should at least give our own understanding of what the President proposed.

"It is not necessary, of course, to say anything as to the many general and just observations made by the President in regard to the horrors and miseries of war, or the dangers and complications with which the present conflict threatens the United States, or as to his or our duty as servants of humanity. Of course, we all agree most heartily with the proposition that peace—just and righteous peace—is infinitely better than war; that virtue is better than vice; that, in Browning's words:

> "It's wiser being good than bad;
> It's safer being meek than fierce;
> It's fitter being sane than mad.

"In all these declarations we must be cordially and thoroughly of one mind. All that I desire to do is to speak briefly of the substantive propositions contained in the President's address and, by analysis, discover, if I can, to precisely what policies and course of action he is undertaking to commit the country. We have a right—indeed, it is our duty—to learn, if possible, just what the President means and whither he is trying to lead us. To attain this object we must, in his own language, 'uncover the realities.'

"As I understand it, the President is aiming at two objects, both in the highest degree admirable—to bring to an end the war now raging in Europe, and to make provision for the future and permanent peace of the world. It is to the promotion of the second purpose that he proposes action on the part of the United States, saying that we should frankly formulate the conditions upon which this Government would feel justified in asking our people to approve its firm and solemn adherence to a league for peace. He then proceeds to state the two purposes in this way:

> "The present war must first be ended; but we owe it to candor and to a just regard for the opinion of mankind to say that, so far as our participation in guarantees of future peace is concerned, it makes a great deal of difference in what way and upon what terms it is ended. The treaties and agreements which bring it to an end must embody terms which will create a peace that is worth guaranteeing and preserving, a peace that will win the approval of mankind, not merely a peace that will serve the several interests and immediate aims of the nations engaged. We shall have no voice in determining what those terms shall be, but we shall, I feel sure, have a voice in determining whether they shall be made lasting or not by the guarantees of a universal covenant; and our judgment upon what is fundamental and essential as a condition precedent to permanency should be spoken now, not afterwards, when it may be too late.

"It will be observed that in this paragraph of his address the President says explicitly that the first condition precedent to any action for a league for peace must be the ending of the present war. He then declares that the treaties and agreements which bring the war to an end must create a peace which is worth guaranteeing and preserving. He says further that we shall have no voice in determining what those terms shall be, but that they can never be lasting or permanent unless they meet with our approval. It seems to me that this is equivalent to saying that we are to have no voice in what the terms of the peace which ends the present war shall be, but that at the same time the terms must be what we approve or we shall not be able to enter into any future league to preserve the peace of the world. In other words, our action is to be conditioned upon the terms of a peace which we have no voice in determining. If the belligerents when they come to make peace do not make all the terms satisfactory to us, they can not look to us to aid in making that peace lasting and permanent. The President then goes on to lay down the general principles upon which the terms of the peace, in which we are to have no voice, shall be based if the peace thus obtained is to be a peace worth having.

"In the first place, it must be a peace without victory. It is not quite clear just what this means, unless it is intended to be a declaration in the interest of one group of belligerents who, having abandoned the original hope of complete victory, wish to make peace in the most advantageous way now open to them. This interpretation must be at once dismissed, for it is not to be supposed for a moment that this can be the President's object, because we all know how devoted he is to neutrality—how it has been his belief from the beginning that it was the duty of the American people to be neutral even in their thoughts—and he is, of course, well aware that it is as easy to be unneutral in forcing a peace favorable to one side as it is to help one side against the other while war is raging. Peace without victory can only mean therefore that neither side is to gain anything by the terms of peace through victory in the field, because if there are no victories on either side there can be neither gains nor losses in the final settlement except through the voluntary self-sacrifice and generosity of the combatants; in other words, all the lives have been given in this war and all the money spent in vain and Europe is to emerge from the conflict in exactly the same situation as when she entered it. It seems to me incredible that people who have made such awful sacrifices as have been made by the belligerents should be content to forego the prospect of victory, in the hope of bringing the war to an end, with everything left just as it was. In such a result they might well think that all their efforts and losses, all their miseries and sorrows, and sacrifices were a criminal and hideous futility. Both sides have been inspired by the hope of victory; both sides are still so inspired. Some of the belligerents, at least, believe that the one object of the war is to win a victory which will assure a permanent peace and would regard a reproduction of the old conditions, with all their menacing possibilities, as something far worse than war. They are determined that the dark peril which has overshadowed their own lives and threatened the independence and very existence of their own countries shall not be permitted to darken the future and be a curse to their children and their children's children. For this they are fighting and suffering and dying. Perhaps they ought not to think in this way; perhaps they ought to feel as the President does. But we must deal with things as they are; we must uncover realities, and there is no doubt of the reality of the desire among many of the great nations of Europe to close this war with a victory which will give them a peace worth having, and not a mere breathing space filled with the upbuilding of crushing armaments and then another and a worse war. Such, I think, is their point of view; but as a practical question for us, dealing with a condition on which we are to build a future league for peace to which we are to be a party, how are we going to provide that it shall be a peace without victory? How are we to arrange that there shall be no victories?

"The President says that a peace won by victory would leave a bitter memory upon which peace terms could not rest permanently but only as upon quicksand. There has been pretty constant fighting in this unhappy world ever since the time when history begins its records, and in speaking of lasting peace in terms of history we can only speak comparatively. I think, however, that I am not mistaken in saying that since the fall of the Roman Empire the longest period of general peace which Europe and the Western World have enjoyed was during the 40 years following the Battle of Waterloo. During that time there were, of course, a few small and unimportant wars, but there was no great general conflict among great nations anywhere, and yet the peace of 1815 was a peace imposed upon France by the victorious allies if ever such a thing happened in the history of mankind. There was an attempt to settle that Napoleonic war by a treaty 'without victory' and between equals. The treaty was signed at Amiens on March 27, 1802. This 'peace without victory' lasted exactly 13 months and 19 days, and then war came again and continued for 12 years, and was ended by a peace through victory of the most absolute kind, and that peace has lasted between England and France for a hundred years and has never been broken. Our War with Spain ended with a peace based on the complete victory of the United States by land and sea. There is no reason to suppose that because it was a peace obtained by victory it is not a lasting peace. I might cite other examples, but one affirmative instance is enough to shatter a universal negative. As the Frenchman said, 'No generalization is ever completely true, not even this one.' It is a little hasty, therefore, to say that no peace can endure which is the fruit of victory. The peace which lasts is the peace which rests on justice and righteousness, and if it is a just and righteous peace it makes no difference whether it is based on the compromises and concessions of treaties or upon victories in the field. But I return to and repeat the main question before I leave this point. If peace without victory is to be a condition precedent of lasting peace to be maintained by the covenant in which we are to take part, how are we practically to compel or secure the existence of such a condition?

"The next condition precedent stated by the President without which we can have no peace that 'can last or ought to last' is the universal acceptance of the idea that governments derive all their just powers from the consent of the governed and that any peace which does not recognize and accept this principle will inevitably be upset. Must the fact that any given government rests on the consent of the governed be determined by a popular vote or by the general acceptance by the people of the existing form of government? Who is to decide whether the principle is recognized under the different governments of the world with whom we are to form the league for peace 'supported by the organized major force of mankind'? If the recognition of this principle is to be essential to the lasting peace which we are to support—and every American, of course, believes in and admires the principle—what is to be done about Korea, or Hindustan, or Alsace-Lorraine, or the Trentino, or the Slav Provinces of Austria, or the Danish Duchies? Does the government of Armenia by Turkey, with its organized massacres, rest on the consent of the governed, and if it does not are we to take steps to remedy it, or is Turkey to be excluded from the league, or is the league to coerce Turkey to an observance of our principles? As a preliminary of the peace which we are to help enforce must we insist that it can not exist if there are any people under any government who have been handed from sovereignty to sovereignty as if they were property? I am not contesting the justice of the principle—far from it—but we may well ask how we are going to compel the adoption of that principle by other governments, and this is no idle question but a real and practical one which can not be evaded. If we enter upon this most desirable reform of other nations, there may be people sufficiently malevolent to ask whether we secured Louisiana by a vote of the people of that Territory, or California and other acquisitions from Mexico, or the Philippines, or Porto Rico, or even Alaska, where there were Russian inhabitants who were handed over for a price, very much like property or as serfs adscripti glebae.

"The next condition precedent where I should like to 'uncover the reality' is that to obtain a firm and lasting peace we must have 'freedom of the seas.' The President does not say whether it is the high seas or all seas. Let us assume that it is the high seas. The demand must apply either to time of war or time of peace, or both; but for many, many years there has been no interference with the freedom of the seas in time of peace. I think we may therefore assume again that the President's 'freedom of the seas' must mean the freedom of the seas in time of war. Is the plan, then, to compel all nations to abandon the rights of belligerents to blockade a hostile port in time of war or to seize contraband going to their enemy? To attain this end we should have to begin by sweeping away all existing doctrines as to the rights of belligerents at sea in time of war—doctrines which were so widely extended in regard to contraband and blockade by the decisions of our own Supreme Court during our Civil War. These doctrines were established by us in the face of very general opposition and have been since accepted and acted upon by belligerents in other wars as the sound construction of international rights. We should therefore have to begin at once by tearing down the fabric of law on this point which we ourselves created and built up.

"In the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD (64th Congress, 2d session, pp. 236 to 238) there is a printed code prepared by a committee of the American Institute of International Law, which has been accepted by the institute and is to be presented to the 21 American Republics. This code deals with the freedom of commerce, the rights and duties of belligerents, and the rights and duties of neutrals in time of war. The committee was appointed to deal with this subject on the suggestion of Mr. Lansing, and this code is the result. I have no right to infer that this code represents what the President meant by the freedom of the seas in his recent address, but it embodies in concrete form some of the supposed cases which I have just suggested to the Senate. To state the propositions of the code fully—still more to discuss its details—would occupy hours, and I have only minutes to spare; but what Mr. Temple said when he presented it covers, in a general way, the general purposes of the code. Mr. Temple said:

"The seas are already free in time of peace. The new code provides for the freedom of the seas in time of war. It abolishes blockade entirely, forbids interference with the mails, declares that merchant ships of the enemy, as well as those of neutrals, shall be free from capture, and abolishes the right of visit and search. Even vessels carrying contraband may in no case be confiscated or sunk under any pretext whatever, though the contraband itself may be confiscated or destroyed by the captor.

"These are the radical changes which I have just been imagining as possible, and this code, if adopted, would sweep away practically all the most important belligerent rights at sea which have hitherto existed, as well as the doctrines which we extended and laid down during our Civil War and the decisions of our Supreme Court. I do not suppose that there is any idea of overthrowing and sweeping away international law, the work of centuries, in regard to belligerent rights at sea during the present war, which began with the old system fully recognized by the world and which could not now be altered, except by an entire breach of neutrality if attempted by neutrals. I assume that this new code is to take effect after the war.

"There are only two comments which I desire to make upon it. One is that if it embodies the freedom of the seas spoken of by the President in general terms it would require for its enforcement the navies of all nations who were parties to the league for peace, for, if belligerents engaged in war rested their rights on existing law and long-established usage they could only be brought into obedience to the new code by force, and, as I have already said, we should then, as a party to the league, be obliged by force of arms to take our share in preventing the exercise of these long-established rights. The conference of neutrals provided for in the code would be looked to for its maintenance and the occurrences of the present war do not give us much hope that such a conference would be very effective in future wars.

"My other comment is this: There has been no violation of the rights of neutrals so glaring as the planting of contact mines on the high seas. That is a method of destruction without warrant of international law or the customs and usages of nations. A contact mine is no respecter of persons. It is just as likely to destroy a perfectly innocent ship without contraband and on a perfectly innocent voyage as it is to destroy the warship of a belligerent. No worse attack upon the rights of neutrals could have been made than by this planting of contact mines on the high seas. So far as I am aware no neutral has protested against it—certainly no neutral has protested effectively—and I observe with some surprise that in all this long code for the protection of neutral rights upon the seas in time of war there is not one word said to prevent the planting of contact mines upon the high seas. If this code represents the President's conception of the freedom of the high seas, it is in this respect, at least, very imperfect. It will also be observed that in this code it is provided that—

"In important cases the conference may authorize severe measures against the belligerent or against the neutrals refusing to respect the rights and duties of neutrality.

"Such measures may be public blame, pecuniary indemnity, commercial boycott, and even the use of international force, to be determined by the conference.

"So that whether or not a league for peace is created, under the conference of neutrals proposed by this code we should be obliged to take very strong measures for the enforcement of neutral rights as agreed to by the conference, and at the bidding of the majority of the conference we should be forced into war in order to compel the belligerents to obey our rules. Therefore this proposal does not differ in essence from the league for peace supported by the major force of mankind. Whether the cases which I have supposed or the new code suggested by the institute represent the freedom of the seas, it would seem as if the enforcement of this new doctrine would surely involve us, and those nations which sign the covenant with us, in every war which might occur between maritime nations.

"Closely allied with this proposition for the freedom of the seas, the President tells us, is the limitation of armaments and the cooperation of the navies of the world in keeping the seas free and safe. This, as I have just pointed out, would involve the use of our Navy in any war where the belligerents saw fit to exercise their long-established rights. The limitation of armaments, although not made by the President a condition precedent for lasting peace, is treated by him as of great importance, and opens up some very difficult questions. If all naval armaments are to be limited, or, still more, if they are to be abolished, the result would be to leave the nation having the largest mercantile marine in complete control of the seas if war occurred, because if there were no naval ships the nation which could arm and put afloat the greatest number of merchant vessels for naval purposes would, of course, be supreme in the absence of ships of war. Before entering upon the freedom of the seas, allied with the limitation of armaments, it would be well to consider whether the world would thereby be left under a system which in time of war would confer absolute power upon the nation possessing the largest mercantile marine.

"It will also be necessary for the firm and lasting peace which the league proposed by the President is to bring about that every great people now struggling toward a full development of its resources and its powers be assured a direct outlet to the sea. The President confines this important right to the 'great peoples,' which does not seem to harmonize entirely with his earlier proposition that there must be no difference, recognized or implied, between big nations and small, 'between those which are powerful and those which are weak,' or with the declaration that the equality of nations, upon which peace must be founded, must be an equality of rights. If the right of access to the sea is to be confined, as the President says, to 'every great people,' small nations are excluded. We have ample access to two great oceans, so that this proposed reform of the President has the enormous advantage of being wholly altruistic. It is entirely for the benefit of others.

"Coming down to the practical question, in order that we may obtain lasting peace are we to see to it that a direct right of way to Constantinople shall be secured to Russia, that she may reach the Mediterranean, and to Germany, that she may have a direct route to Bagdad and the Persian Gulf? Must we see to it that if Italy regains the Trentino, Trieste shall be kept open, so that Germany and Austria may have access to the Mediterranean, and are Serbia and Switzerland to be deprived of the right of way giving them access to the sea because they are small? Are we to bring the doctrine into the American Hemisphere and provide that Bolivia and Paraguay shall have direct access to the sea? Are we to carry the doctrine to Asia and make sure that Afghanistan has a right of way to the sea, or is Afghanistan excluded as a small power? It seems to me that this plan for securing free access to the sea to all the great nations of Europe, and still more to the nations, both great and small, would involve us in some very difficult questions wholly outside our proper sphere of influence; and yet the President states this as one of the essentials for the lasting peace which we are to covenant to bring about and to enforce.

"The President says that he proposes, as it were, that the nations with one accord should adopt the doctrine of President Monroe as the doctrine of the world. In the effort which I am making to uncover the realities which lie behind the President's propositions and to avoid 'the soft concealments' to which he justly objects, I do not find it easy to determine precisely what is meant by making the doctrine of President Monroe the doctrine of the world. Let me begin by quoting the doctrine as stated by President Monroe. The Monroe doctrine appears, as everyone knows, in the President's annual message of December 2, 1823. It is found in two separate passages. The first is connected with the statement made by the President as to the proposition of the Russian Government to arrange by negotiation the respective rights of the two nations upon the northwest coast of this continent. President Monroe then says:

"In the discussions to which this interest has given rise and in the arrangements by which they may terminate the occasion has been judged proper for asserting, as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved, that the American continents, by the free and independent condition which they have assumed and maintain, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European powers.

"The second declaration of the doctrine occurs in connection with that portion of the message devoted to South America and to the purposes of the Holy Alliance, and is as follows:

"We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere. But with the Governments who have declared their independence and maintained it, and whose independence we have, on great consideration and on just principles, acknowledged, we could not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them or controlling in any other manner their destiny by any European power in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfavorable disposition toward the United States.

"John Quincy Adams who formulated and President Monroe who proclaimed the doctrine, which rightly bears the latter's name, were eminent men of very large experience, both in public affairs at home and in diplomacy. They knew well the value of words. Mr. Adams was a scholar with a remarkable power of expression. No doubt they both could, if they had seen fit, have said something which meant nothing, for that is an art as old as language itself. But it may be doubted if either was able or would have consented to say something which might mean anything. They were upright, straightforward men, and Mr. Monroe stated his famous doctrine in plain, unmistakable terms which he who ran might read. When we examine the message of 1823 it will be observed that the Monroe doctrine is strictly local in its application; that is, it applies only to the American Hemisphere and is based on the theory that there are two spheres in the world which are entirely separate in their political interests. How are we to reframe the first portion of the Monroe doctrine so as to give it a world-wide application? It asserts that the American Continents are not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power. How is this proposition to be turned into a world doctrine? If all the European powers accepted that doctrine and agreed with us that they would attempt no colonization here, we should have the recognition of the doctrine by European powers, but the doctrine would apply to the same territory as before. How are we to make it a world doctrine in any other way? How are we to turn into a world doctrine President Monroe's second statement that he should regard it as an unfriendly act if any European power interfered with the independence of any American Government? Is the transformation to be effected by having Europe and Asia and Africa adopt a doctrine that there shall be no colonies established by any power on any of those great continents, and that if, for example, any European power should establish a new colony somewhere in Africa we should regard it as an unfriendly act? It has been suggested that the Monroe doctrine would cover the protection of small nations. The Monroe doctrine has nothing to do with the rights of small or great powers as such. Its declared purpose was simply to protect the independence of all American States, great and small, from the interference of Europe and to prohibit European colonization. How can it be said that it concerns the rights of small States when Argentina and Brazil have taken control of Paraguay, when Chile has by force of arms annexed part of Peru, and when we took by conquest the larger part of Mexico, and no one, either at home or abroad, ever suggested that these acts constituted in any way an infraction of the Monroe doctrine? The Monroe doctrine defined our position and defined nobody else's position, and if we are to extend that doctrine to the other nations the only sanction it could carry would be that we should regard European colonization in all continents as an unfriendly act. Or does the President's proposition mean that the Monroe doctrine is to be extended to all the world and thereby be abandoned under the law laid down by John Fiske in regard to myths—that when we find a story of something which has happened everywhere we may be quite sure that it never happened anywhere—so that if we have a Monroe doctrine everywhere we may be perfectly certain that it will not exist anywhere? If we are to abandon the Monroe doctrine, this is one way of doing it.

"I have tried very briefly to set forth the conditions precedent which the President says are essential to a lasting peace. I have endeavored in a very general and imperfect way to 'uncover the realities' and to get rid of all 'soft concealments.' Now, having clearly in our minds these conditions precedent, vital to the establishment of a lasting peace which we are to help bring about, I desire to consider the part which we are to take in maintaining it. Let me say at the outset, by way of preface, that it seems to me unwise to entangle the question of what shall be done to make peace permanent after the conclusion of the present war with the peace which is to terminate this war. It confuses two wholly distinct questions, and is certainly injurious to the prospect of the success of any attempt to make the peace which comes at the end of this war permanent. It tends also to create ill feeling toward the United States on one side or the other, and perhaps on both, and the influence of the United States in behalf of the future peace of the world will not be increased but will, I fear, be sadly diminished if we endeavor, directly or indirectly, to meddle with the terms of the peace which shall conclude the present war, because in so doing we should inevitably takes sides with one group of belligerents or with another.

"Let us now consider what has already been done in behalf of world peace and what it is proposed we shall do in the future, because that question has been forced upon us. All international associations or agreements for the promotion of the world's peace have hitherto been voluntary; that is, there has been no sanction behind the decisions of the international tribunals or behind the international agreements. If any signatory of the agreements or treaties, or any party to an arbitration, declined to be bound by a decision of the tribunal which had been created or by the provisions of an international convention, there was no means of compelling such signatory to abide by them, a fact which has been most dismally demonstrated since this war began.

"The chief practical result of international associations for the promotion of peace has taken the form of arrangements for the arbitration of disputed questions. The subjects of these arbitrations have been limited and the submission of the nations to the international tribunals and their decisions has been purely voluntary. Much good has been obtained by voluntary arbitration. Many minor questions which a hundred years ago led to reprisals, and sometimes to war, have been removed from the region of armed hostilities and brought within the range of peaceable settlement. Voluntary arbitrations, which have gone on in steadily increasing number and in the promotion of which the United States has played a large, creditable, and influential part, have now reached, as they were certain to do, their natural limits; that is, they have been made to include in practice all the questions which can at present be covered by voluntary arbitration. The efforts which have been made to carry voluntary arbitration beyond its proper sphere—like our recent treaties involving a year's delay and attempting to deal with the vital interests of nations—are useless but by no means harmless. They are, indeed, distinctly mischievous, because in time of stress and peril no nation would regard them, and a treaty which can not be or will not be scrupulously fulfilled is infinitely worse than no treaty at all. No greater harm can be done to the cause of peace between the nations than to make treaties which will not be under all conditions scrupulously observed. The disregard of treaties is a most prolific cause of war. Nothing has done more to envenom feeling in the present war or to prolong it than the disregard of the treaty guaranteeing the neutrality of Belgium and the further disregard of The Hague conventions, for this has implanted in the minds of men the belief that treaties bring no settlement and are not worth the paper upon which they are written; that the only security of peace is to be found in the destruction of the enemy and in placing an opponent in a physical condition where he is unable to renew war, because there is no assurance of safety in a duly ratified treaty.

"If, then, voluntary arbitration and voluntary agreements, by convention or otherwise, without any sanction, have reached their limits, what is the next step? There is only one possible advance, and that is to put a sanction behind the decision of an international tribunal or behind an agreement of the nations; in other words, to create a power to enforce the decree of the international courts or the provisions of the international agreements. There is no other solution. I have given a great deal of thought to this question and I admit that at first it seemed to me that it might be possible to put force behind the world's peace. The peace and order of towns and cities, of States and nations, are all maintained by force. The force may not be displayed—usually there is no necessity for doing so—but order exists in our towns, in our cities, in our States, and in our Nation, and the decrees of our courts are enforced solely because of the existence of overwhelming force behind them. It is known that behind the decrees of the courts of the United States there is an irresistible force. If the peace of the world is to be maintained as the peace of a city or the internal peace of a nation is maintained, it must be maintained in the same way—by force. To make an agreement among the nations for the maintenance of peace and leave it to each nation to decide whether its force should be used in a given case to prevent war between two or more other nations of the world does not advance us at all; we are still under the voluntary system. There is no escape from the conclusion that if we are to go beyond purely voluntary arbitration and purely voluntary agreements, actual international force must be placed behind the decisions or the agreements. There is no halfway house to stop at. The system must be either voluntary or there must be force behind the agreement or the decision. It makes no difference whether that force is expressed by armies and navies, or by economic coercion, as suggested by Sir Frederick Pollock. It is always force, and it is of little consequence whether the recalcitrant nation is brought to obedience by armed men and all the circumstance of war, or by commercial ruin, popular suffering and perhaps starvation, inflicted by the major force of mankind under the direction of the league for peace. It is ever and always force.

"Everyone must feel, as I do, the enormous importance of securing in some way the peace of the world and relieving the future of humanity from such awful struggles as that which is now going on in Europe, but if the only advance is to be made through the creation of an international force we are brought face to face with the difficulties of that system. The President sees this clearly. He proposes that we should adhere to a league for peace and then says:

"It will be absolutely necessary that a force be created as a guarantor of the permanency of the settlement so much greater than the force of any nation now engaged or any alliance hitherto formed or projected that no nation, no probable combination of nations, could face or withstand it. If the peace presently to be made is to endure, it must be a peace made secure by the organized major force of mankind.

"Nothing could be plainer or more direct than that statement, and if we are to advance from the voluntary stage it must be, as the President says, by a league for peace behind which is the organized major force of mankind. I fully agree with the President that if we are to have a league such as he describes and are to enforce peace it must be done in just the way he has stated. As a general proposition nothing could be more attractive for those who desire the peace of the world. I confess that when I first began to consider it some two years ago it presented great attractions to me, but the more I have thought about it the more serious the difficulties in the way of its accomplishment seem to be. This is a matter which can not be determined by verbal adherence to a general principle. Everything here depends upon the details. In the first place, a league to enforce the peace of the world and create a major force of mankind to carry out the purposes of the league must be made by treaty or convention among the nations agreeing. The agreement must be of the most solemn and binding kind. When disputes arise among nations, whether such nations are members of the league or not, those disputes must either be determined by an international tribunal created by the treaties agreed to by the members of the league, or they must be settled by representatives of the league after due consideration. So far all is simple. It is no new thing to create international tribunals or to make agreements as to methods to be employed in war, the rights of neutrals, and the many other subjects now covered by the voluntary Hague conventions. The first difficulty comes when the league is confronted by the refusal of a nation involved in dispute with another nation to abide by the decision of the league when that decision has been rendered by an international tribunal or in any other way. Submission to such a decision can only be compelled as submission to a decision of the court is compelled—by force—in this case the organized major force of mankind. If, therefore, a decision has been made in a dispute between nations by the tribunal and authority of the league, all the members of the league are bound by their treaties to contribute their share toward the enforcement of the decision, and if a recalcitrant nation resists, it means war and the vindication of the power of the league which has the control of the major force of organized mankind. The authorities of the league would, of necessity, have the power to call on every member of the league to send out its quota to the forces of the league and the nations forming the league would find themselves, of necessity, involved in war.

"The first question that would occur to any one of us is what the numbers of the league force will be. I will not venture a guess myself, but I will quote the opinion of Prof. Albert Bushnell Hart, the distinguished historian, a close student and high authority on all American policies and a most friendly critic of the President's address. In a very interesting article in the New York Times of January 28, 1917, Prof. Hart says:

"He (the President) does incline toward the general plan which is pushed by the League to Enforce Peace. For, he says: 'It will be absolutely necessary that a force be created as a guarantor of the permanency of the settlement so much greater than the force of any nation now engaged, or any alliance hitherto formed or projected, that no nation, no probable combination, could face or withstand it.'"

"If that means anything definite, it means an international police force of not less than 5,000,000 men, in which the share of the United States would be at least 500,000.

"There is the estimate of a dispassionate and competent observer. Will it not be worth while to pause a moment before we commit ourselves to an Army of 500,000 men, to be held ready for war at the pleasure of other nations in whose councils we shall have but one vote if we are true to the President's policy of the equality of nations?

"Arrangements would have to be made for the command of the forces of the league, and the commander would have to be taken from some one of the signatory nations. The quota or units of the international army and navy would have to be inspected at least annually. The inspectors would be of necessity officers of the league's army and navy. Are we ready to have our Army and Navy inspected and reported upon at regular intervals by the officers of foreign services? It may be said by those who wish to have the world's peace assured by force, without using force to do it, why conjure up these phantoms of unpleasant possibilities? My reply is that they are not phantoms but simply the realities which it is our duty to uncover and upon which the whole scheme is founded. You can not make effective a league for peace, 'supported by the organized major force of mankind,' by language or high-sounding phrases, which fall so agreeably upon the ear, when there is no thought behind it. The forces of the league must consist of an army and navy. They must have rifles and machine guns and cannon, battleships and battle cruisers, submarines and aeroplanes, and all the terrific machinery of modern war. They can not set that machinery in motion by 'calling spirits from the vasty deep' like Glendower. They must have men of flesh and blood to man their ships and fight their guns, and these men must be officered and commanded. Then when they order these forces to move they can enforce peace, and they will do it by war, if necessary, in which each member of the league must bear its part. Representatives of the league would thus be vested with the authority to make war and to put the league forces under the control of some commander whom they should select.

"If we are to adhere to the principle of the equality of nations laid down by the President, each nation, great and small, having equality of rights, would have an equal voice in the decision of the league, and a majority would set the forces of the league in motion. It might happen that the majority would be composed of the smaller and weaker nations, who, if they are to have equality of rights, would thus be enabled to precipitate the greater nations into war, into a war perhaps with one of the greatest nations of the league. In the present state of human nature and public opinion is it probable that any nation will bind itself to go to war at the command of other nations and furnish its army and navy to be disposed of as the majority of other nations may see fit? It seems to me that it is hardly possible, and yet in what other way can we come to the practical side of this question? In what other way are you to enforce the decisions of the league? If you undertake to limit the questions of disputes between nations which the league shall decide, you will not be able to go beyond the limits already imposed in voluntary arbitration and there will be no need of force. If a real advance is to be made, you must go beyond those limitations, you must agree to submit to the decision of the league questions which no nation will now admit to be arbitrable. You would be compelled, if a decree of the league were resisted, to go to war without any action on the part of Congress and wholly on the command of other nations. We are all anxious to promote peace in every possible way, but if we are to maintain the peace of the world by force it can only be maintained in the way I have described, and no amount of shouting about the blessings of peace will relieve us from the obligations or the necessities imposed by putting force behind the peace of the world as we put it behind the peace of a city.

"Let us now consider this plan from our own point of view alone and with reference solely to the United States. The policy of the United States hitherto has been the policy laid down by Washington, and its corollary expressed in the message of President Monroe. Washington declared that we had a set of interests separate from those of Europe and that European political questions did not concern us. Monroe declared that we had a set of questions which did not concern Europe, and that, as we did not meddle with Europe, Europe must not meddle with us. These doctrines were approved and stated with great force and explicitness by Jefferson. From the time of their enunciation these policies have been followed and adhered to by the United States. I have the greatest possible reverence for the precepts of Washington; no wiser, no more farseeing, man ever lived. I only wish that we had followed all his precepts as closely as we have that which he laid down as to our relations with Europe. But I have no superstition in regard to Washington's policy, nor do I think he had. He set forth his policy under conditions not unlike those which now exist, and he stated very explicitly that we should not involve ourselves in any way in the ordinary vicissitudes of European politics. I think he meant that we should hold ourselves aloof and that this should be our guiding rule. I am far from thinking that the man who won the Revolution largely through the alliance with France would have suggested that there could be no possible situation in which it might not be well for us to form an alliance with some other nation or nations. But that situation certainly has hitherto never arisen. The wisdom of Washington's policy, supplemented by that of Monroe, has been demonstrated by the experience of more than a century, and this at least must be said, that we should not depart from it without most powerful reasons and without knowing exactly where that departure would lead. We are now invited to depart from it by giving our adherence to a league for peace when the present war closes, without knowing how far it is proposed to go or what is to be demanded of us. If an effective league for peace among the nations is to be made, it must be one backed by the force which the President has described. Are we prepared to commit ourselves to a purely general proposition without knowing where we are going or what is to be demanded of us, except that we shall be compelled to furnish our quota of military and naval forces to the service of a league in which we shall have but one voice? We are asked to place ourselves in a position where our military forces could be used for war by the decree of other nations. This would be a very momentous step. Surely we ought to pause and consider very carefully and know every detail before we commit ourselves to any vague, general propositions involving such serious results and responsibilities.

"The first service which the United States can render to the cause of peace is to preserve its own. I do not mean within its own borders, but to preserve its peace with the other nations of the earth. This can be done in only one way—by the most absolute and scrupulous observance of every treaty or agreement that we enter into; by the termination of all treaties for arbitration which we know well we should not under certain conditions and in time of stress regard, for no such war-breeding treaties ought to cumber the ground; and, lastly, by the establishment of such national defenses, both by land and sea, as to insure our country, so far as it can be done, from wanton attack. When we have taken steps to insure our own peace and have national defenses sufficient for that purpose, the next step, if we are to become members of this league for peace, would be to put our national forces, or a portion of them, at the disposition of the league under conditions established by the terms of the treaty which creates the league. If we are not prepared to take these obligations; if we are not ready to submit questions which we consider of vital interest to the decision of the league; if we are not fully prepared to carry out all our obligations which a league for peace would necessarily require, we had better restrict ourselves to the voluntary arbitration, which we know can be carried out, until the people of the United States are ready to go further. A league for peace has a most encouraging sound, but this is altogether too grave a question to be satisfied with words. We must realize that a league for peace means putting force behind peace and making war on any nation which does not obey the decisions of the league. It may be that the world's peace can be secured in this manner, but we should not attempt it without a full appreciation of just what it involves. Effective leagues for peace can not be sustained by language alone nor by moral suasion as their only weapons. I reiterate with all possible emphasis that when they pass beyond the present voluntary stage they must be sustained by men and arms, and if we are ready to assume that responsibility, then we may proceed to take the necessary steps, but not otherwise.

"Let me take two examples of questions which we must be prepared to face as members of a league for peace 'supported by the major force of mankind.' If, as I have already said, such a league is formed, it must deal with questions of vital interest and go beyond the limitations of voluntary agreements, for if it does not there will be no advance on the present conditions. Assume that such a league has been formed, with the powers which I have outlined. China and Japan, we will say, acting on the principles of the brotherhood of man which this league is to embody, come before the representatives of the league and demand for their people the right of free emigration to Canada, Australia, and New Zealand, which now practically exclude them. Suppose the league decides that the people of China and Japan ought not to be deprived of the right to migrate anywhere, and that Canada, Australia, and New Zealand, backed by England, decline to accept this decision. The league will then proceed to enforce its decision, and we shall find ourselves obliged to furnish our quota to a force which will compel the admission of Asiatic labor to Canada. Are we prepared to make war upon Canada in such a cause as this, our quota of the forces of the league perhaps being under the orders of a Japanese commander in chief? Let us turn the question the other way. Suppose the Asiatic powers demand the free admission of their labor to the United States, and we resist, and the decision of the league goes against us. Are we going to accept it? Is it possible that anyone who wishes to preserve our standards of life and labor can be drawn into a scheme, veiled by glittering and glancing generalities, which would take from us our sovereign right to decide alone and for ourselves the vital question of the exclusion of Mongolian and Asiatic labor? These are not fanciful cases drawn from the region of the imagination. They are actual, living questions of the utmost vitality and peril to-day. In them is involved that deepest of human instincts which seeks not only to prevent an impossible competition in labor but to maintain the purity of the race. Are we prepared to make any agreement which would put us in such a position as that? Before we give our adhesion to a league for peace let us consider all these contingencies. The time will not be wasted which we give to such consideration.

"I hear already the clamor of those who have been shrieking for peace at any price and denouncing all armaments, rising around us with the passionate demand that we shall immediately join a league for peace, about the details of which they neither know nor care, but which will compel the establishment of large naval and military forces, and which may plunge us into war in any quarter of the globe at any moment at the bidding of other nations. Such is the magic of a word to those who are content with vocal sounds and ask only that the word they love be shouted with sufficient loudness. But they, too, if they persist, will meet the day when words are vain, when there is no help or shelter in language, and when they must face relentless, unforgiving realities. I know well the question which can be put to me, and probably will be put to me here and elsewhere: 'Are you, then, unwilling to use the power and influence of the United States for the promotion of the permanent peace of the world?' Not at all; there is nothing that I have so much at heart. But I do not, in my eagerness to promote the permanent peace of the world, desire to involve this country in a scheme which may create a situation worse than that which now exists. Sometimes it is better to 'bear the ills we have than fly to others that we know not of.' There are measures which will promote peace and which are wholly practicable. The first and most important is the protection of our own peace against foreign attack. That can only be done by national defense, and we have no adequate national defense now. We have no means of repelling the invasion of a great power as it must be repelled, and such weakness, combined with great wealth, constitutes an invitation and a temptation to war. Against that danger we should insure ourselves by adequate national defenses, and by reducing the danger of war being forced upon us we to that extent promote the peace of mankind and we likewise put ourselves in a position where our influence and power in the world for the maintenance of general peace would be enormously increased. The next thing to which we ought to address ourselves on the conclusion of this war should be the rehabilitation and reestablishment of international law. International law represents a great mass of customs and usages which have become law and which have been observed, cited, and referred to by the nations. International law has had an ever-increasing power in guiding and controlling the conduct of nations toward each other. The fact that it has been violated and disregarded in many instances during the present conflict is no reason for adopting the counsel of despair and saying that it is of no value and must be abandoned. It is of enormous value and should be restored and upbuilt on the conclusion of this war with all the energy and influence which we can bring to bear. We should try also, within the necessary and natural limits, to extend the use of voluntary arbitration, so far as possible, and create, as we can well do, a powerful public opinion behind the system and behind the maintenance of peace. We can also do much in urging a general reduction of armaments by all nations.

"It may be said that these are but slight improvements and but moderate advances. This may all be true, but what I propose has at least this merit—it is not visionary, and I suggest nothing which is not practical and reasonable and which will not, within its limitations, do substantial good. If there is any way in which we can go further without creating a worse condition nobody will be more rejoiced than I; but I do not wish to plunge blindly forward, misled by phrases and generalities, into undertakings which threaten worse results than the imperfect conditions now existing. We are as a people altogether too prone to be satisfied with words; to believe that we advance the cause of peace or any good cause merely by shouting for it. When we approach such questions as are involved in our relations with the other nations of the earth and such a mighty issue as the maintenance of the world's peace, to be misled by words and to take words for deeds would be a fatal error. Whatever we decide to do, let us know precisely what we are doing and what we may reasonably expect.

"As an example of what I mean, let me call your attention to the resolution offered by the Senator from Idaho. It meets with my full approval at the present time, for I now see in this tortured and distracted world nothing but peril in abandoning our long and well-established policies, which have behind them not only the authority of Washington and Jefferson and Adams and Monroe but a long acceptance by the American people. Let it not be forgotten that if we pass that resolution we close the door for the time being, so far as the Senate is concerned, upon a proposition that we should join a league for peace backed by the organized major force of mankind. This resolution commits us without reserve to the policy, in regard to foreign nations, of Washington, Monroe, and Jefferson, whose statements are as clear as the unclouded sun at noonday, and are not collections of double-meaning words under which men can hide and say they mean anything or nothing. Let there be no mistake about what we are doing in this direction. I would not have our action misunderstood there any more than I should wish to see a mistake made if resolutions were adopted in a sense to which I was opposed. There is no lurking place for a league for peace 'supported by the organized major forces of mankind' in the sentences of George Washington and Thomas Jefferson set forth in the preamble to which the resolution of the Senator from Idaho declares our allegiance.

"This war will end; the passions of mankind will die down; individual ambitions will vanish with the evanescent beings who cherish them; but the Republic and the American people will remain. Let us beware how we take any steps which may precipitate this country and the people who are to come after us, and whose inheritance it is, into dangers which no man can foresee. We can not secure our own safety or build up the lasting peace of the world upon peace at any price. The peace of the world, to be enduring, must be based on righteousness at any cost. [Applause in the galleries.]"

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, it is a familiar thing when two little children are quarreling for one of them to call the other a name and then for the other one to say, "You are one, too." It seems from what has just occurred that "grown-ups" are not exempt from this habit of the children.

I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts about one thing: It is of no importance what any man thought or said three years, four years, or six years ago; the question is as to whether he is thinking honestly and thinking sincerely and has intellectual integrity in his thoughts and in his utterances to-day. If he said something four years ago that was not in accord with what he says to-day, he ought to be able to say, "My only explanation is that four years ago I believed what I then said and I now believe what I now say." That is sufficient answer to all that sort of thing.

But, Mr. President, all men, even great sections, are capable of all sorts of inconsistency. You will remember when the North and the South went into the late Civil War, the South went in contending that it had seceded and that therefore it had formed a separate and independent government and was "outside of the Union." The North contended that the South could not get outside of the Union and was "in the Union," no matter what it said about itself. Then, when the war was over they both changed position at once; and the South claimed to be in the Union and claimed all of her "constitutional" rights as States in the Union, while the North claimed that the South was out of the Union and was subject to be treated like conquered territory and would be and could be "readmitted" to the Union only on compliance with certain prescribed "terms of the conqueror." What had occurred? Was there any real inconsistency? In mere words, perhaps there was, but the inconsistency was apparent rather than real.

The Senator from Massachusetts calls attention to what he calls the inconsistencies of the President to-day, but I dare say that there is no inconsistency about any of it. Let us run over it rapidly and see.

The Great War broke out; the world was shocked, amazed, paralyzed, astonished. The President's first position was one of "regret." Then the war went on and became a very serious thing, and the President's next position was one of announced "neutrality." Then the war went on still further, and German barbarities beginning to excite our abhorrence, he begged us to keep out of it, notwithstanding his own and our strong sympathy with the victims, and endure, yet to observe our neutrality. The war continued still further, the German barbarities increased everywhere, involving our citizens, and we got into it, and now the President says, having been in it and through it, to a successful issue, "do not scuttle out of its obligations"; "do not desert your allies and associates"; do not give notice, as somebody in Germany lately said, that you are holding up "the hope of a red dawn" of rehabilitation and final victory for Germany by creating division among the Allies, caused by the delays of the Senate, in America first. I say there is no real inconsistency in any of it. Conditions changed from day to day, and the President with magnificent common sense confronted each condition as it arose. The inconsistency, if any, was in the conditions themselves, in the historical sequence of events. I can follow him back and say with all my heart that I think he was right at each stage, except that I do not think we got into the war quite quickly enough, although many people thought we got in too soon.

Mr. President, I just said that the President's last position is, "having tried to keep out of it, having done all we could, having been injured nationally, having had our ideas of civilization shocked, having seen barbarism threaten civilization with demolition, having seen autocracy threaten democracy with conquest, having in consequence of all of this got into it, whether we wanted to or not"—and none of the American people at the beginning wanted to get into it—"shall we or shall we not evade and shirk our obligations?" Shall we take no part in harvesting the fruits of the struggle after it has been completed; or shall we scuttle out of it all and deny our responsibility for the consequences of the things that we have helped as joint victors to establish?

Upon that question—and that is the main object of my rising—I ask unanimous consent to put into the RECORD an editorial from the New York Journal of Commerce of September 12, entitled "An evasion of national responsibility," in which evasion the Senator from Massachusetts is chief sinner.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, leave to print in the RECORD is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

[From the New York Journal of Commerce of Sept. 12, 1919.]

"AN EVASION OF NATIONAL RESPONSIBILITY.

"The spirit in which Republican leaders in the Senate have dealt with the most momentous issue ever presented to a representative assembly finds expression in the phraseology in which they attempt to dismiss the fear that other nations may not accept the covenant of the league as they have undertaken to amend it: 'That is one thing that certainly will not happen. * * * The other nations will take us on our own terms, for without us their league is a wreck and all their gains from a victorious peace are imperiled.' But why 'their' league? If the league be not vitally and inevitably ours as well as theirs there is an end to all discussion about it. We either admit that we share the common determination of most of the civilized world to prevent the recurrence of a devastating war like that through which we have just passed and are willing to accept our share of the responsibility for making that effective or we elect to assume the risk and cost, not to mention the moral odium of standing alone. No amendment can be written into the treaty of peace in advance of the formation of the council of the league of nations without reopening the discussion of the entire instrument by those who framed it. For the peace conference the treaty is finished business. It is a characteristically cheap gibe to which the majority of the Foreign Relations Committee lend themselves when they say that the conference still sitting in Paris 'might at least be as usefully employed as they now are in dividing and sharing southeastern Europe and Asia Minor,' presumably by taking to pieces the treaty of peace with Germany to satisfy the scruples of certain Republican Party politicians in the Senate of the United States.

"The work now before the conference happens to include the tracing of new boundaries in southeastern Europe and Asia Minor, because these are part of the treaties with Austria, Bulgaria, and Turkey, the first of which has been signed, while the others are still under consideration. Of course, if the United States is to try the experiment of holding itself as a Nation apart in a world otherwise occupied by people seeking a common basis for their security and peace the clownish irrelevance of the majority of the Foreign Relations Committee may pass as merely another illustration, however superfluous, of the contempt for international good manners that distinguishes the United States Senate among all similar assemblies in the world. But surely this is not the spirit in which we entered the war; it is, manifestly, as far as the poles asunder from the scrupulous loyalty to our associate nations with which we discharged the responsibilities that our participation in the struggle involved. The simple formula seems to require repetition; the powers who won the war with our help as we won it with their's propose to maintain the peace with our help and that we shall maintain it with their's. The momentous decision which the Senate is required to make on behalf of the American people is whether all that they gained by going to war shall be imperiled by a refusal to take the part that belongs to them in preserving a dearly bought peace.

"If the senatorial objectors are to have their way, it is to a policy of cowardly evasion that the people of the United States will find themselves committed. The disguises under which it is sought to conceal a plain counsel of scuttle are too transparent to deceive any but blind partisans. There is no need to reserve the right to withdraw from the league on our own volition, none to reserve the right to determine what questions come within our exclusive domestic jurisdiction, and equally none to protect the Monroe doctrine against European interpretation. Explicitly or implicitly, all these are already fully covered by the terms of the covenant. The declination to accept any of the legal or moral obligations of article 10 of the covenant is either absolute or conditional. If the former, it means a refusal to approve the fundamental principle of the agreement, and that is the end of it. If it means merely that action under article 10 can be taken only with the consent of the Congress of the United States, it makes a claim that nobody has ever questioned, or, in the very nature of things, would ever dare to do. The fine display of indignation over the transfer to Japan of German rights in Kiaochow and special privileges in the whole Province of Shantung ignore the fact that it is an injustice which can be easily remedied by the action of the league of nations. The sincerity of the protest would be less open to question had our course in regard to the original wrong been in harmony with it. So also the claim that the United States has never broken an international obligation would command more respect but for the fact that our Chinese exclusion laws were in frank contradiction to the terms of the treaties made with China from 1858 to a comparatively recent date.

"If the country is to find in the majority report of the Senate committee the slogan for the Republican campaign of 1920, then the party is in a very bad way. It was open to the Republicans in the Senate to claim that their initial objections had been instrumental in transforming the league into an effective working instrument. To make an appeal for public confidence on the ground that they had destroyed it would be an act of political suicide. It is simply inconceivable that on such grounds as those outlined in the majority report of the Foreign Relations Committee the hopes and aspirations which the great mass of our people share with their associates in the war should suffer shipwreck. The leaders in this destructive movement are mainly those who are responsible for the loss of popular confidence in their own party. Their success in an enterprise pernicious beyond expression and harmful beyond all precedent would stand for all time as the blackest chapter in our history."

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of legislative business.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, is it not expected to proceed with the reading of the treaty?

Mr. SMOOT. It is 4.30 o'clock in the afternoon now, and we will not get along very far with it. What we would like to do is to take up this afternoon, if we can, the so-called power bill. Perhaps we could read that bill through this afternoon before the time we want to adjourn—5 o'clock. I will say to the Senator that it is only to hasten matters that we take this action.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I want to put this matter before the Senator from Utah in a perfectly candid way.

This is the great emergency business of the Senate. It is the business on which the Senate is engaged above everything else. We have had a regular morning hour on each day of meeting so far, but practically we have not been taking up the treaty until 2 o'clock. We have not read a line of the treaty yet and we have been in session on it now two or three days—not a line. It certainly seems to me that if we delay taking it up every day until the morning business is concluded we ought to spend the rest of the day upon the treaty.

Mr. SMOOT. It was taken up about 12.30 to-day. There is no intention whatever of delaying the consideration of the treaty. There is 30 minutes now before the time when the Senate ought to adjourn; as nobody desires to proceed with any remarks on the treaty at this time, having 30 minutes only, I can not see but that we could hasten action in relation to legislation by doing just what I have asked the Senate to do.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Let me call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the first amendment to be considered is on page 19 of the treaty. Is there any reason why we could not read the treaty up to that point, at least? It certainly is not necessary for the Senate to abdicate and abandon the consideration of the treaty simply because no Senator is ready to speak, as long as the treaty has to be read. There are hours of reading of the treaty.

Mr. SMOOT. If there were an hour at the present time, or more than an hour, it would be used in reading the treaty, unless some Senator wanted to address the Senate; but here is this water-power bill, for the passage of which there is such a demand, and we thought perhaps we could get that read to-day. That is all there is, and we have now spent five minutes of the day in discussing this question. The Senator discussed it yesterday in the same way.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes, Mr. President; and I endeavored to secure from the Senator an avowal that he would in good faith carry out his purpose of keeping the treaty before the Senate to the exclusion of other business.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, my good faith and what I intend to do is my business.

Mr. SMOOT. And I want to say to the Senator, as far as the Members of the Senate are concerned, that I think they feel that the Senator has kept the treaty before the Senate. Far be it from me or any other Republican Senator to delay the consideration of the treaty; but why should we spend 25 minutes here to-day in just beginning the reading of the treaty, when we have other business that we know——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It has to be done at some time. We should not have other business. This is the big business before the country that the whole country is talking about. Of course the Senator has a bill there. Other Senators have other bills. There are great legislative measures waiting, and it is all the more reason why we should crowd this treaty through.

I put it to the Senator from Massachusetts again: Does he or does he not intend to carry out in good faith his declared purpose of keeping the treaty before the Senate until it is finished?

Mr. LODGE. I certainly do; and I propose to do it in my own way, without advice from the Senator from Nebraska. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I presume the Senator will do it in the way that the Senate decides.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Nebraska suspend for a moment? The Chair has tolerated applause in the galleries at the termination of speeches made in behalf of and against the league of nations, but the Chair will not tolerate signs of approval or disapproval with respect to interchanges between Senators upon a motion like this, and if it is repeated the galleries will be cleared.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think at this point I ought to say a word on that subject. It is my opinion——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. May the Chair ask the Senator from Nebraska whether, in his opinion, the motion made by the Senator from Utah is debatable?

Mr. SMOOT. Of course it is not debatable.

Mr. SWANSON. After 2 o'clock it is debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is of the opinion, unless otherwise advised, that the motion made by the Senator from Utah is not a debatable motion.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, it is after 2 o'clock.

Mr. SMOOT. But this is simply a motion to return to legislative session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is a motion to return to legislative session, and the Chair is of the opinion that it is not debatable.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, permit me to say that a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business is not debatable, for obvious reasons; but certainly a motion to proceed to the consideration of anything in legislative session is always debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But this is not a motion to consider any matter pending before the Senate. It is simply a motion to change the character of the session.

Mr. SMOOT. I have no objection to the Senator debating the question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator will permit me, I do not desire to debate that question; but I have in my mind a thing to say that I think ought to be said.

In my opinion, many people who come to these galleries are not aware of the rule against applause; and I think either the Chair or the Committee on Rules ought to cause to be printed cards warning those who enter the galleries that they violate the rule if they applaud. I think if that could be done daily it would soon relieve the Senate of this occasional annoyance. It is done largely through ignorance.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that that has been tried two or three times since I have been in the Senate of the United States. We must remember that the galleries are filled with people from all over the United States. Perhaps half the people in the galleries have never been in the galleries before, and if we undertook to do a thing like that we would have to have a notice in every seat in the galleries, and have it there every day the Senate is in session.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I disagree with the Senator. There is a doorkeeper at every door. He sees every person who enters, and he can hand him a card with that warning. I believe it would relieve the Senate from a great deal of annoyance and the occupants of the galleries from a great many mistakes.

I now ask the Senator to permit the reading of the treaty, at least down to the first amendment, so that we can make some progress.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment? I disagree with both Senators. I do not think the galleries are "half filled" or a third filled "with people who never were in them before." I think substantially the same crowd that has been packing them for some time has them in its possession now. But, having said that much, I want to say this:

I never was to the slightest degree in sympathy with the idea that the occupants of the galleries ought not to be permitted to applaud. It is a rule of the Senate, and as such, of course, it ought to be carried out. It is not a rule of the House of Representatives, and the House of Representatives has always gotten along very well without it. Where spectators are permitted to come to the galleries, any rule prohibiting them from applauding ought to be abolished, and they ought to be allowed to applaud whenever they please. Of course that does not relieve the Chair from his duty of enforcing the rule of the Senate; but I just wanted to say, as far as I am concerned, that it is a rule of which I have never approved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair feels a certain responsibility in the matter; and while he may give latitude in certain instances, the Chair will feel it his duty to prevent recurring applause as repartee takes place between Senators on the floor. The motion is that the Senate return to legislative session. It is not a debatable motion.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LODGE. I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegee	Harrison	McKellar	Smoot
Capper	Hitchcock	McNary	Spencer
Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	New	Sutherland
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Newberry	Swanson
Fall	Kellogg	Norris	Thomas
Fletcher	Kendrick	Nugent	Trammell
France	Kenyon	Page	Wadsworth
Gay	Keyes	Phipps	Walsh, Mass.
Gerry	Kirby	Pittman	Warren
Hale	Knox	Pomerene	Williams
Harding	Lenroot	Reed	Wolcott
Harris	Lodge	Sheppard

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] are detained on official business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-seven Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. MCCUMBER and Mr. SIMMONS answered to their names when called.

Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. BANKHEAD, Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. WATSON, Mr. STERLING, Mr. NELSON, and Mr. PHELAN entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-six Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my motion that the Senate proceed with legislative business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the motion of the Senator from Utah is withdrawn.

Mr. LODGE. I move that when the Senate adjourns it be to meet on Thursday at 1.45 o'clock p. m.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it the Senator's purpose to have the Senate at that time meet to participate in the joint session?

Mr. LODGE. That was my purpose.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is it the purpose to proceed with any other business on that day?

Mr. LODGE. It was not my purpose. I thought that as we would receive Gen. Pershing on that day, it would be a broken day, and the Senate would not proceed with other business.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. That is satisfactory to me.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts that when the Senate adjourns it be to meet on Thursday at 1.45 o'clock in the afternoon.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KIRBY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will proceed to read the treaty of peace with Germany for action on the amendments proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The Secretary read as follows:

"TREATY OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

"THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, THE BRITISH EMPIRE, FRANCE, ITALY and JAPAN.

"These Powers being described in the present Treaty as the Principal Allied and Associated Powers,

"From the coming into force of the present Treaty the state of war will terminate. From that moment and subject to the provisions of this Treaty official relations with Germany, and with any of the German States, will be resumed by the Allied and Associated Powers.

"PART I.

"THE COVENANT OF THE LEAGUE OF NATIONS

"THE HIGH CONTRACTING PARTIES,

"In order to promote international co-operation and to achieve international peace and security

"by the acceptance of obligations not to resort to war,

"by the prescription of open, just and honourable relations between nations,

"by the firm establishment of the understandings of international law as the actual rule of conduct among Governments, and

"by the maintenance of justice and a scrupulous respect for all treaty obligations in the dealings of organised peoples with one another,

"Agree to this Covenant of the League of Nations.

"Article 1.

"The original Members of the League of Nations shall be those of the Signatories which are named in the Annex to this Covenant and also such of those other States named in the Annex as shall accede without reservation to this Covenant. Such accession shall be effected by a Declaration deposited with the Secretariat within two months of the coming into force of the Covenant. Notice thereof shall be sent to all other Members of the League.

"Any fully self-governing State, Dominion or Colony not named in the Annex may become a Member of the League if its admission is agreed to by two-thirds of the Assembly, provided that it shall give effective guarantees of its sincere intention to observe its international obligations, and shall accept such regulations as may be prescribed by the League in regard to its military, naval and air forces and armaments.

"Any Member of the League may, after two years' notice of its intention so to do, withdraw from the League, provided that all its international obligations and all its obligations under this Covenant shall have been fulfilled at the time of its withdrawal.

"Article 2.

"The action of the League under this Covenant shall be effected through the instrumentality of an Assembly and of a Council with a permanent Secretariat.

"Article 3.

"The Assembly shall consist of Representatives of the Members of the League.

"The Assembly shall meet at stated intervals and from time to time as occasion may require at the Seat of the League or at such other place as may be decided upon.

"The Assembly may deal at its meetings with any matter within the sphere of action of the League or affecting the peace of the world.

"At meetings of the Assembly each Member of the League shall have one vote, and may have not more than three Representatives."

The first amendment of the Committee on Foreign Relations was, on page 19, to insert the following proviso at the end of article 3:

(1): Provided, That when any member of the league has or possesses self-governing dominions or colonies or parts of empire, which are also members of the league, the United States shall have votes in the assembly or council of the league numerically equal to the aggregate vote of such member of the league and its self-governing dominions and colonies and parts of empire in the council or assembly of the league.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the amendment be passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator explain his understanding of what the status of the amendment will be? When will it then be the subject of consideration in case unanimous consent is given?

Mr. LODGE. The usual practice in connection with all bills is that when an amendment is passed over it may be called up at any time.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It may be called up by whom at any time?

Mr. LODGE. By the Senator in charge of the bill. That is the practice.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Can an understanding be had that it will be called up within any definite time?

Mr. LODGE. No; I shall make no understanding about when I shall call it up. There are Senators away who desire to be heard on the amendment and who have asked to be heard on it. I assured them that it would be passed over, and it can be passed over.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator give any assurance that it will be subject to consideration some time next week?

Mr. LODGE. I suppose it will be, but I can not give any assurances or promises of any kind.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I notice that the Senator is very reticent on that point.

Mr. LODGE. No; I shall make no assurances or promises of any kind, and there is no use in the Senator trying to cross-question or to draw me into anything of that sort.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Is the Senator ready to vote on this amendment?

Mr. LODGE. Now?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. I am not; the Senate is not.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Of course, Mr. President, I have no objection to any reasonable delay, but it seems to me that in fairness the Senator ought to be able to give the Senate some assurance as to when, if the amendment is passed over by unanimous consent at the present time, he would be disposed to call it up for consideration. I am not asking for a definite day.

Mr. LODGE. I have not the slightest idea of interposing any artificial delay of any kind to the consideration of this treaty. I am as much against such a course as the Senator from Nebraska. But let me assure the Senator that he will not advance the treaty by undertaking to harry me all the time about it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I have no disposition to harry the Senator, but he is asking for unanimou consent at the present time, and I am seeking some assurance——

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator is going to resist unanimous consent he will force me into measures to prevent the consideration of the amendment at this time. He will not advance the treaty. A request to pass over an amendment is never refused; it never has been refused in my experience in the Senate.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator will realize that I am making a very reasonable suggestion.

Mr. LODGE. I know exactly what the Senator is doing.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. If the Senator can give some assurance that within the next week he will call up this amendment——

Mr. LODGE. I can give no assurances of any kind.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is not a binding matter.

Mr. LODGE. I am going to do all I can to promote the consideration of the treaty. I am as much against any artificial delay of any sort as the Senator can possibly be, but I am going to have due consideration by Senators who wish to debate the treaty. I have been asked to-day by two Senators on the Senator's own side of the Chamber if I could give them assurance that there would be no vote before Monday, as they wished to go away, one on account of a friend who is ill and the other because it was necessary for him to return to his own State. There is another Senator away on account of the illness of his wife. I told them I did not think a vote would be reached this week, and I do not think a vote will be reached.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator from Nebraska believe that this amendment ought to be voted upon at once and before any other amendment is voted on?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It is an amendment which was considered and digested very carefully by the committee, and I presume the only reasonable occasion for delay is the absence of the author of it.

Mr. SMOOT. Does not the Senator from Nebraska really believe that time would be saved if we went on and read the treaty, and let amendments be passed over when desired, and then return to the first amendment, and take it up and dispose of it, and then take up and discuss the next amendment passed over?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am not disposed to object to the request. I am merely inquiring of the Senator from Massachusetts whether we can reasonably expect consideration within the next week. If he does not know——

Mr. LODGE. As to this particular amendment I can not tell. There are a great many Senators who wish to speak upon it, and there will be considerable debate on the amendment.

Mr. SWANSON. I understand the interpretation put upon the action of the Senate in granting unanimous consent now would be that the only way it could be disposed of in the future would be by the action of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, who has charge of the treaty, or until we have concluded the reading of the entire treaty and come back to consider the amendments passed over.

Mr. LODGE. Both those courses are pursued ordinarily with bills.

Mr. SWANSON. This is the only amendment that is offered to the covenant of the league of nations.

Mr. LODGE. No; there is another one.

Mr. SWANSON. I was going to suggest that we temporarily pass over this and the other amendment so that the Senate may take them up later when they see fit.

Mr. LODGE. The request is always to pass over an amendment temporarily.

Mr. SWANSON. The Senator is asking unanimous consent to do that?

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the amendment be passed over until I call it up. It may not be called up until we get to the end of the reading of the treaty.

Mr. SWANSON. I should like to have it left to the decision of somebody else besides the Senator. Others might want to call it up before we finish the reading of the entire treaty.

Mr. LODGE. If a majority of the Senate wish to take it up, of course it is in their power to do it.

Mr. SWANSON. A majority of the Senate could do it?

Mr. LODGE. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. I understood the Senator to say it could only be done on his request.

Mr. LODGE. I was speaking merely of the unbroken practice here. I have never known a request refused when made by the chairman of a committee in charge of a bill to pass over an amendment. That gives the Senator in charge a chance to call it up when he thinks it is best for the bill to do it. I have seen it done in connection with great bills like the revenue bill. The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] constantly had to do it. If Senators want to undertake to force the amendment up at any time they can try it on.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator will realize that this treaty is very different in one respect from an ordinary bill. As a general proposition, when a Senator, the chairman of a committee, is in charge of a bill, he is in favor of the bill; he is not seeking to alter it or destroy it. It seems to me to be rather unfair for the Senator, as chairman of the committee, to assume that if we give unanimous consent to pass it over he alone can control the time to bring it up.

Mr. LODGE. I never suggested that for a moment. I have been long enough in the Senate to learn that the majority of the Senate control. I was speaking merely of the unbroken custom. But if the Senator thinks it is wise to throw aside all the customs of the Senate and fight it in this way, the delay will rest on him, not on me.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Massachusetts then states that if this amendment be temporarily passed over at the present time it will be subject at any time to be called up upon the motion of any Senator?

Mr. LODGE. There is no doubt of that whatever. It is the rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Massachusetts that the amendment proposed by the committee at this point be passed over?

Mr. LODGE. Temporarily passed over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In order that the Chair may be advised, what does the Senator from Massachusetts mean by "temporarily passed over"?

Mr. LODGE. I am only putting it in the usual form of such a request. It is the usual request, that it shall be temporarily passed over, or, I might put it, that it be passed over for the present. I suppose such words are put in to show that it is intended to return to the amendment and deal with it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the amendment now reached be temporarily passed over. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and the amendment is passed over temporarily. The Secretary will continue the reading:

The Secretary read as follows:

"Article 4.

"The council shall consist of representatives of the principal allied and associated powers, together with representatives of four other members of the league. These four members of the league shall be selected by the assembly from time to time in its discretion. Until the appointment of the representatives of the four members of the league first selected by the assembly, representatives of Belgium, Brazil, Spain, and Greece shall be members of the council.

"With the approval of the majority of the assembly, the council may name additional members of the league whose representatives shall always be members of the council; the council with like approval may increase the number of members of the league to be selected by the assembly for representation on the council."

ADJOURNMENT TO THURSDAY.

Mr. LODGE. As in legislative session, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned, the adjournment under the previous order being until Thursday, September 18, 1919, at 1.45 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, September 16, 1919.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. and was called to order by the Clerk (William Tyler Page), who read the following communication:

SEPTEMBER 16, 1919.

To the CLERK OF THE HOUSE:

I designate Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas to preside in the House to-day.

F. H. GILLETT.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas took the chair as Speaker pro tempore amid general applause.

Rev. William Couden, late chaplain of the Second Division, American forces in Germany, offered the following prayer:

O Thou who art the author of every perfect gift, we are surrounded on every hand with the evidences of Thy love and providence. We hunger, and there is food; we thirst, and there is drink. Against cold and storm Thou hast given us shelter. And that we may use the riches of the earth, Thou hast endowed us with intelligence and skill in the appropriation of all the materials and forces of nature. Verily Thou dost prepare a table before us in the presence of our every enemy.

But, Lord, around us shines Thy truth, and we will not see; embracing us Thy love and we do not respond; before us stands Christ and we do not accept. O forgive our folly, remove our transgressions far from us, and help Thou our unbelief. Change within us our wrong into rectitude, our error into truth, our hate and selfishness into love and helpfulness. Thus may we live in the world but not of the world, and enjoy even in this temporal sphere a life hidden with Christ in Thee. Amen.

THE JOURNAL.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman withhold that just a moment?

Mr. DYER. I withhold it.

Mr. WINGO. As I understood the reading of the Journal by the Clerk, Mr. THOMPSON of Arkansas made the point of no quorum. I would like to have the Clerk refer to that part of the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the Journal shows that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. THOMPSON] made the point of order.

The Journal was approved.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. DYER. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. MONDELL. I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The doors will be closed, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this roll call 232 Members, a quorum, have answered to their names. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

Mr. MONDELL. I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. NEWTON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on House bill 9203.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. HUDSPETH, is in Texas on account of illness in his family. I am not sure that he has been excused, and I ask unanimous consent that he be excused indefinitely, on account of illness in his family.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that his colleague, Mr. HUDSPETH, be given indefinite leave of absence on account of illness in his family. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

By unanimous consent leave of absence was granted—

To Mr. DRANE, for to-day and to-morrow, on account of illness.

To Mr. WHITE of Maine (at the request of Mr. HERSEY), on account of illness.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 95) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the city of Atlanta, Ga., tents, cots, horses, and saddle equipments for the use of United Confederate Veterans in their convention from October 7 to 10, 1919, which was to amend the title to read as follows: "Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the city of Atlanta, Ga., tents, cots, blankets, and other camp equipment for the use of United Confederate Veterans in their convention from October 7 to 10, 1919."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 2972) to extend the cancellation stamp privilege to the Roosevelt Memorial Association, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 2972. An act to extend the cancellation stamp privilege to the Roosevelt Memorial Association; to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

LAFAYETTE DAY.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes on the subject of Lafayette Day in the city of New York.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I will not object to three minutes, but the deficiency bill is ready and I hope with the full attendance that we have on both sides of the House we shall proceed to its consideration as quickly as possible.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Speaker, on September 6 Lafayette Day was generally observed throughout the United States. It was the anniversary not only of the birth of Lafayette but also of the first battle of the Marne. The governors of several of our States issued special proclamations asking for suitable observance. The same action was taken by the mayors of a number of our cities. The principal exercises were held in the City Hall of the city of New York, at which Supreme Court Justice Victor J. Dowling presided. On that occasion some notable addresses were made and messages read. Ambassador Jusserand made a notable address, and there were messages from President Poincaré, Premier Clemenceau, and André Tardieu, of France; from the Prince of Wales, Field Marshal Haig, and Admiral Beatty, of Great Britain; and also from the Secretary of State and Gen. Pershing.

The occasion was so important and the addresses and messages were of such a character that I think they should be made a public record, and I therefore, Mr. Speaker, ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks by having printed in the RECORD the address of Ambassador Jusserand and the messages from the distinguished citizens of France, Great Britain, and the United States which were read upon the occasion of these exercises in the City Hall of the city of New York. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The address and messages follow:

AMBASSADOR JUSSERAND'S SPEECH.

Ambassador Jusserand said:

"When we met last year on the same anniversary of the birth of Gen. Lafayette, the defender of liberty in the two worlds, the third battle begun at the Marne was still going on, the first having been fought in A. D. 451 against the Huns (the original Huns), the second by Joffre in 1914, and the third about to be won by Foch and his peers, Haig and Pershing. It was still the time of the communiques—how delightfully far off this now seems—and the day's communique had informed us that the Germans were in retreat on a front of 40 kilometers between Peronne and Chauny.

"A more memorable statement was due to the chairman of our meeting then and of our meeting to-day:

"'I trust,' he said, 'it may be the privilege of the chairman of next year's gathering to tell you of a complete victory for the allied cause.' We knew Justice Dowling was a man of manifold qualities; let us honor him for one more, and a rare one, that of being a prophet—a good prophet.

"We are delighted to have the same chairman. No 'I told you so' was ever more welcome than his to-day, and we are pleased to form with him, as last year, on this Lafayette Day a group in which several of those nations without whom the war would have been lost are represented by men who love and admire each other's countries.

ROOSEVELT'S VOICE IS MISSED.

"But we mourn the absence of one man, and hearing no more a voice which on momentous occasions reached from one end of the world to the other, teaching men how to attain better days through courage, sense of duty, good citizenship, a voice now hushed forever—the voice of Theodore Roosevelt.

"The solemn occasion of last year will ever remain for me the more solemn because it so happened that I then saw and heard for the last time that big-hearted friend of many years and pressed his hand, now still.

"The war has now ended the way it should; peace has been signed, the peace that was to be, not a peace of vengeance but a peace of reparation and safety—the strictly necessary amount of reparation and safety; nothing more, rather something less.

"'This reparation,' Mr. Roosevelt had said in his speech before you last year, 'must take the form of action that will render it impossible for Germany to repeat her colossal wrongdoing.' President Wilson had spoken and has acted to the same effect.

"If any who have not seen what we have seen and suffered what we have suffered, the willful devastations, the shooting or carrying away of civilians, the ruining of mines and machinery, the methodical blowing up of a city like Chauny, house by house, if any such may be tempted to consider this a harsh and cruel peace, and that it would be in our interest to become the friend of our enemy and to say to the blood-stained German let bygones be bygones, we would simply reply to them, 'Remember.'

WEAK PEACE WOULD CAUSE SCORN.

"A weak peace and weak resolves would only cause scorn and tempt to new aggressions; which is not a way of speaking, but the stating of actual incontrovertible facts—just remember.

"Was the peace of 1871 a harsh and cruel peace for the Germans? It was written at their own dictation; they took our billions and Provinces. Yet they never for one moment ceased to be on the lookout for an occasion to begin again and achieve the destruction of France. They very nearly started a new war in 1875 and desisted, not out of a sense of justice but out of fear—the fear of the British and the Russians. France herself was, in the meantime, so bent on peace that she yielded and yielded, going even so far as to present to Germany part of a colony—the French Congo—which we had settled and civilized without, by the way, any bloodshed. But peace could not be had, could not be bought, and as sure as fate the day was to come when Herr von Schoen would notify us that we had bombarded Nuremberg, which was news to us and to the inhabitants of Nuremberg, too, and that therefore German Schrecklichkeit was ready for us, as indeed it was.

Has the German understood, has he changed? Only yesterday, as reported, the man whom they worship, both in the flesh and as a wooden idol, Hindenburg, was saying that all of us, the defenders of right, who had been so bold as to dare fight for our hearths and our ideals, we, whose women have been carried into captivity, whose villagers have been shot, are what? We are, in his words, 'Helots and Pariahs.' Since we are not Germans, we are Pariahs. Do you believe that men who think thus would hesitate to try again the destruction of Helots and Pariahs if they could? They must be prevented, that is all.

REVELRY OF DESTRUCTION.

"There was such a revelry of destruction and crimes wherever Germans set foot during the war that with all those supposedly harsh conditions, even fulfilled to the letter, the fate of the vanquished aggressor, in his comfortable, well-closed homes, with heat and electricity, everything in order, the streets and monuments, the factories, schools, and churches intact, will be a most enviable one as compared with that, next winter, of millions of victors, living in their dreary hovels, burrowing under the wreckage, in the cold and the mud. For whom will the harshness be? One must have seen those places, and I saw them.

"During my recent stay in France I made the most memorable journey of my life, visiting first those parts of my country which are French again owing to American valor. Chateau-Thierry, St. Mihiel, and some reconquered by our British friends, like Lens and Vimy Ridge, then Verdun, where the Germans did not pass; the Metz, the Strassburg, then the valley of the Rhine, to Mainz with the French, Coblenz with the Americans, Cologne with the British, the three Yorktown nations, now friends forever; mangled France, victorious France, vanquished Germany.

"The situation of the winners seemed to us in a number of places harsh indeed and cruel, and that of the vanquished prosperous and enviable. One French village we crossed had been deliberately burned down by the Germans in the earliest days of the war, when they thought they could not give us early enough a taste of their kultur, of their 'Schrecklichkeit.' Some 50 civilians had been shot, not one house remained, the assistant mayor was busy trying to recover among the ruins the body of his mother, a woman of 80, shot by the Germans in cold blood in August, 1914; he wanted to give her a decent burial. Some inhabitants had returned; they lived in dugouts, and had to walk 15 kilometers twice a week to get salt meat from the Government; four children had returned; no milk for them. Whatever the case may be as regards the peace terms, their fate certainly seemed to us harsh and cruel.

"Then it was Metz, then Strassburg, with the tricolor flying at the top of the steeple; Metz, where our thoughts wandered to those far-off days when, in the first part of the sixteenth century, the earliest plebiscite on record was held, and by self-determination the city declared she wanted to be French, to the time of the early siege which Francois de Guise compelled the Germans to raise in 1552, and a medal was struck with an appropriate admonition to Emperor Charles the Fifth, and a pun on the name of the city, 'Haec sibi meta,' a word for word equivalent of our 'Thou shalt not pass.' And we thought, too, of that dinner, in more recent times, given by Count de Broglie, the governor of the place, in 1776, where a tall, keen-eyed, but silent young officer, aged 19, was present, heard for the first time of American independence, and there and then, in the capital of Lorraine, the Province of Joan of Arc, 'his heart,' as he wrote later, 'enlisted.' At Metz, indeed, began the wonderful career of the man whom we honor to-day, Marquis de Lafayette.

TRUE-BORN SON OF METZ.

"The present was even more moving for us than the past, with a visit to Fert Kaizerin, now Fort Jeanne d'Arc, with a distant survey of the battle fields of 1870, while listening to the experiences of that true-born son of Metz, Gen. de Maud'huy, now in command of the selfsame place. He told us, and this may show you what were the feelings of Lorrainers, that it had occurred to him in 1894 it was a shame for a son of Metz, the prisoner city, to take any amusement, and he vowed to himself that he would never go to a play until he could enter the theater of Metz preceded by his buglers. He had kept his word, abstaining from going to plays for 25 years; and a short while before, his vow being accomplished, he had entered the theater of his native city, in his uniform and decorations, preceded by 20 buglers sounding, all the audience rising, wild with enthusiasm. 'And here is now my response,' he added. 'I can go to the play any night; anything they perform is new to me.'

"At Strassburg, one thing we heard deeply touching. When in the midst of cheers and applause our troops entered a city where they had not been seen for 47 years, the inhabitants exhibited at their windows the portraits of their dead parents, so that they, too, should know and see.

FUTURE FRANCE BEING BUILT.

"And now that war is finished and peace is signed, what is going on in France? Much that is neither perceived nor heard. We hear of the difficulties of the task, of red tape, of wheels within wheels, and the rest. But in the meantime, in spite of mistakes and imperfections, future France is being built. Do not think that those sturdy men whom, in company with you, stopped the onrush of the Germans, now stand aghast and disheartened at the sight of their ruins and undeserved hardships in store for them, peace or no peace. They are busy clearing the wreckage, filling the shell holes and the trenches, removing the barbed wire, and the unexploded shells (several million at Lens alone) preparing future crops.

"The little village I alluded to, a mere mass of ruins, had recovered 25 inhabitants when we saw it at Easter; when we left France to return here it had 100. Of the 107,000 inhabitants evacuated from the Department of Oise in 1914, over 61,000 had returned by the beginning of June last.

"A cheering thing it is to see the pride and joy of the inhabitants scattered in the ruins of their city when for the first time smoke is discovered rising from the chimney of one of their wrecked factories. This has been seen at Rheims, at La Cateau, and elsewhere. The desire to usefully live again is intense. I saw at Arras, in a hole under ground, a workman busy with some plumbing work; he was cheerily working away.

"'I am a lucky man,' he told me. 'I had buried in this cellar what I had most valuable, and the Germans did not find it.'

"'And what was that?'

"'My tools, and so I can begin life again.'

1,300 BRIDGES DESTROYED.

"There were about 1,300 destroyed railway bridges; from the state of advancement of the work when I left France they must all be rebuilt by this time, some only provisionally, but most of them permanently. For the most important ones, as at Courcelettes connecting Lille and Paris, the work was continued day and night.

"The St. Quentin Canal, of the utmost importance, as connecting Paris with the Belgian coast regions, had been destroyed with the thoroughness for which German kultur is famous; the supermen had been there at their best; the two tunnels, especially, under which the canal passes were considered masterpieces of destruction. But our mere men have already undone the mischief and from what I hear the canal must now be in use.

"The inhabitants of the devastated regions have a newspaper of their own to state their wants, give warnings, report progress. Quite characteristically in one of their recent numbers they complained of complainers, often mere slackers. 'To all those who go on repeating, "There is no progress, nothing is being done," let us give a spade, a pickax, a wheelbarrow. Things will perhaps progress better.'

"They are, indeed, progressing, and the modern Cincinnati, returned from the camp to the native fields, are not idle.

"When Lafayette heard of American independence his heart enlisted. When you heard of the danger of France your hearts enlisted; the severest claims on you, the widening of the limits of military age for your population, the increase of war taxes were passed by a unanimous vote in the two Houses, and your descendants to the end of time will be proud of those ancestors of theirs who acted thus and fought so well in the great crisis.

VENERABLE MONUMENTS WRECKED.

"There is at Verdun a famous old cathedral which the Germans wanted very much to destroy; this was during the war a particular longing with them, as though one of the tenets of their kultur. I have seen a number of those venerable monuments all wrecked. The one at Arras will never be rebuilt; there are bushes, almost trees, growing now in the upper cornices. They could not see the one at Verdun owing to the hills, but they shelled it by the map, wrecking the nave, which is the oldest part, and missing the towers, which are more recent. On the day of the armistice last year, the general in command told us some 400 Americans—soldiers, ambulance men, Red Cross men, and others—asked admittance. The one at their head explained that he was a Catholic priest, that others in the group were Catholics, Protestants, and Jews, and that all were united in the same desire, to be allowed to come into that church, kneel before the altar, and offer a hymn of gratitude for the glorious termination of the war.

"They were, of course, allowed, and, kneeling among the wreckage, sang their hymn, and then under the gaping vaults through which the blue sky could be seen they sang the 'Marseillaise' and the 'Star-Spangled Banner.'

"It occurred to the general that, since the towers remained, the bells must be safe, and by his order the 16 bells rang out in chimes, the first time they had been heard since they had sounded the tocsin for the general mobilization four years and a half before.

"He thereupon ordered, as a symbol of perennial union between our countries, the two flags to be raised on the two towers, the flag of France and that of America, the two flags of Lafayette, the Star-Spangled Banner under which he had fought with Washington and the flag which, in the early days of our revolution, he had devised for us, the tricolor of France."

DOWLING EULOGIZES ROOSEVELT.

In his address of welcome, Justice Dowling paid tribute to Col. Theodore Roosevelt, who spoke at the Lafayette Day exercises last year, and to the late French high commissioner to the United States, Edouard de Billy.

"While many of our friends are here," said Justice Dowling, "we mourn one who last year gave us an address so timely and encouraging that the echo is still ringing in our ears. The loss which this country felt is doubly felt by this committee, and we have reason to thank God that He had given to this country in time of its emergency such a man as Col. Roosevelt. The place of Theodore Roosevelt in this country is safe for all time in the hearts of his countrymen."

Justice Dowling assured those who attended the exercises that the best assurance of peace was the fact that the great nations of the world allied in a common bond were still allies, now that the fighting had ceased.

These messages from distinguished men who had played big parts in the World War were read:

"In the hours of trial and of the needed common efforts the American people and the French people united their thoughts in order to commemorate at once the birth of Lafayette and the Battle of the Marne," said President Poincaré. "How could our two nations not seize, in this year of internal peace, the occasion to celebrate together the same anniversaries?

"The brotherhood of America and France was born in the War of Independence. It has never been obscured since. It has found its final consecration in the great fight we have just fought shoulder to shoulder for the liberty of the world. It will keep all its strength in the future and contribute to consolidate, in the interest of humanity, the peace which has been established, at the cost of so many sacrifices, by the defenders of right.

"To the people of the United States I send the greetings of the French Republic, to the American soldiers the cordial remembrance of their brothers in arms, to the American mothers who have lost their sons on the battle field of Europe the homage of my profound sympathy."

André Tardieu said:

"Two years ago on the same date in the city hall of New York I affirmed our common faith in the victory of right. Right has triumphed. To-day great duties await us which we shall fulfill only by maintaining in peace the closest solidarity of war.

"Americans, you understood that it was your liberty that you came to defend with ours. Understand to-day that the future of our democracies is indissolubly bound and that the aiding of each other yesterday should be the law of to-morrow."

CLEMENCEAU'S GREETING.

Premier Clemenceau cabled:

"The French nation takes profound joy in the thought that the American people associates this day in the same celebration, the birthday of Lafayette and the anniversary day of the Battle of the Marne, the remembrance of the hero who immortalized himself in the struggle for American independence and the glorification of the victory which has assured the independence of France and of the world. You have proved to us how the noble example of Lafayette was always alive in the hearts of your sons. As he brought you the succor of his sword at the hour when you fought to become free, so, at the critical moment of our formidable struggle to escape barbarism, you came to give us the aid which assured victory. A witness of the valor of its soldiers, I send to the American people my warm and cordial greeting on this day, which commemorates two great anniversaries equally dear to the cause of liberty and of right."

The telegram from the Prince of Wales said:

"I am proud to be asked to associate myself with your celebration. The British Empire can never forget its debt to France for the immortal victory of the Marne, the first great action of the war in which the French and British Armies side by side imposed their will upon the enemy."

HAIG'S CONGRATULATIONS.

Marshal Haig wired:

"It is a happy coincidence that on the anniversary of Lafayette's birthday America can celebrate also the first great victory won by the French and British Armies for those principles of national liberty with which the name of Lafayette is closely identified. With traditions of a free people to guide her, it was, I think, inevitable that America should join the contest into which France and Britain had already been compelled to enter. It is a matter for congratulation on both sides of the Atlantic that she should have done so and to such purpose, and that henceforth the two great English-speaking peoples look back on sacrifices shared and victories won in common."

Admiral Beatty's message reads:

"On the anniversary birthday of M. le Marquis de Lafayette and of the Battle of the Marne, the first since the termination of the greatest world struggle of all time, it is good to reflect on the following facts: That this distinguished Frenchman was one of the greatest upholders of freedom and opponents of tyranny; that the Battle of the Marne was the first great victory achieved in defense of a free world against tyrannical militarism that ruthless enemies attempted to force on it; that the teachings and example of this distinguished patriot and the valuable achievements on the Marne on this historic day in the cause of freedom go hand in hand, a sign that right and justice must triumph."

PERSHING SENDS REGRETS.

This is what Gen. Pershing sent:

"I sincerely regret that I shall not be present in New York for the exercises in the City Hall celebrating the Lafayette-Marne anniversary. The first celebration of this joint anniversary since the signing of peace should be fraught with new significance to all Americans. Lafayette's services directly influenced our course of action in the war. The first battle of the Marne saved the world from an overwhelming disaster. The memory of Lafayette and of the Marne must be kept fresh in the minds of every generation of our people."

Secretary Lansing wrote:

"I deeply regret that my engagements prevent my presence at the celebration of two anniversaries which are so worthy of commemoration as those of Lafayette and the first battle of the Marne. Both stir our minds with the thought of the struggle and triumph of liberty, of sacrifice and glorious achievement. High among the heroes of America's war for independence is inscribed the name of Lafayette, and no name will find a higher place in the annals of the great war for democracy than that of Joffre, the victor of the Marne. Both fought that men might be free from autocracy. Both saw the cause of humanity triumphant. To these two great sons of France the New World and the Old World owe a debt of gratitude which can never be forgotten while patriotism burns in the hearts of men."

THANKS OF THE PEOPLE AND CONGRESS TO GEN. JOHN J. PERSHING.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer House joint resolution 211 and shall ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration. I first ask that it be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California sends to the Clerk's desk the resolution of which he asks the present consideration.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution 211, tendering the thanks of the American people and the Congress of the United States to Gen. John J. Pershing and to the officers and men of the American Expeditionary Forces.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of the American people and the Congress of the United States are due, and are hereby tendered, to Gen. John J. Pershing for his highly distinguished services as commander in chief of the American Expeditionary Forces in Europe and to the officers and men under his command for their unwavering devotion and heroic valor throughout the war.

[Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the adoption of the joint resolution.

Mr. RUCKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a standing vote on the adoption of the resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks for a division.

The question was taken, and there were 227 ayes and 1 no. [Applause.]

On motion of Mr. KAHN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the joint resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Military Affairs or any subcommittee thereof may sit during the sessions of the House for the rest of this session of Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Military Affairs or any subcommittee thereof may sit during the sessions of the House for the remainder of the session. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR—EMPLOYMENT SERVICE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the special order some days ago the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if the extension is to consist of the remarks of the gentleman himself, I have no objection, but concerning any matter anonymously signed or otherwise, I object. I have no objection to the gentleman extending his own remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. BLANTON. Unless it is limited to the gentleman's own remarks, I do object.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I shall object unless he indicates what he wants to put in.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas makes a conditional objection to the request of the gentleman from California.

Mr. BLANTON. With the limitations stated I have no objection.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I shall not transgress the rules of the House nearly as much as the gentleman did upon several occasions. Communications that I have received and that I have verified, of which I have found out the author, I desire at least in one instance to put into the RECORD.

Mr. BLANTON. To such instruments as were sent to the press gallery by the gentleman's office, I object.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas objects. The gentleman from California is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, in asking permission to take up the time of this House for 40 minutes, I have done so rather reluctantly. I do not desire to engage in controversies any more than anyone else. I do not shirk them when they come. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] on one occasion, in an extension of remarks covering approximately 23 pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, saw fit to attack the Joint Committee on Labor of the House and Senate, and also the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACCRATE] and myself, by inserting in the RECORD certain statements regarding happenings before that joint committee, to which I shall later refer. The other day the gentleman from Texas, in addressing the House, referred to a certain document which he claimed was libelous, and which he said slandered him, which he stated I had sought to circulate or give to the press. In that connection I will state that I have had pretty stormy times during my career, but I have never fought a man in any manner except according to the rules of the game, and when I find a man surreptitiously attacking me in the RECORD I have not much regard for the proprieties in the way in which I handle that individual.

On the morning of the day that the Secretary of Labor returned his answer in response to House resolution 225 I was aware of the fact that that document was coming down here, because I inquired at the department the day before and was informed that it would be laid before the House the following morning. I went to the Speaker's clerk, Mr. Cannon, before the House convened on that day and asked him if that report of the Secretary of Labor would be laid formally before the House, so that I might have an opportunity to ask that this letter that I am going to refer to might be read from the Clerk's desk. He told me that the RECORD would show the following day that this communication had been received, but that it would be referred to the Committee on Labor.

I insert at this point the letter of the Secretary of Labor in reply to House resolution 225:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, August 28, 1919.

The SPEAKER,
The House of Representatives.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of attested copy of House resolution 225, dated August 14, 1919, directing the Secretary of Labor to report forthwith to the House of Representatives of the United States of America the following facts:

"(1) Copies of all such instructions mentioned by John B. Densmore as having been received by him during the months of May, June, July, August, September, and October, 1918, he having said:

"SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., November 1, 1918.

"Hon. W. B. WILSON,
"Secretary of Labor, Washington, D. C.

"SIR: Pursuant to instructions received from time to time during the past six months, I have the honor to report that I have conducted a secret and altogether informal inquiry into the Mooney case, and beg leave to submit herewith the results of my investigations."

The only instructions issued to John B. Densmore in connection with the Mooney case were oral instructions that he [Mr. Densmore] should get any additional information that might be of value in securing a full understanding of the case for submission to the President and if necessary to the governor, and to utilize the services of the immigration inspectors assigned to him for the investigation of frauds in immigration cases for that purpose.

"(2) The names of all persons who, under the direction of any branch of the Department of Labor, had anything to do with the investigation of Thomas J. Mooney, charged with and convicted for heinous crime in California, stating in detail their respective activities, the amount of compensation paid them, respectively, and the expenses of such investigation itemized in detail during the six months between May 1 and November 1, 1918."

The representatives of the Department of Labor who investigated the Mooney case were at the same time cooperating with the Department of Justice in securing evidence in other criminal cases. It is not deemed compatible with the public interest to make public the names of these persons or to itemize their expenses. The total salaries of the inspectors referred to during the period of investigation amounted to $6,101.68. The total of all other expenses incurred by or for them was $1,043.02.

"(3) What connection in behalf of the Department of Labor, if any, since the punishment of said Thomas J. Mooney was commuted to life imprisonment, and since November 1, 1918, has any employee of the Department of Labor had with said case of Thomas J. Mooney, stating such activities in detail, the expense of same itemized in detail, and upon what authority of law, attaching copies of all reports made thereunder to the Department of Labor."

The Department of Labor, through its Immigration Bureau, is directed to deport alien anarchists. Its investigations in these cases have developed clues that lead to the Mooney case. It is continuing these investigations, and it is not deemed compatible with the public interest to disclose at this time its activities in detail, to itemize its expenses in detail, or to attach copies of reports thereunder to the Department of Labor. The authority of law is found in the act of February 5, 1917, and the act of October 16, 1918.

"(4) What activities, if any, are now being conducted in behalf of Thomas J. Mooney?"

It is not deemed compatible with the public interest to make public the present activities of the department that affect the case of Thomas J. Mooney.

"(5) Attach copies of vouchers of McPherson, Kelly, and Kilmer for July, 1918, covering their trip from San Francisco to Los Angeles, the purpose of such trip, and expense of same itemized."

There are no vouchers of McPherson, Kelly, and Kilmer for July, 1918, covering any trip from San Francisco to Los Angeles. No such trip has been authorized by the Department of Labor, nor has any expense been incurred in connection with any such trip. There is not now and there has not been any McPherson or Kilmer on the rolls of the Department of Labor. There is a John A. Kelly and there was a T. R. Kelly in the Employment Service of the department at San Francisco, a Henry Kelly in the Immigration Service at Tucson, Ariz., and a William P. Kelly in the Immigration Service at Boston, Mass., none of whom has ever made any trip from San Francisco to Los Angeles at the expense of the Department of Labor.

"(6) Attach copy of letter of instructions sent by John B. Densmore to H. L. Cobb after Cobb was sent to Texas on propaganda trip for Employment Bureau, and expense of trip itemized in detail."

H. L. Cobb was not sent to Texas on a propaganda trip. He was sent on official business of the Employment Service. No instructions were sent by John B. Densmore to H. L. Cobb after Cobb was sent to Texas. The itemized expense account of Mr. Cobb is herewith attached.

"(7) Attach all reports of Gallagher and Martin for their six weeks spent in Philadelphia, spring of 1919, investigating F. R. Welsh, with statement of expenses fully itemized in detail."

There have been no "reports of Gallagher and Martin for their six weeks spent in Philadelphia, spring of 1919, investigating F. R. Welsh," received by this department or any of its bureaus or services. There is no person by the name of Gallagher employed by the department. There is an Albert S. Martin in the Immigration Service at El Paso, Tex.; an Alice M. Martin in the Immigration Service at Ellis Island, N. Y.; an Isaac Martin in the Immigration Service at Charlotte, N. Y.; and an Arthur S. Martin, clerk, in the department at Washington, D. C., none of whom has ever made any investigation of F. R. Welsh. The department has never made any investigation of F. R. Welsh, and consequently there has been no expense incurred for that purpose.

"(8) Attach report of John B. Densmore on Immigration Service investigation at San Francisco, with full statement of expense thereof itemized in detail."

The report of John D. Densmore on Immigration Service investigation at San Francisco is herewith attached. As this investigation was made in cooperation with the Department of Justice, it is not deemed compatible with the public interest to state the expenses thereof itemized in detail.

Respectfully submitted.

W. B. WILSON,
Secretary of Labor.

NOTE.—All the car fare, telephone calls, checking baggage, porter fees, and the one taxi were on account of Government business.

That afternoon shortly after the House convened I told the Speaker of this House—and he will verify my statement—that I had intended, if he had laid that reply of the Secretary of Labor before the House, to ask unanimous consent to have read from the Clerk's desk a document that would throw light on House resolution 225, and especially upon the report of the Secretary of Labor, which was a very dignified report. Inasmuch as I am deprived of the opportunity of extending my remarks in the RECORD—I intended to refer to only part of it—I am going to take the time to read the letter that I received, and before I read it I am going to tell you exactly what happened.

I received this communication somewhere about August 22. It was sent to the Speaker, to the members of the Committee on Labor, to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. UPSHAW], to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE], to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HARDY], to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON], to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], to the former Speaker of the House, the distinguished gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], to the present Speaker pro tempore of the House, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL], to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. ASWELL], to the majority leader of the House [Mr. MONDELL], to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEENERSON], to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. REED]—all who took part in the debate in the House when House resolution 225 was under consideration—to the distinguished Secretary of Labor, to Senator KENYON, of Iowa; to Senator CULBERSON, of Texas; to Senator SHEPPARD, of Texas; and a copy was sent to the Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON, which I presume the gentleman received. I was a little bit doubtful about giving much consideration to the proposition, and I tried to find out who the author was.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, under the Constitution of the United States and under Jefferson's Manual of Rules, it is provided that the motives of a Member of the House of Representatives concerning matters that are connected with business on the floor of the House can not be impugned or drawn into question by another Member.

Under that constitutional provision and privilege and under the privilege granted by Jefferson's Manual, to the exact section to which I shall cite the Chair, if he desires, I submit to the Chair that if a Member can not impugn the motives of another Member concerning business of the House and his attitude toward public business, then for that much greater reason a Member may not read from the floor of the House a scurrilous document which is anonymous in its character and which seeks to bring into disrepute the motives of a Member of Congress concerning his actions with respect to public business. The Chair is familiar with this document which the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] seeks to read, because a copy was sent to him, as stated by the gentleman. I can produce proof, if the Chair so desires, that the document is anonymous, prepared by parties who kept their names in the dark, and that only recently, when required by members of the press to disclose their identity, did they disclose it. I submit to the Chair in all fairness that such anonymous, scurrilous document under the rules of this House, the Constitution of the United States, and under Jefferson's Manual of Rules should not be permitted to be read in an attempt to bring a Member of the House into disrepute. I submit the matter to the Chair for decision.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I trust this will not be taken out of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly not. This will not come from the time of the gentleman from California.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to have a word to say on that point of order before the Chair rules.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. NOLAN. I want to say that after careful investigation I found the author of this document.

He produced a satisfactory affidavit and proved to my satisfaction that he and another gentleman or two collaborated in preparing the document, and he furthermore offered to take me down town to a hotel where he registered as C. H. Mathews and prove he was the man who signed this document, C. H. Mathews, that reached the membership of this House. I also intend to prove to the satisfaction of every Member of this House that this communication, anonymous as it is, was made the basis by the gentleman from Texas for the resolution that passed this House. He told this House he had the facts in his possession to back it up.

Mr. WELLING. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. NOLAN. Yes; I yield for a question.

Mr. WELLING. Does not the document itself bear internal evidence, while it was still an anonymous document, that the gentleman from Texas was operating under it?

Mr. NOLAN. Absolutely, on the face of it. [Applause.] And if the gentleman from Texas wants his constituents, as he always says he does, to know the facts, it would be better for him to allow this thing to go in and then defend himself before his constituents on the stump in the next election.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is ready to rule. Up to this time the gentleman from California has remained within his rights. If during the time of the gentleman from California he should undertake to read any matter it is with the gentleman from Texas or any other Member as to whether or not he shall object. Or if objectionable statements are made or read by the gentleman from California the gentleman from Texas or any other Member of the House may ask that such statements be taken down.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a further point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. My point of order is this: If the Chair is familiar with the document which he seeks to read, I believe he will hold it to be against the rules of the House. Now, if it is read it goes into the RECORD. Has not a Member of the House the privilege of raising a point of order with the Chair and asking a ruling as to whether or not a scurrilous or anonymous document could be read into the RECORD?

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has indicated to the gentleman from Texas and the Members of the House the way in which the gentleman from Texas or any other Member may be protected from the reading of this or any other matter that the gentleman from California undertakes to read.

Mr. BLANTON. That is what he is attempting now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman from California undertakes to read any document the gentleman from Texas may object.

Mr. BLANTON. I object to the gentleman reading an anonymous document on the floor of this House, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California will proceed in order.

Mr. NOLAN. It is addressed to the gentlemen I spoke of under date of August 21, 1919——

Mr. BLANTON. I again raise the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the reading of the document is out of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California can not read the document if objection is made.

Mr. NOLAN. I am reading it in my own time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California could not even read his own speech if any Member of the House objected to its being read.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Idaho rise?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Has the Speaker any official advance notice of what is in this document?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It makes no difference what is in the document if objection is made by any Member.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. I want to inquire under what rule of the House the Speaker bases his present ruling and what precedent he has to substantiate it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will cite the rule:

When the reading of a paper other than one upon which the House is called to give a final vote is demanded and the same is objected to by any Member it shall be determined without debate by a vote of the House.

Again:

The reading of papers other than the one on which the vote is about to be taken is usually permitted without question (V, 5258), and the Member in debate usually reads or has read such papers as he pleases, but this privilege is subject to the authority of the House if another Member objects (V, 5285–5288, 5289–5291).

And there are cited a number of precedents:

This principle applies even to the Member's own written speech (V, 5258) or a report which he proposes to have read in his own time or to read in his place (V, 5293).

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Would it be in order to move that the gentleman from California be permitted to read?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Such a motion is in order.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the gentleman from California be permitted to proceed with the reading of the paper.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio moves that the gentleman from California be permitted to read the document in question. This motion is not subject to debate.

The question was taken, and the Speaker pro tempore announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, division, and pending that I ask for the yeas and nays, and pending that I make the point of order of no quorum. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order of no quorum. The Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and sixty-five gentlemen are present, not a quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors——

Mr. DYER. I ask for tellers.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman can not get tellers when there is no quorum.

Mr. DYER. Tellers will disclose whether there is a quorum or not.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CALDWELL. If this motion is maintained and the gentleman is allowed to proceed——

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order there is no business in order except the call of the roll.

Mr. CALDWELL. I am making a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is true. The regular order is demanded, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 238, nays 14, answered "present" 4, not voting 174, as follows:

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will open the doors. The yeas have it, and the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] is authorized to read the letter.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Where the rules of the House, and especially section 356, to which I directed the Speaker's attention, Jefferson's Manual, say that no Member on the floor of the House shall impugn the motives of any other Member concerning his action with respect to former business of the House, is this in order? First, to get my position clearly before the Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not state a point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. The point of order is this——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman should make the point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I do.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. Where the rules prohibit a Member from impugning the motives of another Member, and the Member seeks to read an anonymous communication on the floor, the effect of which does impugn the motives of a Member on the floor, can those rules be set aside by a mere vote of the House without the Rules Committee bringing in a rule to change the rules of the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not make a point of order. The gentleman's question is not a point of order.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that that is improper.

The SPEAKER. What is improper?

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman admits the communication is anonymous; that it was signed by a man purporting to be named Matthews when there was no such man named Matthews.

The SPEAKER. There is no point of order in that.

Mr. BLANTON (continuing). That somebody registered down here at the hotel in the name of Matthews when his name was not Matthews.

The SPEAKER. There is no point of order in that. The fact that the communication is anonymous does not keep it in order. The gentleman from California will proceed.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I do not approve of any man or set of men trapping other men through anonymous communications. I do not approve of the methods adopted in this instance, except as I think the House of Representatives is interested; and if it were not for the fact that I made an investigation to find out the author of this document, and found out there was a person in Washington who sent this communication, I would never even have attempted to have it published, much less bring it to the attention of the House.

I have here an affidavit made by one George Parson, who signed himself "C. H. Matthews," and I would like to take time to read this, but I will insert it in the RECORD.

Mr. Speaker, I want the House to know that I did make some investigation of it, and, as you authorized me to read this communication, I deem it my duty to publish the affidavit made by George Parson, the author of this communication signed "C. H. Matthews." I want you to understand that, so far as I know, this man is willing to appear before any committee of this House or before anybody to back up this communication that is anonymous, so called. And, inasmuch as there is not anything to my motion that transgresses the rules of the House in this affidavit, I ask that it be published in the RECORD for the benefit of the Members of the House.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Read it!

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I have not seen the communication. I would like to hear it read.

Mr. NOLAN. It is as follows:

WASHINGTON,
District of Columbia, ss:

Personally appeared before me this 28th day of August, 1919, George Parson, who being first duly sworn deposes and says: That he is now, and has been during the past year, an employee of the United States Department of Labor; that on or about the 28th day of July, 1919, he drafted a letter to the Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON, a Member of the United States House of Representatives, of which the attached carbon copy, marked "Exhibit A," is the original first carbon or facsimile; that this letter was subsequently placed in a plain envelope bearing the proper amount of postage and mailed to the said THOMAS L. BLANTON at his official Washington address; that to the best of affiant's knowledge and belief the various statements contained in the said letter which reflect in any way upon the Department of Labor or the officials thereof are all purposely false and misleading.

Deponent further states that on the 15th day of August, 1919, he drafted a second letter to the said THOMAS A. BLANTON; that the attached carbon copy, marked "Exhibit B," is the original first carbon or facsimile of this second letter, which was mailed, as in the first instance, to the said THOMAS L. BLANTON at his official address in Washington, D. C.; that in response to the suggestion made in this second letter there did appear in the personal column of the Washington Evening Star for the 16th day of August, 1919, an advertisement addressed to "Sidney" and signed "Helen," which advertisement affiant is morally certain was caused to be inserted in the said paper by the said THOMAS L. BLANTON.

That affiant subsequently drafted a circular letter addressed under date of August 21, 1919—

Which, by the way, is the letter the House has authorized me to read—to the Hon. FREDERICK H. GILLETT and other Members of the House and Senate of the United States, as well as to the Hon. W. B. Wilson, Secretary of Labor, setting forth the above and other facts relating to the two letters mentioned; that the attached "Exhibit C" is a sample copy of this circular letter, similar in all respects, even to the matter of the paper upon which it is written, to those mailed to the various Members of Congress and to the Secretary of Labor

That on August 21, 1919, with copies of these circular letters in his possession affiant proceeded to the Capitol Park Hotel, on Union Station Plaza, in the city of Washington and District of Columbia, and did there register as a guest of the said hotel under the purely fictitious name of C. H. Matthews, of Chicago; that he was assigned to room 58, on the south side of the hotel and on the floor immediately above the lobby.

That he occupied this room from about noon on August 21 to about 8 o'clock on the following morning; that during this time he was rung up on the telephone by a confederate on the outside who sought to convey the impression in the minds of the hotel clerks that affiant was a union-labor man visiting the city to confer with labor leaders.

That affiant's sole idea and purpose in thus posing as a labor man by the name of Matthews, from Chicago, was to furnish himself with a bogus personality in order the more successfully to expose the said THOMAS L. BLANTON and his methods of antagonizing the Federal Department of Labor.

That on the morning of August 22, 1919, affiant mailed the various copies of the circular letter above mentioned at the central post office near Union Station, using first-class postage and special-delivery stamps for the purpose.

That the above action from first to last was initiated and carried through without the knowledge of any of affiant's official superiors and with the sole cooperation of I. H. McCarty, another inspector in the United States Department of Labor.

GEORGE PARSON.

Subscribed and sworn to before me this 28th day of August, 1919.
[SEAL.] ROBERT E. BRIGGS,
Notary Public in and for the District of Columbia.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this gentleman called on me prior to his visit to the press gallery, which he speaks about, because I wanted to find out if there was a man who passed as C. H. Matthews, and if there was such an individual as C. H. Matthews, and he presented this affidavit to me, and also asked me to accompany him to the Capitol Park Hotel, where he said the clerk or those in charge of that hotel would identify him as the man who registered as C. H. Matthews, the author of this so-called anonymous communication which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] quoted liberally from the other day, all for his own benefit.

Mr. Speaker, I am going to try to read this letter so that I will come within the rules of the House. I do not want to read anything in it that transgresses the rules of the House. I would be willing to submit the letter——

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Read it!

A MEMBER. You have a right to read it to the House.

Mr. NOLAN. This is the letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 21, 1919.

TO HONS. FREDERICK H. GILLETT; JOHN M. C. SMITH; JOHN I. NOLAN; IRA G. HERSEY; FREDERICK N. ZIHLMAN; NORMAN J. GOULD; OSCAR E. BLAND; JOHN MACCRATE; B. FRANK MURPHY; JAMES P. MAHER; WALTER A. WATSON; JOHN J. CASEY; WILLIAM L. CARSS; WILLIAM D. UPSHAW; WILLIAM N. VAILE; RUFUS HARDY; SAMUEL C. MAJOR; GEORGE HUDDLESTON; JOSEPH WALSH; CHAMP CLARK; PHILIP P. CAMPBELL; JAMES B. ASWELL; FRANK W. MONDELL; HALVOR STEENERSON; STUART F. REED; W. B. WILSON, Secretary of Labor; WILLIAM S. KENYON, United States Senate; CHARLES A. CULBERSON, United States Senate; MORRIS SHEPPARD, United States Senate.

(Copy to Hon. THOMAS L. BLANTON.)

GENTLEMEN: In order to disclose to the friends of labor and the public at large the questionable methods occasionally made use of by Representative BLANTON, of Texas, three members in good standing of the American Federation of Labor recently subjected him to a novel test. If you will have the goodness to wade through the following details, which are not wholly lacking in interest, you will gain a comprehensive insight into the facts and be in a position to estimate at its true worth any explanation that the gentleman from Texas may have the effrontery to offer in defense of himself.

The object of the test to which the three union-labor men put Mr. BLANTON was simply to satisfy themselves that his utterances on the floor of Congress were frequently based on irresponsible and incompetent data. They wanted to demonstrate, in other words, that he seldom or never investigates the truth or falsity of his information before giving voice to it in the House of Representatives.

They accomplished their object by writing the gentleman from Texas a letter. It was not an ordinary missive by any means. The claim will doubtless be made (and will certainly not be denied) that as a letter it was highly improper and reprehensible. Its principal and most glaring characteristic was a certain Blantonese carelessness in handling the truth. Perhaps this was the reason that the letter made such a favorable impression on the gentleman from Texas. But let the letter speak for itself.

This letter, as I gather from the affidavit, was written on or about July 28, and House resolution 225 was introduced into this House on August 1, a few days after. I insert the resolution at this point to show how the gentleman from Texas acted after receiving this letter.

Resolution.

Resolved, That the Secretary of Labor be, and he is hereby, directed to report forthwith to the House of Representatives of the United States of America the following facts:

(1) Copies of all such instructions mentioned by John B. Densmore as having been received by him during the months of May, June, July, August, September, and October, 1918, he having said:

"SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., November 1, 1918.

"Hon. W. B. WILSON,
"Secretary of Labor, Washington, D. C.

"SIR: Pursuant to instructions received from time to time during the past six months, I have the honor to report that I have conducted a secret and altogether informal inquiry into the Mooney case, and beg leave to submit herewith the results of my investigation.

(2) The names of all persons who, under the direction of any branch of the Department of Labor, had anything to do with the investigation of Thomas J. Mooney, charged with and convicted for heinous crime in California, stating in detail their respective activities, the amount of compensation paid them respectively, and the expenses of such investigation itemized in detail during the six months between May 1 and November 1, 1918.

(3) What connection in behalf of the Department of Labor, if any, since the punishment of said Thomas J. Mooney was commuted to life imprisonment, and since November 1, 1918, has any employee of the Department of Labor had with said case of Thomas J. Mooney, stating such activities in detail, the expense of same itemized in detail, and upon what authority of law, attaching copies of all reports made thereunder to the Department of Labor.

(4) What activities, if any, are now being conducted in behalf of Thomas J. Mooney.

(5) Attach copies of vouchers of McPherson, Kelly, and Kilmer for July, 1918, covering their trip from San Francisco to Los Angeles, the purpose of such trip and expense of same itemized.

(6) Attach copy of letter of instructions sent by John B. Densmore to H. L. Cobb after Cobb was sent to Texas on propaganda trip for Employment Bureau and expense of trip itemized in detail.

(7) Attach all reports of Gallagher and Martin for their six weeks spent in Philadelphia, spring of 1919, investigating F. R. Welsh, with statement of expenses fully itemized in detail.

(8) Attach report of John B. Densmore on Immigration Service investigation at San Francisco, with full statement of expense thereof itemized in detail.

[Confidential.]

DEAR MR. BLANTON: Please consider this confidential, as I would probably lose my job if it became known that I had passed you any official information. My immediate chief is a martinet, while the higher-ups—but you know what the higher-ups are. Please introduce a resolution in the House calling upon the Secretary of Labor for a copy of Densmore's report in the latter's Immigration Service investigation at San Francisco. In this report you will find a reference to the Hon. Judge F. W. Henshaw and his excellent article on "Our Relations with Japan," written from the standpoint of immigration economics; the judge's abilities and personal standing are extolled in the highest terms. This is the same Henshaw so mercilessly crucified in Densmore's Mooney report.

By the way, the immigration report was transmitted by the Secretary of Labor, and any Member of the House can have access to it. It is printed as a public document.

"In fact, so far as Henshaw is concerned, Densmore's Immigration Service report completely nullifies and repudiates his Mooney report. Densmore eats his own words and takes back all the slanders previoulsy spread concerning Henshaw."

There is not a word in the immigration report about Henshaw.

"There is another point you ought to look up: In Densmore's immigration investigation a crook by the name of Hinklemeyer was trapped by Densmore's dictaphone in the act of accepting $4,500 in marked bills, paid over to him by Densmore's operatives. This was not stage money, but was obtained by Densmore through regular channels on what is known as a 'blue voucher—expenses that can not be itemized.' It has never been paid back. The only way possible to get at the facts is by passing a resolution directing the Secretary to furnish all the facts in the Hinklemeyer case, together with the expense thereof. His name is Agathon L. Hinklemeyer, and the poor devil is now doing time in the pen. The Hinklemeyer case was entirely separate from the Mooney investigation.

"Also get vouchers of three of Densmore's men (McPherson, Kelly, and Kilmer) for July, 1918, in which you will see that these worthies traveled from San Francisco to Los Angeles and return in a hired high-power car costing $20 a day, not counting the chauffeur, the whole trip lasting two weeks, at a combined per diem which I figure at about $75. The whole trip was useless and accomplished nothing. It was a joy party, Kelly being so drunk in Los Angeles that he got into a jam with the police.

"Ask also why H. L. Cobb was sent to Texas, and get the letter of instructions sent to him by Densmore after he arrived there. It is juicy.

"Have the Secretary furnish details and expense returns, including all written reports of two operatives by the name of Gallagher and Martin, who for six weeks last spring were in Philadelphia investigating a man by the name of Welch, just because the latter had exposed Densmore. These men spent huge sums of money—threw it away like water. You will find items for automobiles galore; also some more of those 'expenses which can not be itemized.'

"Wishing you success in your attack on rottenness in the civil service, and with best wishes, I am,

"Sincerely, yours, "SAFETY FIRST."

It is necessary at this point to insert a brief word of explanation in regard to the statements contained in this reprehensible though somewhat ingenious communication.

That is how this gentleman characterizes his anonymous communication to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]:

In the first place, if there is a single word of truth in the letter it crept in by mistake. The letter writers knew nothing of Densmore's immigration report, but they surmised that a reputed whitewash of disreputable old Henshaw would be wonderfully good news to Henshaw's mouthpiece in Congress. Henshaw, it should be explained, is one of the clique that framed Billings and Mooney in California; he is also the same delightful old scoundrel who accepted the $410,000 bribe in the celebrated Fair will case.

The Hinklemeyer incident was concocted out of whole cloth. It is believed that such a person as Hinkelmeyer really exists, but according to the San Francisco Examiner of November 9, 1918, he was trapped by the Department of Justice and Densmore had nothing to do with it—certainly nothing to do with furnishing the money. All that stuff about the "blue voucher" is scenery and local color, pure and simple.

McPherson, Kelly, and Kilmer are fictitious characters. The high-power car, the $20 a day, the joy ride, and the trouble with the Los Angeles police all belong to the realm of the imagination and are put in for what the fiction hacks call "verisimilitude."

BLANTON has stated in private conversation that Cobb was sent to Texas to stir up trouble between the Congressman and his constituents. The letter writers could not resist the temptation to intimate that this preposterous yarn had some foundation in fact.

Gallagher and Martin belong to the same ghostly company as McPherson, Kelly, and Kilmer. They do not exist. Welsh does exist. He is the friend and fellow worker of BLANTON, Fickert (the district attorney of San Francisco who framed the Mooney defendants), and Henshaw. As a sort of scurrilous pamphleteer he is the author of numerous studied misstatements on the subject of Mooney, Fickert, union labor, Secretary Wilson, Densmore, and the Department of Labor generally. Anything that concerns Welsh is of interest to BLANTON. The letter writers correctly surmised that the gentleman from Texas would be enormously shocked and chagrined to learn that the Department of Labor had investigated this agent in the East of the San Francisco frame-up gang. So far as the letter writers are aware, the Department of Labor did nothing of the kind.

And now, with this light on the subject, it is proper to make inquiry as to just what Mr. BLANTON did with the letter.

Did he throw it into the wastebasket, where it properly belonged? Or did he put it aside for future study and investigation?

The gentleman from Texas did neither of these things. Instead, he introduced in the House of Representatives of the United States of America a resolution calling upon the Secretary of Labor for all the nonexistant data mentioned in the anonymous letter, omitting only the $4,500 story in regard to Hinklemeyer, which was probably too preposterous for even BLANTON to swallow. The resolution contained eight paragraphs, and in speaking in support of them upon the floor of the House the gentleman from Texas solemnly said (see p. 3805 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Aug. 12, 1919):

"I drew the resolution and I know that the facts exist in each one of them."

This is in arguing against the point of order made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] against the consideration of the resolution.

By thus knowingly, deliberately, and willfully making a false statement to the United States House of Representatives the gentleman from Texas forever discredits himself and the shady causes which he so ardently espouses.

On this same day, August 12, 1919, approximately one-third of the entire House proceedings were devoted to a discussion of the Blanton resolution. The author urged its adoption with great apparent candor and honesty.

"The facts will show," he said in discussing the paragraph relating to the phantom trio (McPherson, Kelly, and Kilmer), "that these three men hired an expensive, high-power automobile and paid an enormous sum per day for it and ran back and forth from San Francisco to Los Angeles, back and forth and forth and back, costing this Government hundreds of dollars. And incidentally the facts will show that instead of being engaged in a lawful purpose, one was arrested by the officers of the law for violating the law in particular." (See p. 3804 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Aug. 12, 1919.)

I have the particular paragraphs and sentences marked in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for that date.

In speaking of the bogus incident in which Welsh is alleged to have figured, the gentleman from Texas said: "This man Welsh sent me certain information, and therefore Densmore had to send men to Philadelphia to investigate Welsh. I am asking the Secretary of Labor to send the report of these men in Philadelphia who investigated Mr. Welsh for six weeks, and an itemized statement of their expenses there. Is not that a fact?"

That is the language of the gentleman from Texas in relation to these fictitious individuals.

This is Government money that has been spent, and there is nothing in any of these eight subdivisions in this resolution that does not call for a fact. (See p. 3804 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Aug. 12, 1919.)

That is the language of the gentleman from Texas, found on page 3804 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for August 12, 1919.

The discussion which took place on the floor of the house upon the question of the propriety of the resolution was participated in by Representatives HUDDLESTON, WALSH, SMITH of Michigan, CLARK of Missouri, UPSHAW, CAMPBELL of Kansas, ASWELL, VAILE, MONDELL, STEENERSON, REED of West Virginia, the Speaker of the House, and our friend from Texas, Mr. BLANTON. The debate filled page after page of the RECORD for August 12, and was continued on the 14th. The author of the resolution argued eloquently in its behalf. Occasionally he sought to whet the appetites of his fellow Members for the coming feast:

"I will state to the Members of the House," he said on August 14, when again referring to his demand for information in regard to the unsubstantial McPherson, the gossamerlike Kelly, and the ghostly Kilmer—"I will state to the Members of the House that that will be a very interesting document to the gentlemen of the House when we get it." (See p. 3869 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for Aug. 14, 1919.)

As a result of Mr. BLANTON'S representations that he was asking for bona fide facts, the resolution was agreed to, whereupon the three unrepentant members of the American Federation of Labor who had had the temerity to subject the gentleman from Texas to this unfeeling test, held a further conference and decided that it was time to send him another letter.

There is a thing in this letter which is an absolute misstatement of fact, about membership in the American Federation of Labor, which it was unnecessary for the gentleman to introduce into this letter. I bring this matter to the attention of the House, and I do not approve of it; not because it referred to the fact that they were members of the American Federation of Labor, which subsequently was disproved, but they did not need, in my estimation, to make any statement except the facts in the case.

They accordingly composed and dispatched the following communication.

The resolution passed on August 14 and this communication was dispatched on August 15 to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]:

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 15, 1919.

DEAR MR. BLANTON: There was considerable excitement around the department when your resolution was introduced, and copies of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD have been much in demand. My immediate chief, who has charge of nearly all the field accounts, in addition to being the custodian of all vouchers that have been approved by the Auditor for the State and Other Departments, has been very busy, indeed. Up to this time I haven't been able to fathom just what is going on, but the accounts (vouchers) of the various employees named in your resolution have all been lying on the chief's desk for the past 48 hours. It is my own personal opinon, based on fragments of conversation that have come to me, and aiso on the actions of the file clerk, who has been very busy getting up other vouchers on the typewriter (occasionally consulting those on the chief's desk), that the genuine originals will soon be buried so deep that they can never be dug up. Inasmuch as the disbursing clerk's accounts show nothing but the totals of the various vouchers it would be virtually impossible to check up the individual items comprising them in event the originals should be replaced by others. This may seem a lax way to handle the public accounts, and it is; but there are times when this laxity comes in very handy, as you can readily perceive.

I am writing this to ask if you think it would be a good idea to secure copies of these originals before anything happens to them. We have what are known as A files and B files, the former being the originals and the latter duplicates. I can still get the B-file copies of the vouchers in question and no one would ever miss them.

I want you to keep in mind that suggestion—"I can still get the B-file copies of the vouchers in question and no one would ever miss them."

Even if search happened to be made for them, nothing would be thought out of the way if they were not found, as the B files are only about 60 per cent complete, and nobody ever really expects to find anything in them. If you think this a wise precaution—and it is—I would suggest your advising me through the medium of a line in the personal column of the Star, stating your wishes in the premises. You can address the notice to "Sidney" and sign it "Helen," so that I will understand who it is from. I am with you in this matter until hell freezes over.

I have some further data on the Welsh investigation in Philadelphia which is very interesting, tending to show the active participation of a high outside labor man in the matter. This is shown in a series of letters which I am copying at odd times, and which I will let you have within a few days—probably by the first of the week. The idea of this official of the American Federation of Labor cooperating with two unscrupulous agents of a Federal department in seeking to besmirch the character of this man in Philadelphia is enough to make the angels weep. I have copied about half of the correspondence and will complete the rest in a couple of days. It has to be done piecemeal; otherwise I would have had it finished before this.

With a wife and children dependent on me, I have no desire to emulate Lynn—at least not to the extent of becoming a martyr and losing my job. This caution I am sure you will understand and respect. If I were a single man, I would come into the open gladly and take my chances.

With renewed assurances of my heartiest cooperation, I am,

Sincerely, yours,

SAFETY FIRST.

This letter was, if anything, even more reprehensible than the first one. It should be remembered that to remove Government records from the files unlawfully is a serious matter, punishable by a fine and imprisonment under section 128 of the Criminal Code. The very rawness of the letter was therefore against the probability of its finding favor in the eyes of BLANTON, since the authors, in effect, proposed to have the Congressman (an ex-judge) conspire with them to commit a felony.

The second letter was received by Mr. BLANTON on August 16. Instead of tossing it aside as an unworthy pleasantry, the gentleman from Texas actually hastened to have the following notice printed in the personal column of the Evening Star for the same day:

"SIDNEY: Obtain copies and forward data at earliest possible.

"HELEN."

And the gentleman from Texas said he caused his secretary to have inserted this personal addressed to "Sidney," and stating—

Sidney: Obtain copies and forward data at earliest possible. Helen.

[Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Texas the other day laid great emphasis upon the fact that he did not ask for originals in inserting this personal in the Star, that he knew the law, that he did not ask for originals. I call attention to the fact that the gentleman who signed himself "Safety First" never suggested to him that he ask for originals; that he suggested to him that he put a personal in the Star asking for copies. The gentleman from Texas the other day said he was aware of the fact that it was a frameup, and that he did not walk into the trap. The gentleman from Texas inserted the very personal suggested by this man who called himself "Safety First." And let me call your attention to the fact that prior to that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] had had one experience in getting an employee of the United States Government to take letters and documents from the files in the person of this man Lynn. He excused it on the floor of the House and he excused it before the Committee on Labor, and gave as a reason for it that the man was appearing before a committee of the House, and that he, as a Member of Congress, had the right to authorize or demand from any subordinate working in any department in Washington that he bring before a committee of this House any documents that he desired him to have.

The letter of the gentleman from Texas to Mr. Lynn is as follows:

WEDNESDAY, June 25, 1919.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Lynn, what position do you hold here in Washington? What position are you in in Washington?

Mr. LYNN. I am working in the transportation section.

Mr. BLANTON. Of what service?

Mr. LYNN. Employment Service. I used to be in the correspondence section, assistant chief and acting.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. John B. Densmore is your employer, is he not, the director general?

Mr. LYNN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. Yesterday I sent you this notice:

Mr. STANLEY R. LYNN,

United States Employment Service, Washington, D. C.

SIR: The joint sessions of the Senate and House Committee on Labor have authorized me to present before such session to-morrow at 10 o'clock a. m., in room 201, Senate Office Building, certain evidence.

I respectfully request that you kindly appear there at that time, as I desire to interrogate you concerning certain business of your department. Kindly bring with you the following documents:

1. The record of travel for Luther S. Steward for months of July, August, September, October, November, and December, 1918.

2. Request for transportation No. L517736 by Jeanette V. Densmore, July 4, 1918, from New York to Atlantic City, N. J., and the three Pullman coupons attached thereto, numbered, respectively, as follows:

Office Form 2357, No. 5071,
Office No. 2357, Form 2, 5072, and
Office No. 2357, Form 2, 5073, all of same being from New York to Atlantic City, issued July 4, 1918.

3. Request for transportation No. L517737 signed by Jeanette V. Densmore, July 7, 1918, from Atlantic City, N. J., to New York, and the Pullman coupon from Atlantic City, N. J., to New York, July 7, 1918.

4. Voucher No. 30682, travel expense Miss Jeanette V. Densmore for $747.33, trip begun about September 3, 1918. I might add that I have personally inspected the above, and they should be easily found in your department.

I will also ask you to be prepared to tell what you know concerning about $300 collected by Mr. Harry Parks, Personnel Section, official station, Washington, for trips he took away.

Also please investigate voucher No. 20479 for $13.75 to Lillian Haberkost, Akron, Ohio, December 12, 1918, and voucher No. 27137 for $12.70 to Lillian Haberkost, Akron, Ohio, March 6, 1919.

Do you know anything about a conversation occurring between Mr. Mason and Mr. Smythe, when by way of an excuse Smythe told Mason he could go to Cleveland to inspect furniture?

Kindly investigate voucher for $15.10 giving reason of S. Tyson Kinsell to go to his home in Philadelphia.

Hoping that you will kindly reply with the foregoing requests, I am,
Very truly, yours.

Now, gentlemen, I am going to make a suggestion here. Anybody that wants the original of the Declaration of Independence, which is down in the State Department, needs only to get acquainted with some clerk down there, introduce a resolution, if you want to see it and want to verify the handwriting of John Hancock or Thomas Jefferson or any one of the rest of the signers of that document; if you adopt the method of the gentleman from Texas, you can have it brought up here, and people can abstract documents from the files of the departments and bring them up to meetings of committees of the House. That is in accordance with the practice of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. THOMAS. I desire to inquire how the reading of these letters will reduce the high cost of living? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. NOLAN. I will suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky that if the House watches its privileges which it extends to Members of this House in the future it will save the high cost of printing in extending privileges to Members of this House.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. NOLAN. I can not yield. I want to get along.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. NOLAN. I read further:

What more need be said? We have here the sad spectacle of a high member of the legislative branch of the Government, who is solemnly sworn to uphold the law, using his time and energy to undermine in the most surreptitious and despicable manner other lawfully created and efficiently functioning bureaus of the Federal establishment. We see him busily engaged in vain attempts at scandal mongering, with a view to discrediting those executive departments of the Government which are charged by law with the duty of fostering, promoting, and developing the welfare of the wage earners of the country. In the mad pursuit of his object he does not hesitate to conspire with a supposed employee of the Government to commit an offense against existing law.

The gentleman is an avowed foe of organized labor. It is a matter of common repute that he is the mouthpiece in Congress of the National Manufacturers' Association, the Southern Lumberman's Association, the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce, and other organizations which have been fighting unionism and advocating the "open shop." His activities along these lines have thrown him into the company of some of the worst men among the employer interests—the sort of men who will go to almost any lengths to discredit union labor. He corresponds with such men as Fickert and Welsh—two men who have done everything in their power, as the tools of the antilabor forces, to bring to a successful issue the unspeakable frameup against the Mooney defendants. BLANTON'S good faith has long been questioned by those who have the best interests of labor at heart. He preaches patriotism and inveighs against anarchy; but, alas, at the same time he champions the cause of every man who by word and deed advocate lawlessness.

It is believed that the caliber and motives of this Representative from Texas should be shown up without pity in order that the wage earners may know him for what he is and that the House of Representatives and the public at large may learn how much dependability is to be placed in any statement whatever that the gentleman may make.

Very truly, yours,

C. H. MATHEWS,
Capitol Park Hotel, Washington, D. C.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the thing that ought to concern the Members of this House is the statement that the gentleman from Texas made during the consideration of House resolution 225, when the point of order was made against it. On page 3802, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] raised the point of order against the resolution. On page 3804, the gentleman from Texas, in response to an inquiry by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], makes the following statement:

Mr. BLANTON. I will gladly answer the gentleman. For instance, the facts will show that these three men hired an expensive, high-power automobile and paid an enormous sum per day for it and ran back and forth from San Francisco to Los Angeles, back and forth and forth and back, costing this Government hundreds of dollars. And incidentally the facts will show that instead of being engaged in a lawful purpose one was arrested by the officers of the law for violating the law in particular.

I also desire to insert the following extract from page 3869 of the RECORD of August 14:

Mr. BLANTON. Gentlemen of the House, this resolution further directs the Secretary of Labor to send to the House vouchers covering the expenses of McPherson, Kelly, and Kilmer, three different men from the Department of Labor, who made trips from San Francisco to Los Angeles. I will state to the Members of the House that that will be a very interesting document to the gentlemen of the House when we get it, to show the items of expense incurred by those three men, in the hiring of a high-powered automobile to make trips from San Francisco to Los Angeles—not on a proper mission of business for this Government, because, if my information, which comes straight, is correct, these men went there for other purposes, in violation of laws instead of in enforcement of laws.

The men mentioned here were purely fictitious characters; however, Mr. BLANTON stated this as a fact in connection with House resolution 225.

That relates to paragraph No. 5 of the resolution, which calls upon the Secretary of Labor to attach copies of vouchers of McPherson, Kelly, and Kilmer for July, 1919, covering their trip from San Francisco to Los Angeles, the purpose of such trip and the expense of same itemized; and the gentleman from Texas solemnly assured the Members of this House that the facts would show that that incident took place in connection with three members connected with the Department of Labor. On the same page of the RECORD I read:

Mr. BLANTON. I am asking the Secretary of Labor to send the report of these men in Philadelphia who investigated Mr. F. R. Welsh for six weeks and an itemized statement of their expenses there. Is not that a fact? This is Government money that has been spent and there is nothing in any of these eight subdivisions that does not call for a fact.

Paragraph 7 of the resolution calls upon the Secretary of Labor to attach all reports of Gallagher and Martin for their six weeks spent in Philadelphia, spring of 1919, investigating F. R. Welsh, with statement of expenses fully itemized in detail.

On page 3805, in response to a question from the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] asking him to yield, Mr. BLANTON said:

I drew the resolution, and I know that the facts exist in each one of them.

Gentlemen of the House, the thing that you are concerned with is the statement made by the gentleman from Texas in securing the passage of House resolution 225 by the American House of Representatives. This anonymous communication does not alone ridicule the gentleman from Texas, but it also ridicules the House of Representatives. It shows that when a Member of this House gets up on the floor and solemnly assures the membership of the House that he has facts to back up statements the House passes the resolution, and then the facts come out in connection with the anonymous communication I have just read.

Mr. Speaker, there is a lot that I would like to say. What I want to present in the RECORD is extracts from proceedings before committees of the House and the House itself, and I ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to extend my remarks by printing extracts from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and from the proceedings before the Joint Committee on Labor of the House and Senate and documents printed by the Government.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks by inserting extracts from hearings before the Committee on Labor and other Government documents. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I feel sure that in connection with the gentleman's remarks, if he is granted the right to extend them, under the peculiar circumstances of this case, where I am attacked by anonymous letters, the House will give me 15 minutes in which to reply to the gentleman, explaining these matters; and I ask, in connection with the gentleman's statement, that I be granted, at the conclusion of the gentleman's remarks, 15 minutes in which to explain this situation.

Mr. NOLAN. I join with the gentleman in that request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas joins to the request of the gentleman from California the request that he be given 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NOLAN. The gentleman from Texas in his speech of September 11, page 5238, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, criticized the Secretary of Labor for his reply to House resolution 65, when the facts are that only one department, the Interstate Commerce Commission, furnished the information called for. Why did Mr. BLANTON single out the Department of Labor.

The following summary shows the deficiency estimate filed with the committee on appropriations by several departments, the Department of Labor estimate being the lowest:

House Document.	To comply with—	Disposition.	Department.	Amount.
106	House resolution 65.	Salaries and printing.	Labor	$1,541
138	House resolution 67.	do	Interior	5,000
105-107	House resolution 69.	do	Justice	2,500
92	House resolution 75.	do	Treasury	2,500
129	House resolution 74.	do	War	30,000
101	House resolution 76.	do	Commerce	2,200
Total				43,741

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] in his extension of remarks of July 28 made the following statement:

By the fight I have made against the present wasteful, improper United States Employment Service I have saved to the people since March 1 last the enormous sum of $11,233,808.10. Against the appropriation of $1,800,000 contained in the former sundry civil bill, which failed of passage, and the proposed appropriation of $10,033,808.10 defeated by reason of my fight against it, there has been given to this department in all only $600,000, making a clear saving of $11,233,808.10. Time and recent developments have amply justified my action. In addition to the above saving on appropriations, thousands of dollars of the unexpended money available has been saved through the reduction of unreasonable salaries.

Let us see what the facts are in connection with the appropriations for this service. The only appropriations recommended by the committee were $276,000 in a deficiency bill and $200,000 inserted in the sundry civil bill, which went out on a point of order, but the item was increased in the Senate to $400,000, so there has been appropriated for this service since March 1 the sum of $676,000, and the most that the House Committee recommended was $476,000, so the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] would lead the people to believe he saved millions when no such amounts were even seriously considered either by the House or Senate committees much less brought before the House itself. In fact, the total appropriations for the Department of Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, were as follows:

Appropriations for Labor Department, fiscal year June 30, 1919.

Legislative, etc., bill	$1,218,970.00
Sundry civil bill	9,830,431.25
Deficiency (third)	304,549.75
Total	11,353,951.00

The above amounts included the appropriations for the Employment Service and all activities of the Department of Labor. The figures are furnished me by the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations.

The gentleman from Texas introduced several witnesses before the joint committee holding hearings on the Kenyon-Nolan bill. The following is from the testimony of a man by the name of Le Prohon, a labor agent for the Atlantic Forwarding Co., that had a contract for a shell-loading plant in New Jersey. This is one of the nefarious cost plus 10 per cent contracts, and Mr. Le Prohon was one of Mr. BLANTON's star witnesses:

Mr. NOLAN. And how many men were employed in your plant?
Mr. LE PROHON. From 4,000 to 9,000.
Mr. NOLAN. And you had a labor turnover of 1,500 a month?
Mr. LE PROHON. Oh, yes; 4,000 a month.
Mr. NOLAN. Four thousand a month?
Mr. LE PROHON. Yes, sir.
Mr. NOLAN. And where did you get those men outside of the 1,500 men that you got out of your office?
Mr. LE PROHON. Well, we got it out of New York.
Mr. NOLAN. Through what kind of service?
Mr. LE PROHON. Well, I will tell you, prior to this time that I learned of the employment service going to take over the control of the unskilled men, I sent West for an employment man. He was a No. 1 man, and I took him up with the intention of putting him on in New York, and putting him in our office. We had no fee, and we furnished the transportation and deducted that transportation if a man did not stay with us for two weeks—one week if he was a laborer and two weeks if he was a mechanic. I went to Mr. Barnes, who was the State director of labor in New York, with Mr. Turner, who was my representative, and I introduced myself and requested permission to open an office and to advertise, and I was told that I could not have permission; that I could not put a man in the Federal Employment Service; and that I could not ship men out of New York. Well, here I was; I had brought this man 3,500 miles, and I had him on my hands and we were getting short of men. So I went down and placed Mr. Turner in charge of the transportation with a fee-charging agency, and the company agreed to pay the fee, so that the men would have no charges.
The CHAIRMAN. This was a cost-plus plan that you were working on?
Mr. LE PROHON. Yes, sir.

This man's complaint was that the employment service prevented him from going out and indiscriminately hiring everybody else's men and then charging the Government the cost of the fee to the private agency and railroad fare plus 10 per cent under the contract, as he said he did in shipping his men from New York in violation of an Executive order of the President which had for its purpose the stabilizing of labor.

I stated on the floor of the House some time ago that one of Mr. BLANTON's witnesses, the man that stole the documents from the files of the Department of Labor, lied, and that the gentleman sat there and heard his witness lie about not having met with or talked with Mr. BLANTON before the day on which he testified. The following from the hearings will show whether this man was telling the truth; and this is the man that the day before the gentleman from Texas stated was an involuntary witness from the enemy's camp, who would not appear if he knew he did not have to. All through his testimony he showed he was disgruntled, because he did not get one of the plums given out:

[Hearings, Thursday, June 26, 1919.]

Mr. NOLAN. What is your position down there now?
Mr. LYNN. Typewriter.
Mr. NOLAN. Your position now, I mean?
Mr. LYNN. Typewriter.
Mr. NOLAN. And have you got access to the records, or have you charge of them that you brought up with you?
Mr. LYNN. No.
Mr. NOLAN. You have not?
Mr. LYNN. No.
Mr. NOLAN. And what is the rule in the Employment Service about taking records out without permission?
Mr. LYNN. Well, I think that this letter was enough.
Mr. NOLAN. And did you take this letter up with your superior officer?
Mr. LYNN. No.
Mr. NOLAN. You brought them here on the strength of that letter——
Mr. LYNN (interrupting). Yes, sir.
Mr. NOLAN. And you considered a letter from a Member of Congress enough, did you?
Mr. LYNN. Yes, sir.
Mr. NOLAN. Without any notification to your chief?
Mr. LYNN. Yes.
Mr. NOLAN. Did you ever tell any of them about it after you took the records?
Mr. LYNN. No; I did not have time to do that and to get it here.
Mr. NOLAN. What time did you get that letter?
Mr. LYNN. I think it was near 9 o'clock.
Mr. NOLAN. Near 9 o'clock in the morning?
Mr. LYNN. Yes.
Mr. NOLAN. Were there none of your superiors in the office when you went to get those records?
Mr. LYNN. No.
Mr. NOLAN. None at all?
Mr. LYNN. No.
Mr. NOLAN. What time do they get there?
Mr. LYNN. Nine o'clock.
Mr. NOLAN. And you did not consider it advisable to inform your superior officers that you were extracting from the records of the Department of Labor public records to take before a committee on the authority of a letter from a Member of Congress?
Mr. LYNN. No; there is a lot of them kicking——
Mr. NOLAN (interrupting). Were you at the Department of Labor yesterday morning in the Employment Service?
Mr. LYNN. Yes; I went down there.
Mr. NOLAN. You were there yesterday morning at 9 o'clock?
Mr. LYNN. Yes, sir.
Mr. NOLAN. And you took the records yesterday morning?
Mr. LYNN. Yes.
Mr. NOLAN. Did you have any of those records in your possession prior to yesterday morning?
Mr. LYNN. No.
Mr. MACCRATE. Prior to yesterday morning, Mr. Lynn, did you know what records Mr. BLANTON wanted?
Mr. LYNN. No.
Mr. MACCRATE. And the first intimation that you had or the first thing you knew about it was the letter that you received from him that he wanted these records?
Mr. LYNN. Yes.
Mr. MACCRATE. You never told Mr. BLANTON about certain records being in the department?
Mr. LYNN. No.
Mr. MACCRATE. And you do not know where Mr. BLANTON got his information about these cards and Pullman tickets?
Mr. LYNN. That is his matter; I do not know.
Mr. MACCRATE. Did you ever have any communication with him before yesterday morning as to these records?
Mr. LYNN. I have known him.
Mr. MACCRATE. I did not ask you that. I asked you if you had any communication with him as to these records before yesterday morning?
Mr. LYNN. No.
Mr. MACCRATE. Did you ever hear that it was a criminal offense to remove public records——
Mr. LYNN (interrupting). Not with a letter of authority. I consider it is all right.
Mr. MACCRATE. And you had never spoken to Mr. BLANTON before yesterday morning about these Pullman tickets?
Mr. LYNN. No.
Mr. MACCRATE. And are you positive of that?
Mr. LYNN. Yes.
Mr. MACCRATE. And you had never spoken to him about these card records of any of the employees of the department or that bureau before yesterday morning?
Mr. LYNN. Well, I say I had a little conversation with him, but it did not amount to anything.
Mr. MACCRATE. When was that conversation?
Mr. LYNN. About two or three days ago.
Mr. MACCRATE. Did you mention then anything about any records in the Labor Employment Service?

Mr. LYNN. Why, I—about this—when I come to think of it, about the transportation requests that passed through my hands; that is all.

Mr. MACCRATE. Was not Mr. BLANTON at the department a few days before that?

Mr. LYNN. In the——

Mr. MACCRATE. Was not Mr. BLANTON at the department a few days before that?

Mr. LYNN. I did not see him; I met him on the street.

The following voucher shows the full expense account of Miss Densmore, which fully vindicates the lady, as it covers her entire expenses for the month of July, 1918, and shows that she did not charge up the Pullman tickets, as stated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. This voucher can be found on page 251 of the hearings before the Joint Committee on Labor:

Mr. NOLAN. I ask that I may be permitted five minutes more, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, I want to call the attention of the House to the extension of remarks of 23 pages made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] under date of Monday, July 28. The gentleman in opening up the extension of remarks makes the following preliminary statement:

Mr. Speaker, I sincerely thank my colleagues for this privilege unanimously granted me (p. 2808) to discuss in detail my position and the reasons for now opposing the Nolan-Kenyon United States Employment measure.

The gentleman, on page 2808, got the following permission:

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the Nolan-Kenyon bill.

And prints in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD about 23 pages, going from A to Z on every subject that he had anything to do with, in this or any other Congress.

Now, Mr. Speaker, during the gentleman's extension of remarks he saw fit to attack the Committees on Labor of the House and the Senate, and the gentleman from New York [Mr. MACCRATE] and myself in particular. I am not going to go into detail on that, but I think if ever the Employment Service bill comes before the House we will have it out thoroughly. But during the course of his remarks he saw fit to characterize the editor of the San Francisco Call, which is not like the New York Call, a Socialist paper, but is a leading San Francisco daily newspaper, Fremont Older, a man who was 25 years editor of the San Francisco Bulletin, one of the most progressive and upstanding newspapers of the country, and which has been characterized, as I understand, as one of the five leading dailies of the United States. I do not have to defend Fremont Older. If Fremont Older is an anarchist, as stated by the gentleman from Texas, then every man who makes a fight for civic decency and against political corruption in this country is also an anarchist. Fremont Older all his life in San Francisco has been fighting for the things that are right, and every right-thinking man in San Francisco who may not agree with him on the subject of preparedness or militarism will agree that Fremont Older is an honest worker in every cause that most needs aid.

I want to say in passing that I am honored by having the friendship of Fremont Older. I did not seek his friendship or support—it can not be gained in that way—but he supported me in every campaign I have made. If it was not for the support of men like Fremont Older, a man like me, who came from the ranks of labor holding a position paying $40 per week to a position paying $625 a month would never have an opportunity of sitting with you gentlemen in the most representative legislative body in the world. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not need to rise in the defense of Fremont Older. He needs no defense at my hands. He enjoys the confidence and esteem of the best people of the State of California. Such men as Senator HIRAM W. JOHNSON and other leaders in California, who drove the corrupt Southern Pacific political machine out of the State, always had the benefit of Mr. Older's assistance, and they value highly his friendship.

I want to say in passing that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] was not even immune from attack by the gentleman from Texas. He told about numerous letters that he, the gentleman from Texas, had received, and he said that during the 15 years of the career of the gentleman from Ohio he, the gentleman from Ohio, never received that many letters commending his course.

I do not care whether the gentleman from Texas serves in this House 15 minutes or 50 years, he will never leave this House with the respect and admiration of the rest of the membership of the House like that which will be enjoyed by the gentleman from Ohio when he terminates his long and honorable career in this body. [Applause.] Another record the gentleman from Ohio will not be able to equal will be found in the attached record of roll calls and divisions demanded by the gentleman. In something like 28 votes on roll calls and divisions he was able to muster, counting his own vote, 101 votes all told, this in a little less than four months of the present session. This summary was made hurriedly and may be subject to slight correction, but is, in the main, correct. I insert the record of votes:

	In favor of Blanton motion or resolution.	Against Blanton motion or resolution.
May 28, p. 367, H. R. 3478, H. Report No. 11 (garden seeds), amendment by Blanton defeated. Congressman Blanton and one other voted alone	2	93
June 11, p. 977, deficiency appropriation, under the motion to instruct conferees to insist on the elimination of Senate amendment No. 49. Result of vote was Congressman Blanton and one other voted alone	2	216
June 17, p. 1236, Blanton voted alone on a demand by him for ayes and noes on the previous question for the report of conference committee on H. R. 3478 (1919 deficiency bill). On the same day and on the acceptance of the report being voted on, the question was taken, and on a division demanded by Blanton, and the result was Congressman Blanton voted alone	1	208

	In favor of Blanton motion or resolution.	Against Blanton motion or resolution.
June 30, p. 2093, on the passage of the sundry civil bill as amended by the Senate, Blanton's amendment that the conferees be instructed to disagree with the Senate amendment which restored the item of $400,000 for the Employment Service, on a division requested by him, was defeated by vote. Mr. Blanton voted alone	1	188
July 1, p. 2243, sundry civil bill, on the question of agreement with the Senate on the conference committee's report, on a call of the House by Mondell, on the question of a division, the vote was Congressman Blanton voted alone	1	103
July 1, p. 2244, on motion by Blanton that the House conferees be instructed to disagree, a division being demanded by Blanton, the vote was Congressman Blanton and one other voted alone	2	90
The point of no quorum being raised by him showed	10	209
July 1, p. 2246, H. R. 3184, on the question of the consideration of the water-power bill, Blanton opposed consideration, and on a division, Congressman Blanton voted alone	1	141
July 9, p. 2319, H. R. 2847, providing $40,000 for the American Printing House for the Blind. The House refused to strike out the word "annual" in the amendment proposed by Blanton. Congressman Blanton and two others voted alone	3	72
On the same day, in the same bill, Blanton sought to reduce the amount of the appropriation from $40,000 to $20,000. On a division requested by Blanton the amendment was defeated, Congressman Blanton voting alone	1	214
On the same day and bill, Blanton's motion to recommit, on a division requested by Blanton, showed that Congressman Blanton voted alone	1	124
The point of no quorum was raised by Blanton, and on subsequent roll call, the motion to recommit, Congressman Blanton and one other voted alone	2	278
July 9, p. 2332, H. R. 5723, Blanton's amendment to strike out enacting clause, on division requested by him, amendment was defeated, and Congressman Blanton voted alone	1	118
July 22, p. 3305, H. R. 5723, on motion to recommit, the ayes and noes refused by a vote of 1. Congressman Blanton voted alone	1	219
July 23, p. 3165, motion by Blanton that H. R. 2452, for relief of Charles Carey, letter carrier, who was injured while on duty be laid on the table, a division being asked by him, the result was that Congressman Blanton voted alone	1	160
A roll call after a point of no quorum by him, the result was that Congressman Blanton and one other voted alone	2	220
On this bill Blanton voted favorably in a previous session of Congress, and would not yield to Congressman Rogers of Massachusetts so that he could be reminded of it, the amount involved being $132.57.
Aug. 22, p. 4228, question of adjournment, motion made by Congressman Blanton, result of vote by tellers on request by him. On this Congressman Blanton voted alone	1	220
Aug. 28, p. 4459, on motion to adjourn by Congressman Blanton on a request for a division by Blanton. On this Congressman Blanton voted alone	1	223
Aug. 29, p. 4523, before the House S. 2322. Congressman Blanton and 15 others voted against the passage of the bill	16	181
Sept. 2, p. 4642, matter being considered, H. R. 185. Motion by Congressman Blanton to strike out the enacting clause was defeated, Congressman Blanton and 13 others voting in favor	14	69
Sept. 2, p. 4642 Division asked by Blanton. He voted alone	1	84
Sept. 5, p. 4945, H. R. 1853, on the question of favorable consideration of bill by committee on the question of division demanded by Congressman Blanton. Congressman Blanton and two others voted in favor	3	116
Sept. 10, p. 5189, House joint resolution 87, under discussion on amendment offered by Congressman Garrett. Vote was on division demanded by Congressman Blanton, Congressman Blanton voting alone	1	80
Sept. 10, p. 5189, House joint resolution 87. On the passage of resolution the House divided on demand by Congressman Blanton, the result being Congressman Blanton and two others voting "No"	3	103

There are 17 other members of the Texas delegation. There is something in common between the great State of Texas and the State of California. They are the only two States in the Union that were at one time a republic. I have devoted some time, even though I have not much time to read, to reading the history of Texas and to traveling through Texas. When the Employment Service bill was before the joint committee the gentleman from Texas introduced a witness, the man Lynn that I referred to.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. NOLAN. I ask for two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. NOLAN. When the Employment Service bill was before the joint committee the gentleman from Texas introduced a witness to attack the character of a woman because she happened to be unfortunate enough to be related to the Director of the Employment Service—her name is Jeanette B. Densmore. The joint committee went all over this charge, as I have shown by the record, and the lady, in the opinion of every member of the committee, was exonerated. It is the first time I have known where a Texan, a man from the great State of Texas, sought to stab a man through the heart of one of the women of his family, and I hope for the sake of Texas it will be the last. [Applause.]

I insert at this time a privileged resolution introduced by the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO], CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, September 11, 1919, page 5255. This resolution, after dividing same, was adopted almost unanimously:

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege, and I offer a privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arkansas presents what he claims to be a privileged resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

"Whereas in the record of the proceedings of the House of Representatives of September 5, 1919, as the same appears in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, on pages 4942 and 4943, there appears in the remarks of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] what purports to be statements made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], as follows, to wit:

"'He is mad because I will not permit him to ruthlessly waste and misappropriate the people's money from the Treasury.

"'I ask the Chair to keep the gentleman in order without forcing me to continually interrupt him. If he were not protected under the rules of this House, as construed by the present occupant of the chair, he would not dare to thus abuse me. He is now applauded by Members who have in their pockets private bills seeking to take public money out of the Treasury and put it into the pockets of private individuals and corporations without argument and without proper consideration, and they are all mad because I blocked the proceedings. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT] imagines that he will injure me with my constituents. He does not know west Texans. They will size up his bunk, and in the next election I will get 10 votes to every 1 he gets.

"'The gentleman's statement is untrue. He is mad because I have forced him to come to the House of Representatives occasionally.

"'Against such childish abuse repeatedly continued in violation of the Chair's ruling and the rules of this House. The gentleman knows he is not stating the truth, for it was only by such objections that I prevented numerous pernicious and unmeritorious measures from passing, which angered certain friends of such legislation.

"'Falsely and wrongly. When he knows he is not stating the truth.

"'The gentleman is maliciously and willfully abusing me personally, when he would not dare do it off the floor of the House, and is willfully violating the rules of the House.'"

And

"Whereas the said statements were not, as a matter of fact, made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] upon the floor, but were by him without the knowledge of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DEWALT], and without the leave of the House, inserted by interlining the typewritten copy of the stenographer's notes furnished to the Government Printing Office; and

"Whereas the greater part of said statements so injected were unparliamentary, out of order, and a violation of the privileges of the House; and if the same had been uttered upon the floor of the House, would have been subject to a point of order: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the House of Representatives—

"First. That it condemns the said falsification of the records of its proceedings; and

"Second. That the said remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] be stricken from the RECORD."

This resolution is incorporated because of the fact that it shows the action of the House a few days ago when the methods of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] were questioned.

In connection with the extension of remarks inserted in the RECORD by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] under date of July 28, 1919, which filled 23 full pages of the RECORD, I am informed on reliable authority that the National Association of Manufacturers are industriously circulating this document out of their New York office and using the frank of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]. I do know, however, from my own knowledge that numerous sacks of mail containing this extension of remarks have at times clogged the corridors in front of the gentleman's office in the House Office Building addressed to the National Association of Manufacturers at their New York office. The document that I read in the House to-day accuses the gentleman from Texas of being the mouthpiece of this organization; what his connections are with it I do not know. I do know that the lobbyists representing this organization were thoroughly discredited in the hearings held before the committees appointed by the House and Senate to investigate the Mulhall charges during the Sixty-third Congress. This association and its representatives are absolutely opposed to recognition of labor in any form and they have consistently opposed legislation in the interest of the wage workers of the country and have even opposed the child-labor bill during the hearings held by the Committee on Labor since I became a Member of the House.

If the gentleman is permitting his frank to be used in this connection by the National Association of Manufacturers he is severely abusing the franking privilege of the House of Representatives and depriving the Government of its just dues in securing postage from the National Association of Manufacturers for the transmission of this document. I expect to have positive information in reference to this franking privilege within a short time.

The Mooney case has been brought before the House of Representatives, through resolutions introduced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and passed by the House, and through his extension of remarks in the RECORD on a number of occasions. The Secretary of Labor in response to the passage by the House of House resolution 128 transmitted the so-called Densmore report, as well as the testimony and proceedings before the grand jury in the matter of F. C. Oxman and Charles M. Fickert.

I also incorporate for the benefit of the House a letter from the judge that tried Thomas J. Mooney for murder and who sentenced him to death. This letter was written to the attorney general of the State after the publication of the Oxman letters.

I also incorporate a statement by Attorney General U. S. Webb, of the State of California, after receiving Judge Griffin's letter.

I also incorporate a statement from Judge Robert M. Clerk, assistant attorney general of the State, who attended the grand jury when the matter of indicting Oxman came before that body.

I also incorporate Judge Griffin's letter to Gov. Stephens under date of November 19, 1918, urging a new trial for Mooney.

JUDGE GRIFFIN'S LETTER TO ATTORNEY GENERAL WEBB.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 25, 1917.

Hon. U. S. WEBB,
Attorney General of State of California.

MY DEAR GENERAL: On the 9th day of February, 1917, in the case of The People v. Thomas J. Mooney, then pending in my department of the superior court, there was rendered against the defendant Mooney a verdict of guilty of murder of the first degree without recommendation. Subsequently a motion for a new trial was made by the defendant, which was in due time denied; judgment was thereupon pronounced, and from such judgment and the order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial, an appeal to the Supreme Court has been taken and is now pending. It seems unnecessary to tell you that Mooney is one of those indicted for participation in the bomb outrage of July 22, 1916.

In the trial of Mooney there was called as a witness by the people one Frank C. Oxman, whose testimony was most damaging and of the utmost consequence to the defendant. Indeed, in my opinion, the testimony of this witness was by far the most important adduced by the people at the trial of Mooney. In confirmation of this statement I would respectfully call your attention to the transcript filed on the appeal.

Within the past week there has been brought to my attention certain letters written by Oxman prior to having been called to testify, which have come to the knowledge and into the possession of defendant's counsel since the determination of the motion for new trial. The authorship and the authenticity of these letters, photographic copies of which I transmit herewith, are undenied and undisputed. As you will at once see, they bear directly upon the credibility of the witness and go to the very foundation of the truth of the story told by Oxman on the witness stand. Had they been before me at the time of the hearing of the motion for a new trial I would unhesitatingly have granted it. Unfortunately, the matter is now out of my hands jurisdictionally, and I am therefore addressing you as the representative of such action on your part as will result in returning the case to this court for retrial.

The letters of Oxman undoubtedly require explanation, and, so far as Mooney is concerned, unquestionably the explanation should be heard by a jury which passes upon the question of guilt or innocence.

I fully appreciate the unusual character of such a request coming from the trial court in any case and I know of no precedent therefor. In the circumstances of this case, I believe that all of us who were participants of the trial concur that right and justice demand that a new trial of Mooney should be had in order that no possible mistake shall be made in a case where a human life is at stake.

Respectfully, yours,

FRANKLIN A. GRIFFIN.

Mr. Webb issued a rather lengthy statement in explanation of his attitude and decision.

The letter written by Superior Judge Franklin A. Griffin, who presided over the trial of Mooney, to the attorney general, urging that a new trial be granted Mooney, is emphasized in the statement.

"In view of these facts, and of these statements and requests so made by the judge who tried the case," says the attorney general, in concluding his statement, "it would seem proper for this office to act in accordance with his suggestion.

"Otherwise this appeal will be decided on the record now on file, which does not include any reference to any of these matters, and should the judgment be affirmed on such record, no opportunity would be presented at any time in this case to have these matters considered and their weight determined. It is as important to the people as to the defendant that such opportunity be afforded.

HAS EXAMINED RECORD.

"I have examined the record on appeal and am not prepared to state that it contains reversible error, and am not disposed to enter confession of error when reversible error does not clearly appear to exist. It would seem, therefore, that the only method by which the result requested by the trial be reversed, and should this court judge can be accomplished is by consent of respondent that the judgment deem it proper to act in accordance with such consent and enter its order reversing the judgment and remanding the cause for a retrial, such trial can be speedily held and all of these matters presented.

WILL SUBSERVE JUSTICE.

"Believing that justice will be subserved by a retrial of this case, as the representative of respondent, I hereby stipulate and consent that the judgment and order heretofore entered in this case by the trial court be reversed and the cause remanded for a trial."

The attorney general's statement is addressed to the Chief Justice and the associate justices of the supreme court. After reciting the facts of the explosion, the indictment, trial, and conviction of Mooney, the attorney general says:

"During said trial one Frank C. Oxman was called on behalf of the prosecution and examined as a witness. The testimony given by said Oxman was both material and relevant, and tended strongly to establish the guilt of the defendant."

[The Bulletin, May 4, 1917.]

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S PROSECUTOR SAYS EVIDENCE WAS AMPLE TO WARRANT INDICTING OF OXMAN.

Judge Robert M. Clarke, appointed as a special investigator by Attorney General Webb to go into every phase of the Oxman perjury expense, stated to the Bulletin to-day that he believed there was ample evidence before the grand jury upon which to return an indictment against Oxman.

Clarke made an unsuccessful attempt to induce the grand jury to delay action until after hearing the story of Estelle Smith. With this, the attitude of the investigation appointed at its request, and without having heard the Smith story, the grand jury last night voted not to indict Oxman.

Judge Clarke authorized the Bulletin to use his statement in regard to the sufficiency of the evidence against Oxman.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIF., November 19, 1918.

Hon. WILLIAM D. STEPHENS,
Governor of California, Sacramento, Calif.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: You may recall, and the record is now before you, that subsequent to the trial of Thomas J. Mooney, and after an appeal from my order denying his motion for a new trial, I addressed a letter to the attorney general, in which I requested him to take such action as would send the Mooney case back to my court to be tried anew.

I believed then that simple justice and fair play demanded such action, and from that position I have never for a moment receded. On the contrary, that stand has been by later developments greatly strengthened, and, if I may, I would trespass upon your valuable time to put before you as briefly as the circumstances will permit the reasons why I so firmly believe a new trial of the Mooney case should be had.

In the trial of Mooney there were four witnesses, and four only, who connected him with the explosion which occurred at Steuart and Market Streets. They were John McDonald, Frank C. Oxman, Mrs. Mellie Edeau and her daughter Sadie. Of these, Oxman and McDonald placed Mooney at the scene of the crime, and the Edeaus testified to his presence at 721 Market Street, from which point, the prosecution avers, Billings, Weinberg, Mooney, and his wife drove in Weinberg's jitney with an unidentified man to the place of the crime.

OXMAN MOST IMPORTANT.

Oxman was by far the most important of these witnesses. His testimony was unshaken on cross-examination, and his very appearance bore out his statement that he was a reputable and prosperous cattle dealer and landowner from the State of Oregon. There is no question but that he made a profound impression upon the jury and upon all those who listened to his story on the witness stand, and there is not the slightest doubt in my mind that the testimony of Oxman was the turning point in the Mooney case, and that he is the pivot around which all the other evidence in the case revolves. It was because of the extreme importance of this witness and his naive simplicity on the witness stand that when the disclosure of the letters he had written to Rigali and his mother, which are before you, was made, I deemed it my duty to address the attorney general as I did.

The testimony of Mrs. Mellie Edeau and her daughter, Sadie Edeau, was, that on the day of the preparedness parade Mooney, Mrs. Mooney, Billings, and Weinberg were together at 721 Market Street, from which point they drove away in the direction of the ferry in Weinberg's automobile jitney. They were the only witnesses who claim to have seen the Mooneys at that point, and their testimony is important in that it corroborates Oxman's statement that the same four people arrived at Steuart and Market Streets in the same conveyance a short time after its departure from the Edeau's observation.

EDEAUS DISCREDITED.

At the trial of Billings the Edeaus did not disclose in their testimony then given that they had seen Mooney and his wife. This in itself was a suspicious circumstance, but as it was developed at Mooney's trial and thus was before the jury for consideration, I do not comment upon it. But the testimony of the Edeaus has now been entirely discredited by Inspector Smith, of the Oakland police department; Capt. Peterson, of the United States Army, former chief of police of Oakland; and Lieut. Goff, of the San Francisco police department. The sworn testimony of these police officials adduced at the trials of the defendants Rena Mooney and Israel Weinberg, before Judge Seawell, of Sonoma County, who presided for Judge Dunne, disclosed that immediately after the tragedy at Steuart and Market Streets the mother called on the Oakland police officials, claimed then that she and her daughter were not at 721 Market Street, but at the scene of the crime, and saw the perpetrators thereof, was brought by Inspector Smith to San Francisco, where she was shown the defendants, who were then under arrest, and in the presence of Smith and Goff was not only unable to identify any of them, but then stated that they were not the guilty parties. It is important to bear in mind that this is the testimony of police officials, whose natural sympathies are not with defendants charged with the commission of such an offense as this, and that because of the very nature of the case, its tremendous importance to the community, and the reputed character of the defendants, they would be unwilling to testify to a single fact or occurrence of which they were not absolutely certain.

M'DONALD UNRELIABLE.

I do not intend to state the testimony of John McDonald. It is brief and doubtless will receive the careful analysis of yourself or your secretary. I do not hesitate to say, however, that in my judgment McDonald is unworthy of belief, and in view of two indisputable facts which are established beyond all peradventure of a doubt, his testimony is worthless. These are, first, the time of the explosion, 2.06 p. m.; and second, the time Mooney is first shown on the roof of the Eilers Building, 1.58 p. m. The first of these facts is established by Capt. Duncan Matheson, in charge of the bomb case; the second by the photograph, subsequently enlarged, taken by the young man employed by the Eilers Music Co. Bearing these facts in mind, the testimony of McDonald demonstrates its own falsity and is itself unanswerable evidence that what he claimed to have seen could not have occurred.

Since the trial of Mooney two other of the bomb defendants have been tried in another department of this court, and each has been acquitted of the charge. In these trials McDonald and Mrs. Edeau and her daughter have been witnesses. Oxman has never been produced. There were submitted to each of the juries in these cases all of the matters which have been developed since the trial of Thomas J. Mooney, except, of course, the Oxman letters, with the result above indicated.

CONVICTED BY LIES.

The situation of Mooney is that he stands condemned to death upon evidence concerning the truth of which, to say the least, there has arisen a very grave doubt. Since his trial facts and circumstances have come to light which seriously reflect upon the credibility of three of the four witnesses who link him with the crime of preparedness day, and which shake the very foundation of the case upon which the people rely for his conviction.

The highest courts in the State and Nation have declared themselves to be without power to relieve him. Upon the shoulders of the Chief Executive, therefore, rests this great responsibility.

It was my judgment and opinion that Mooney should receive a new trial upon the Oxman letters alone. In that judgment and opinion I was not alone, for upon examination of the record the attorney general concurred therein and stipulated in open court that the case should be reversed. The supreme court of the State held, however, that it was without power to act upon such a stipulation in a criminal case.

Since the Oxman revelation many other circumstances, these few of which I have vainly attempted to skeletonize, have arisen, which have strengthened and made more firm my belief that to carry into execution the judgment now existent against Mooney would be a travesty upon justice and a blot upon the administration of justice which this State can not afford to bear.

NO PERSONAL INTEREST.

I have no personal interest in Thomas J. Mooney, but I have a deep personal interest in the case of The People against Thomas J. Mooney, not because I was the judge who presided at its trial and pronounced the judgment, but because, firstly, there is a human life involved, and, secondly, inseparable from the case, there is the great principle upon which this Government rests, that no man, whatever his condition, position, conviction, or belief may be, shall be denied justice.

A GRAVE MATTER.

In conclusion, let me apologize for the extreme length of this letter. The gravity of the case is alone my excuse for burdening you. I have not touched upon the many circumstances which to-day are matters of common knowledge and public notoriety, and which add enormously to the total of doubt and uncertainty now surrounding the result of Mooney's trial, but have merely dwelt upon these indisputable outstanding facts, themselves now matters of public record, and I can only say, as I said to Gen. Webb, that right and justice demand a new trial for Thomas J. Mooney, in order that these facts, so material and of such importance to the issue of his guilt or innocence, and unavailable to him at the time of his trial, may be presented to a jury for consideration and determination.

Yours, very respectfully, FRANKLIN A. GRIFFIN.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is recognized for 15 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the House is interested in finding out the author or authors of an anonymous attack upon any Member of the House of Representatives for doing what he thought was his duty according to his conscience.

Who are the men who sent the anonymous letters? Ignatius McCarty and George Parson are two of them of whom the gentleman from California speaks and whose names he gives. Ignatius McCarty and George Parson! Why did not the gentleman from California tell you that these are the two men who on behalf of John B. Densmore placed in the office of the district attorney of California a dictograph machine? For what purpose? To help the district attorney enforce the law? No; for the purpose of framing up on law and order of California in the hope of freeing a convicted anarchist from just punishment of the law. But when these men were brought before the grand jury of California they pleaded their privilege not to testify because their testimony, forsooth, would incriminate them with a felony. And these are the men who, according to their own report, attempted a frame up on a Member of Congress.

The gentleman takes much pleasure in telling you that in signing the fictitious name of C. H. Matthews to a communication to try and get it through, George Parson went down to the Capitol Park Hotel in Washington and registered, if you please, under the fictitious name of C. H. Matthews. And you applaud him for it because some of you are incensed against the gentleman from Texas.

I knew when I started the fight in behalf of law and order that would prevent the kind of happenings that have disgraced Boston and this Nation in the last few days that I was going up against the biggest power in the United States.

I am able to stand your gaffs. Stick them in me. I want to say to my colleagues that if by giving up my life to-day I could preserve this Republic from what is staring us in the face—lawlessness and anarchy if we go further in our actions as we have done in the past—I would willingly give my life to preserve this Republic from such disgraceful scenes as happened in Boston when the police, officers like you and me, gave over that great city to the thugs and lawbreakers, and in one night $300,000 worth of property was destroyed, and innocent women were attacked.

Now, was I misled by these letters?

The gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] seems to think that I had no other source of information. Why, I call your attention to Mr. Burroughs, an employee of this Government to-day, an auditor, if you please, in the Shipping Board, who said what? Here is where the third conspirator comes in. Who was the third conspirator who appeared in that press gallery with George Parson, the dictograph man, and tried to get the newspapers to publish this libel in the papers, which they refused to do—and yet you gentlemen are willing to let it go into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD? The newspapers refused to publish it. Who was he? It was Luther C. Steward, if you please, the president of the Employees' Union in Washington. What did the auditor in the Shipping Board testify? The auditor said that although drawing $2,750 from the Employees' Union, at the same time this Luther C. Steward, under Mr. Densmore, was drawing $3,500 a year as an assistant director in the Employment Service, and that his station was in Washington, and that during the last six months of last year, when he was not entitled to a per diem or to traveling expenses, the vouchers, the exact numbers of which he gave you, showed that during the last six months of last year Luther C. Steward drew from the people's Treasury of this Nation over $100 per month in traveling expenses, in addition to his big salary and his $4 per diem. They are the conspirators.

Why, when I got this letter telling me they would bring me files if I would answer this telegram, my secretary, who sits in that gallery, will tell you that immediately upon that letter being shown me I said, "There is just one of two things; this is either some ignorant employee down there who has not got bat sense, or else it is a frame up." My secretary said, "Are not you going to answer it?" I said, "Yes; we will see who is behind this; we will find out whether it is real, and I am satisfied it is not; we will find out, and if it is not real, who is behind it." Did I ask him for the files? No; I had that answer framed. I merely asked him for copies—copies which I had the right to have. If anything is going on wrong in a department of your Government, and a man sends you an anonymous letter and tells you what is going on, and tells you he can show it to you by the records, and you have been making an investigation of such matters, are you going to sit still and pay no attention to it? I have been trying for months to get this Congress to make an investigation of that department, and I can not get a committee to order an investigation. Why? Let the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] answer that question to the people of this Nation, because he is in the majority party in Congress. Why? I have shown you by the testimony of Mr. Burroughs, an honored auditor, who testified before the Joint Labor Committee of the House and Senate, that hundreds of thousands of dollars in Densmore's department have been misapplied and wasted.

I showed you by the evidence of Stanley R. Linn, a Royal Arch Mason, who testified before that committee, that it was the most wasteful and extravagant department of the Government that he had ever seen, who gave instance after instance where money was misapplied and wasted and squandered, and what happened to Mr. Linn? Within three days after he testified before that committee he was called before Mr. Densmore, and cursed like a dog and fired from his position. That is what Congress is standing behind. Why? God knows, if the Department of Labor is so intrenched by such a labor power that it is more powerful than Congress, when it can turn down our requests for information—God knows we ought to be held responsible to the people of this country.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In a moment. Was I taken in by this? Why, they speak of this Cobb report in Texas. If you get that report of the Secretary of Labor, which gave me that Cobb account and gave it to you, you will find out this report brought to light the very facts I wanted to bring to light, to wit, that Cobb was spending the money of the people for nothing; that he jumped from Washington to Texas by way of Detroit, Mich.

He went 500 miles out of his way on the way to Texas, and then jumped straight to San Antonio, in the southwest portion of Texas. Then the Secretary of Labor said there were no instructions sent him. That was the only thing asked for—the instructions sent him. The Secretary of Labor said there were no instructions sent him. Get this Cobb's report of his expense account, and in that very report you will see that Cobb himself says that he bought transportation to one place in Texas on June 5, and then, because of instructions he received, he changed his itinerary, cashed in that railroad transportation, and bought other; and then where did he go? He went straight from Houston, Tex., to Abilene, Tex., my home, my little home city out there, where he stayed two whole days, and for what purpose? I introduced here the record of newspapers the other day, at least two of them, showing that from the time Cobb reached Texas until he left it was one attack upon me after another.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield, although I hope the gentleman will get me a little more time.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. I voted for a certain resolution introduced by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]—I think it is the one to which the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] referred—in absolute good faith, as did the great majority of the membership of this House, because the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] stated he knew the alleged facts to be absolutely true and correct.

Mr. BLANTON. I am coming to that.

Mr. GOODWIN of Arkansas. The gentleman just stated that he thought this letter was a frame up, and yet he answered it, he says, in order to ascertain the facts. Why did the gentleman, following that letter, state upon the floor of the House that he knew these allegations to be absolutely true and correct, thus—I will not say deceiving—misleading the membership of the House to vote for his resolution?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am glad the gentleman has said that, because the gentleman has assumed just what the gentleman from California [Mr. NOLAN] assumed, that I did not have anything else to base my resolution on except this one anonymous letter. The gentleman does not know. He talks about my being the friend of Welsh, District Attorney Fickert, and others. I never saw Welsh or Fickert in my life. And I have never represented a corporate interest in my life. I have had communications with them. They furnished me with some very valuable information. I had a communication with Welsh about whether or not he had been investigated, and I have his letter stating that parties called on him in his office in Philadelphia, carrying out and bolstering up the statement made in this letter. The gentleman talks about my not having any further information. I wish to God you would give me a committee that will listen to this testimony and not rule it out, like the Committee on Labor did. The gentleman says I criticized the Committee on Labor. I only criticized it for not letting me put my evidence in. Whenever I offered something detrimental to the Labor Department, when I offered to put that in the RECORD, objection was raised by the gentleman from California and others, and they threw my evidence out. That was the only objection I made. I was criticizing the fact that a Member of Congress could not get evidence before a committee; that is the only fact. Now, so far as these fellows running from San Francisco to Los Angeles, I have statement after statement from witnesses showing that the whole investigation out there was nothing in the world but an attempt to free Mooney from a just punishment, and that money in large sums of this Government was wasted, extravagantly wasted, thrown away, by the employees, lots of them on pleasure trips and lots on joy trips. I did not know the names of the various parties. Mr. Ignatius McCarty and Mr. George Parson were two of them, because the grand jury had those men before them. He talks about Mr. Fremont Older. I furnished to the committee, to which the gentleman from California refers, if you will read it, the testimony from Fremont Older given before the grand jury. The grand jury foreman sent me that in order to give you the benefit of it, and you will see whether Mr. Fremont Older is sympathetic with anarchists or not. Read his testimony. Why, he absolutely refused to answer question after question asked him by the grand jury. And yet there is the testimony, and from a little editorial in his paper, which he wrote himself, that I put in the RECORD, you will see that very Mooney report which he published in his paper on November 1, 1918, was given to him by John B. Densmore himself.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, may I proceed for two more minutes?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to speak for two minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, unless the gentleman will yield to me for a question in connection with a statement that he has made about the police strike in Boston, I shall object.

Mr. WALSH. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9205, and, pending the motion, I desire to see if we can not agree upon time for general debate. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the time for general debate be limited to three hours, half to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and the remaining half by myself. I hope the gentleman will agree to that because——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to three hours, half to be controlled by himself and half by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. GOOD. And the debate be limited to the bill and subjects of Government finance.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, may I say to the gentleman I have only three requests on this side by gentlemen who wish to discuss other matters outside of this bill.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I shall desire five minutes.

Mr. GOOD. Then I ask that the time be limited to three hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Tennessee and one-half to be controlled by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Reserving the right to object, could the gentleman make it three and a half hours? I have another request.

Mr. GOOD. I will say to the gentleman I have had a number of requests. I have talked with gentlemen on this side who are anxious to expedite the business of the House, and I have declined other requests excepting on matters touching the bill or on Government finance. I have had requests for two hours of time, and I have declined at the request of men who are anxious that this bill shall become a law as soon as possible, and I hope the gentleman will agree to the three-hour limit.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I will say, Mr. Speaker, I think if I may be given the privilege of controlling the time on this side I can comply with the requests already made, but I can not take care of any other requests.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9205, the first deficiency bill, with Mr. WALSH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9205, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9205) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and prior fiscal years, and for other purposes.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to dispensing with the first reading of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, before taking up the items in the bill I desire to discuss in a general way the Government's finances. A few weeks ago I made a statement as to the appropriations for this fiscal year. I realized then, as I do now, that any statement of appropriations in these times gives one a very inaccurate and maybe an erroneous conception of the drafts to be made upon the Treasury during the fiscal year for which the appropriations are made. The expenditures during these obnormal times bear but a remote relation to the appropriations for the fiscal year. Formerly and during times of peace the difference between appropriations and actual expenditures for a fiscal year was negligible. Not so now. During 1917–18 we appropriated billions of dollars that could not be paid out during those years. These appropriations were made in anticipation of entering into contracts for ordnance and war material. Deliveries of war material and equipment ordered in 1917 and 1918 are now being made and are being paid for out of appropriations previously made.

Imagine my surprise when, a few days ago, I saw in the public press the statement which I made with regard to appropriations for this fiscal year being used as indicating the amount that would be drawn out of the Treasury of the United States during this fiscal year.

During the past few months an army of officers in the War and Navy Departments have been at work on canceling contracts and making settlements of Government obligations. Six months ago 27,500 separate contracts for supplies in the War Department remained to be adjusted. Settlements on these contracts have been made until there remain but 5,500 unsettled contracts. The work along this line has progressed to a point where those charged with the adjustment of these contracts feel that they can with some degree of accuracy estimate the drafts which these obligations will make upon the Treasury during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920.

The demands upon the Treasury call for an expenditure of money during this fiscal year that is simply staggering. The actual condition confronting the Treasury is so alarming that we may well pause and calmly consider obligations already existing and that must be met before entering on enlarged programs which will call for additional expenditures. During the past week the House passed two important bills, one giving a justifiable increase to postal employees, and the other giving additional compensation under the war-risk insurance act. Yet these bills, calling for an expenditure of approximately $125,000,000 annually, have not been taken into consideration in the figures I have given, nor have I taken into consideration the amount carried in the pending bill.

I have them here on this chart, the appropriations for the fiscal year of 1920. [Indicating.] There are appropriated: Department of Agriculture, $33,899,761; Army, $772,324,877.50; Diplomatic and Consular Service, $9,843,661.67; District of Columbia, $15,364,421; fortifications, $11,214,291; Indian affairs, $11,131,397.03; legislative, executive, and judicial act, $97,963,831.77; Military Academy, $2,277,932.20; naval affairs, $616,096,838.88; pensions, $215,030,000; post offices and post roads, $609,466,149; rivers and harbors, $33,378,364; sundry civil appropriation bill, $607,160,207.95, making a total of regular annual appropriations of $3,035,151,733.

There should be added to that the aggregate of appropriations for deficiency for that fiscal year, as follows: Second deficiency bill of $292,714,084.71, third deficiency bill of $24,325,929.40, the war-risk and pension deficiency bills, of $45,044,500, the railroad deficiency bill of $750,000,000, expenses incident to the first session of the Sixty-sixth Congress of $385,720, or a total carried in the deficiency appropriation acts of $1,112,470,234.11.

The appropriations for this fiscal year carried in the miscellaneous acts are as follows:

The wheat guaranty, $1,000,000,000; the relief in Europe, $100,000,000; the Public Health Service, for hospitals, $9,835,333; vocational rehabilitation, $6,000,000; the revenue act, $7,525,000; and sundry miscellaneous acts of $348,103.47, making a total of miscellaneous appropriations of $1,123,708,436.47.

In addition to this there are the permanent and indefinite appropriations, as follows: Interest on the public debt, $1,000,000,000; miscellaneous; public-debt redemption fund, the 5 per cent redemption fund carried in the revenue act, $964,020,000; miscellaneous, permanent, and indefinite appropriations, $85,266,880; additional compensation for the Government employees, or what is known as the bonus provision, $25,000,000; a total of permanent and indefinite appropriations of $2,074,288,880, making a grand total of appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, of $7,345,617,283.58.

Mr. KELLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOOD. I would rather not until I have explained the charts. Then I shall be glad to yield for any question.

I wish we might stop here, but we can not. The chart up to this point gives a very inadequate—yes; an erroneous—idea of what the obligations of the Government are that must be paid out of the Treasury during this fiscal year. In the first place, it contains items that will not be paid out of the Treasury during this fiscal year, and, in the second place, it fails to contain items that were appropriated for in previous years but which will be paid for during this fiscal year.

I desire now to invite your attention to chart No. 2, which shows the estimated requirements for the fiscal year 1920 that must be met. You will observe that I have taken, to commence with, the grand total of the appropriations carried on the first chart, of $7,345,617,283.58. From that there are certain deductions. I have deducted those items which it has been estimated by the various departments will not be expended during this fiscal year, for one cause or another. For example, in the permanent and indefinite appropriations is an item of $964,020,000, known as the 5 per cent redemption fund. This fund was intended to be drawn upon in the purchase and redemption of Government bonds. The Secretary of the Treasury does not intend to use that fund in the purchase or redemption of bonds or in stabilizing the bond market. He proposes whenever he purchases a bond to redeem that bond; but he will pay the money out of the Treasury, and in order to get the money in the Treasury with which to buy the bonds he proposes to issue a 90-day note of the Government. So it is fair to say that that amount should in all fairness be deducted.

But in deducting it here I wish to refer to the item, certificate of indebtedness, $3,634,000,000 issue certificate of indebtedness in order to purchase Government bonds. That item may be largely increased, which in the end would only add to our deficit.

The Army and the Navy Departments both figure that they will not spend during the fiscal year all of the appropriations made for this fiscal year. And that is perfectly natural. They are purchasing certain things during this fiscal year that may not be delivered until July or August of next year, or even later. So, too, they will issue checks before the 1st day of July, during the month of June, and those checks by the very nature of things, going out through the hands of various disbursing officers, do not reach the Treasury until after the 1st day of July. And so the money will not be paid out during this fiscal year.

The War Department estimates that about $193,352,809.72 of their appropriation will not be paid out, and the Navy Department estimates that $205,365,613.88 of the appropriation for this fiscal year will not be paid out during the fiscal year. And therefore I have taken the exact figures estimated by the War and the Navy Departments, that will not be drawn out of the Treasury, and that were appropriated for this fiscal year, to wit, $398,718,423.60, as a deduction.

As to the deficiency appropriations for 1919, it is estimated that $250,000,000 carried in the deficiency bills were paid out during the last fiscal year and before the 1st day of July of this year. That being true, of course it is not a charge on the Treasury and can not be made as an offset against the revenue that will come into the Treasury during this fiscal year. It was paid out before the beginning of the fiscal year and therefore should be deducted, although it was an appropriation made for the fiscal year. In many cases these deficiency appropriations were made immediately available. They were paid out immediately to the extent indicated before the 1st day of July.

The Post Office appropriation bill carried an item for good roads of $78,000,000, to be paid out by express terms in 1921. So the total of these four items, aggregating $1,690,738,423.60, should be deducted from the total of appropriations for the fiscal year, in order that we may ascertain how much of the appropriations for this fiscal year will be actually drawn out of the Treasury during the fiscal year.

We thus find that the net cash withdrawals from the Treasury under the 1920 appropriations amount to $5,654,878,859.98—a stupendous sum, a sum more than five times the amount annually appropriated and expended for all the departments of the Government prior to 1917. And yet that sum is only a little more than one-half the actual demands which the various departments estimate will be made and drawn from the Treasury of the United States during this fiscal year.

For example, the War Department—and the withdrawals from that department will be larger than those from any other department out of appropriations made for previous fiscal years—the War Department now owes the Shipping Board $155,000,000 for shipping and for the transportation of troops on the sea. That work has been done by the Shipping Board, and the War Department must pay the bill, and expects to pay it. Out of previous and continued appropriations, appropriations largely carried in the fortification bills for the fiscal years 1917 and 1918, the War Department estimates it will pay this year $577,000,000. This money is required to pay for the delivery of ordnance, for shot and shell and war material of many kinds.

The War Department owes, or will owe, the Railroad Administration for the transportation of troops and supplies in continental United States during the year $80,000,000 in excess of any appropriation carried for this purpose in an appropriation act for this fiscal year, and this sum will be paid out of appropriations previously made.

The War Department estimates that it will pay for foreign liquidations, mostly in France, $150,000,000. This does not take into consideration the sale recently made by the War Department to the Government of France for something over $400,000,000 of supplies and plants and docks and other property that the Government of the United States had in France and sold to the Government of France. For that property we have agreed to take the obligations, the bonds, of the Republic of France. But I am advised by the War Department that we owe vast sums to our Allies, especially in France, to individuals and corporations, and that the total which we will be compelled to pay to France and to Italy and to England will approximate $150,000,000, and that that sum will all be paid during this fiscal year. The $400,000,000 before referred to still will be owing to the United States. There was no deduction or striking of a balance in making that settlement.

Six months ago the War Department had 27,500 contracts for ordnance and war materials that were undisposed of and unsettled. In most cases the contracts had either been wholly terminated or terminated in part. In most cases there is involved the damages that we would have to pay because of the cancellation of the contracts. Twenty-two thousand of the twenty-seven thousand five hundred contracts have already been adjusted. There remains 5,500 contracts that have to be settled and adjusted. The War Department, basing its conclusion on the settlement of 27,000 contracts, estimates that it will require $200,000,000 to make settlement of the remaining 5,500 terminated contracts.

Then the War Department carries into its miscellaneous account items for the purchase of odds and ends, some of them in contracts, covering a wide variety of items, and estimates that out of appropriations previously made they will pay during the fiscal year for miscellaneous items $150,000,000 under that heading, making a total that the War Department will pay out of the Treasury from appropriations made prior to the appropriations of this year of $1,312,000,000.

The Navy Department has arrived at its conclusion in the same way, and estimates that it will be compelled to pay this year out of the Treasury from appropriations made in previous years $600,000,000. These figures are not my figures. They are the estimates of the departments of the Government; and while I might take issue with some policy adopted, and might take issue with some of the results, I do feel that these figures have been arrived at by the officials in those respective departments after a most thorough and painstaking examination, and in the main they are conservative and can be relied upon as conservative estimates.

The various bond acts authorized loans to be made to our Allies during the war to the extent of $10,000,000,000. The advances made to the allied countries under this authorization to June 30, 1919, totaled $9,102,285,015.56. The credits established up to September 4, 1919, aggregated $9,684,272,567.84, leaving a balance of the credit to the allied nations established and to draw against in the fiscal year 1920 of $581,987,552.28. Of this amount $188,925,945.99 has been advanced between June 30 and September 11, 1919, leaving a balance of the credit already established, which will be drawn out before the end of the fiscal year 1920, of $393,061,606.29. There still remains a balance of the authorization which may be allotted and withdrawn during the year of $315,727,432.16; but this latter contingency I have not considered at all.

I understand it is the purpose and the thought of the Treasury Department that it will be necessary to make additional loans, and that the full amount carried in the revenue act of $10,000,000,000 will before the year, or shortly thereafter, be loaned and paid out to the allied Governments. But in making this statement I have taken the amount that has been credited at this time; and if the Treasury Department shall in the future make additional credits and advancements to the allied Governments in excess of this amount they will only serve to swell the deficit that will confront the country at the end of the year.

There was outstanding on June 30, 1919, $3,640,000,000 worth of Government obligations maturing in the main every three months; short-time certificates of indebtedness, issued by the Secretary of the Treasury, which must be paid out as they mature. The balance in the Treasury on June 30 was $1,251,664,827. You can not use, I am advised by the Secretary, all of that balance to retire the certificates of indebtedness. The Secretary of the Treasury states that the least amount that the Treasury can operate on as a working capital is $300,000,000; that that amount ought to be in the Treasury of the United States in order that it can function in a proper way and pay the bills as they are presented to the Treasury. Therefore, if we subtract the $300,000,000 of working capital from the $1,251,000,000 in the Treasury, we have, with which to pay the $3,634,000,000 of certificates of indebtedness, only $951,664,827, leaving a balance of unpaid certificates which must be paid in some way of $2,682,335,173, making a grand total of the cash requirements of the Government of the United States that must be paid out of the Treasury of the United States before June 30 next of $10,831,201,585.26.

Now, where are we going to get the money with which to pay this stupendous sum? The figures are so staggering, and the situation is so critical, and it so appeals to the business judgment of every man, that it has seemed to me that while we are passing bills every day that sooner or later will call for money out of the Treasury we could well stop to-day for a few minutes and study these figures.

We may well consider as a business proposition the question where the Government is to get the money with which to pay this indebtedness. This deficit does not take into consideration the bill we passed the other day increasing postal salaries, which will call for about $50,000,000 during the year. It does not in any respect take into consideration the very meritorious bill we passed the other day amending the war-risk insurance act, taking $75,000,000 more out of the Treasury of the United States. It does not take into account this pending bill, carrying over $14,000,000. The money will have to be paid; and just as we pass these bills, just in the proportion that we legislate carrying provisions that will result in a charge upon the Government of the United States, just to that extent we add to that total of $10,831,000,000 of cash requirement that must be paid out of the Treasury of the United States during the year.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Our revenue law of last year provides for $4,000,000,000 for 1920. Secretary of the Treasury Glass has repeatedly stated that we have issued our last bonds. The $4,000,000,000 under the revenue act, together with the other figures given by the gentleman, would amount to only $5,250,000,000 with which to pay all this money. How are we going to get the money to meet these bills without another bond issue?

Mr. GOOD. I think the Secretary of the Treasury has been misquoted in the statement that there would not be another bond loan floated. What he did say was that there would not be another popular loan, but that in all probability it might be necessary to sell additional bonds. That is the statement that the Secretary of the Treasury has made to me, and I think there is nothing secret about it. I think he has made it generally to Members of the House that in all likelihood in order to meet this draft it might and probably would be necessary to float additional bonds.

Mr. GARNER. Is it not also a fact that he is now selling certificates of indebtedness, which come due in December, 1920?

Mr. GOOD. I do not know about that. I did not know he was selling certificates maturing so far in the future.

Mr. GARNER. That is the statement of the Treasury Department, that they are issuing two classes of certificates, one bearing 4¼ per cent interest, due in six months, and the other bearing 4½ per cent interest and due in December, 1920.

Mr. LONGWORTH. If the statement of the gentleman from Texas is correct, does not the gentleman think that the financing of a total obligation of $10,000,000,000 by something over $4,000,000,000 worth of Treasury certificates is not very good financing for the future?

Mr. GOOD. I certainly think so.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield? If that is not good financing, I think it is up to the gentleman from Ohio and his committee to suggest a better method by which these obligations can be financed.

Mr. GOOD. What I am trying to say to-day is this, that I do not think it is good finance to add another dollar to the burden of the Government in the way of appropriations if we can avoid it, because with every dollar we add we only increase the burden upon the American people and we will only help increase in the long run the high cost of living, as I shall try to explain presently.

Mr. GARNER. I am very much in agreement with the gentleman on that theory, but when the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] makes the charge of bad financing, I think it is up to him to suggest a better method of financing.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will make a very brief answer to the gentleman from Texas, if the gentleman from Iowa will permit. The gentleman from Texas has not forgotten that the Committee on Ways and Means that was controlled by a majority of his party left to us a legacy of reduced revenue rather than increased revenue.

Mr. GARNER. Yes; but the Congress is in session, and you can change that tax bill very easily.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I simply want to remind the gentleman that it was his side of the House that was responsible for the reduced revenue.

Mr. GOOD. I am trying to present a business proposition, free from every partisan tinge or political considerations.

[Applause.] This $10,831,201,585 must be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, and whether or not we are to put new legislation on the statute books is a matter for subsequent consideration. I certainly hope our financing may be accomplished without laying new taxes, and if we will only keep our heads we may within a year or two reduce some taxes now on the books. It depends all on economy in administration and in judicious appropriations.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations yield for a question?

Mr. GOOD. For a brief question.

Mr. KNUTSON. I notice from the chart which the gentleman has presented here that $9,641,000,000 has been advanced in loans to the Allies. How much longer does this Government contemplate making advances to the Allies?

Mr. GOOD. I have already explained that the total amount of advances to the Allies which had been authorized was $10,000,000,000, and that up to September 4, 1919, we had advanced $9,641,000,000, leaving over $300,000,000 yet to be advanced if it was desired to advance it.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. HICKS. The tremendous amounts brought to our attention by the gentleman are startling, but in the items we had one amount of $1,000,000,000 to guarantee the price of wheat. Is there not very great possibility that that will not be expended?

Mr. GOOD. I will speak of that in a minute.

Mr. WELLING. In connection with the gentleman's statement about loans to the Allies, I would like to ask whether or not the interest is being paid on those loans.

Mr. GOOD. I will get to that in a moment. That properly comes under the next chart.

I have here a third chart of the estimated revenue for the fiscal year of 1920. These, too, are figures for which I am not responsible, except to a limited extent. I think one item is a little different from those furnished me, which I will explain hereafter. The internal revenue receipts is estimated for the year at $4,940,000,000. That amount, it is estimated, will come in during the year. Gentlemen will understand that a part of the tax of 1918 is paid into this year, and the two last items for this year will go into next year's receipts. It is estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury that $4,940,000,000 will come in during the year. Those are the same figures that were furnished the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] and placed in the RECORD with the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury under the date of July 25.

Customs duties, $260,000,000; public lands, $3,000,000; miscellaneous, including war sales, and so forth, $600,000,000.

My recollection is that the original estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury as furnished in the letter to Mr. GARNER estimated that such receipts would be $300,000,000. Since the letter was written the Secretary of War, or Gen. Lord, the head of the Finance Department of the War Department, has sold $140,000,000 worth of wool, while he has $80,000,000 more of wool which he expects to sell in the near future, making $220,000,000 of receipts from that source alone.

I think the Secretary of War would agree that those figures are conservative. I would place it at more than that. I think the sales ought to proceed with greater rapidity than they have. We ought to sell things that the War and Navy Departments have no military use for, and we ought to sell them as quickly as possible, not only to relieve the condition of the Treasury, but because if sold to-day they will bring more money than if we sell them to-morrow. [Applause.] But I do not care to bear on that question. I only refer to it to explain the increase and my reasons for it.

I believe that when the year is ended it will show that that amount has been received by the Treasury for such purpose. Perhaps my statement in this respect is a little misleading. The item does include something more than war sales. It includes a great many minor receipts.

Now, the Treasury Department is soon to receive the balance due on the Victory loan. In a few days it will receive $1,032,000,000, which is the last installment on that loan. It is also estimated that we will receive from the Postal Service during the year $404,928,240, making a grand total of receipts from all sources of $7,239,928,240.

Mr. GARNER rose.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Before the gentleman leaves those figures I would like to have a little more information as to how the first item was arrived at.

Mr. GOOD. Let me conclude, and then I will yield to both gentlemen on that subject.

Now, I do not mean to say that those are all the sources of revenue of the Government. The Government has some assets from which revenue may be reasonably expected. For example, we appropriated, as shown by the chart, $1,000,000,000 for wheat. Five hundred million dollars was appropriated for the War Finance Corporation, $150,000,000 to the United States Grain Corporation, $67,500,000 to the United States Housing Corporation. We have appropriated $1,250,000,000 for the Railroad Administration and $2,847,701,000 for the United States Shipping Board, the Emergency Fleet Corporation.

From all of these sources, save two, we can not expect to receive very much money during this fiscal year. I am satisfied that there will be paid back to the Treasury during the year approximately all of the billion-dollar wheat guaranty fund. That fund is not being drawn on to any very great extent, and the sales so far made are for cash; but if, perchance, in the administration of that fund we should commence to sell wheat for credit to the countries of Europe, and those charged with the administration of that fund claim that they have that authority, it is possible that some of it will be tied up for years, and some of it will not come back for a long time, if ever. We ought to get back in all reasonable probability a billion dollars from that wheat guaranty fund. We ought to get back not a large amount, but something, from the $67,500,000 Housing Corporation.

The amount that we will receive from the sale of the housing property will not be large, because the total amount appropriated is only $67,500,000.

We have appropriated $1,250,000,000 for railroads. If we turn the railroads back the first of the year, our loss in operating the roads will total approximately $750,000,000. The $500,000,000 additional appropriation will not come back during the next year except possibly a few small loans. Some of the loans made by the Railroad Administration are long-time loans, and it was the statement of Mr. Sherley, who has gone into this matter very carefully since he has been connected with the Railroad Administration, that many of these loans, while thought to be good and would come back, would not be paid off within the next few years.

So far as the Shipping Board is concerned, we will do well if during the next two years we sell enough shipping to pay for completing vessels under contract and that are authorized. I do not expect to see a policy adopted or carried out in regard to this investment that will bring a dollar into the Treasury of the United States during the next two years that can be used for general purposes. All of that will be necessary to carry on that work. So, therefore, the only sources I can see where we will get any money into the Treasury from these assets is from the wheat-guaranty fund and some from the War Finance Corporation, but not very much, because that agency is to be used for purchasing bonds for stabilization of Government bonds, and some from the United States Housing Corporation. Some of the War Finance Corporation's funds are tied up in loans and it is not estimated by the Secretary of the Treasury that we can look to that fund to any great extent, if at all, for relief.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Why can we not get some money back out of the $150,000,000 Grain Corporation fund?

Mr. GOOD. I was coming to that. I was about to say that that leaves but one fund, and that is a fund of $150,000,000 in the United States Grain Corporation. I am not sure whether or not we will get back all of the billion dollars. I am afraid that before the year ends, when we get into the cold months of the winter and hunger threatens some of the countries of Europe, we may do just what we did last year and commence to sell grain on credit, if not give it away, and I think the gentleman will agree with me when I say that we can not with certainty count on all of the billion dollars being returned, and we ought not to figure on very much as coming out of the $150,000,000 Grain Corporation fund in cash. There are so many contingencies. We all will be pleased to see it all returned this year, but is it safe to count on it with certainty? In his letter to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], the Secretary of the Treasury did not regard it would with certainty be returned this year. There are a lot of little items that might in a way change the total here and there, but after carefully studying these estimates I am firmly convinced that we will be indeed fortunate if we get more than a billion and one hundred million dollars from these assets, leaving, therefore, statements standing of total requirements for the year of $10,831,201,585.26, with total revenues of only $7,229,928,240, leaving a deficit staring us in the face on June 30 next of $3,591,273,345.26, with probable contingency of getting $1,100,000,000, leaving an actual deficit in the Treasury of the United States on June 30 next of $2,491,273,345.26.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. GOOD. Yes.
Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman's statement is very illuminating and tremendously interesting, but some of the items that he has been later referring to are not items that can be regarded as permanent revenues of the Government.
Mr. GOOD. No. I do not insert them in the chart because of that fact. They depend on contingencies.
Mr. LONGWORTH. I want to call attention to that particular phase of this subject. In fact, the only items on the gentleman's chart of estimated revenues which are permanent in their nature are the first two items, the essential return from the present revenue law and the return from customs and the Postal Service, which leaves a considerable margin to fill. It makes it all the more important that we should analyze the first item the gentleman has there of estimated returns from the present revenue law for the fiscal year 1920 of $4,940,000,000. Has the gentleman taken into consideration the fact that half of the return, the taxation return for the year 1920, will be an automatic reduction of the present law of 25 per cent?
Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, in that respect the gentleman knows the estimate of the Treasury is that for the last half of last year we would receive $2,000,000,000, and that would apply to this fiscal year—but that only related to income and excess profits and did not include miscellaneous items—and that for this year, not counting the two last installments of excess profits and income taxes, we would collect $2,940,000,000. As to that I have made some inquiry. I can only accept the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury and the experts. I am told that the monthly collections, so far as those other items are concerned, excluding excess profits and income taxes are running pretty close to the Treasury's estimate. I have no way of knowing, but I think we can perhaps rely upon the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, who says that because of his experience in collecting these taxes and their running so closely with the estimates he has not found any reason to change his estimate of $4,940,000,000.
Mr. LONGWORTH. I sincerely trust the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury is correct, but in view of the fact that, as the gentleman states, this reduction applies to income and excess profits taxes and that those are practically the entire return or very much the preponderating return, and further that this bill now in existence was designed not to produce more than $4,000,000,000 at the outside, and in view of the further fact that the estimate there was not allowed the probable reduction from the loss of taxes on liquor, due to the prohibition act, it would seem very extraordinary to me if the present revenue law, when the automatic reductions take effect, which were recommended by Mr. McAdoo shortly before his retirement from the Treasury, will produce at the outside $3,250,000,000. I fear that estimate of the Treasury Department is very much in excess of what the actual returns will be.
Mr. GOOD. If it is, it only serves to accentuate what I have been trying to show, which is the tremendous problem that faces the Government of the United States in financing its maturing contracts and short-time certificates.
Mr. LONGWORTH. Unquestionably, and it is for that reason that I am supporting the argument of the gentleman from Iowa. On this revenue question, let me for a moment state a little history—and I think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] will correct me if I am wrong. The Treasury Department at the outset insisted that the Ways and Means Committee bring in a revenue bill which would raise not less than $8,000,000,000. The work of the Ways and Means Committee, therefore, was to bring in this bill. We brought it in, and this House passed it. Not long after that, however, shortly after the armistice was signed, the Treasury Department through Mr. McAdoo recommended that the amount be reduced so as to raise not to exceed $6,000,000,000. A little later than that the Secretary of the Treasury, then Mr. McAdoo, appeared before the Ways and Means Committee and said it would not be necessary after the fiscal year 1919 to raise by taxation more than $4,000,000,000, and recommended that the taxes should be automatically reduced 25 per cent. At that time I took the position, and a good many others did, that it was extremely inadvisable, in view of the fact of how difficult it was to estimate the necessary expenditures for the fiscal year 1920, to undertake at that time any reduction of taxation.
The statement of the gentleman from Iowa to-day seems to me to abundantly demonstrate the accuracy of that statement. It is perfectly apparent, as the gentleman from Iowa says, that even if his estimates of the present law will raise as much as $4,920,000,000 there is still going to be a deficit of something over three and a half billion dollars, which must be looked after in some way.
Mr. WHEELER. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. GOOD. For a question.
Mr. WHEELER. The Railroad Administration in the last days of the last Congress asked for $750,000,000. That appropriation was not passed. At the beginning of this Congress they asked for $1,240,000,000. We appropriated $750,000,000. Now, they have been running behind from thirty to forty million dollars a month. Does the gentleman think it will require a billion dollars more to meet that?
Mr. GOOD. I am advised by the Treasury Department that the judgment of the Congress in only appropriating $750,000,000 for the Railroad Administration for the rest of the fiscal year was a good guess, and that it would not likely be necessary to call upon Congress for an additional appropriation of money to be paid out during this fiscal year for this purpose.
Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. GOOD. For a question.
Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I note the gentleman has in his figures on June 30 a net cash balance of $1,251,000,000.
Mr. GOOD. Yes.
Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. The daily Treasury statement indicates for that same date that there were warrants outstanding in excess of that amount——
Mr. GOOD. I understand; but that is all taken care of in the rest of the figures. That is taken care of in these other items of appropriation.
Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. That statement has not been correct since the last day of September, 1915.
Mr. GOOD. That may be true, so far as that is concerned; but this chart does take that fact into consideration.
Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I understand; but I am simply calling attention to the fact that the daily statement, beginning July 1 and coming down to date, shows warrants in excess of cash $204,000,000 at the minimum and only $1,112,000,000 at the maximum.
Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. GOOD. I will.
Mr. GARNER. If I understand it by the gentleman's chart and his deductions from the figures there on July 1, 1920, there will be an outstanding indebtedness of over $6,000,000,000; $3,634,000,000 outstanding on the 30th day of June, 1919, and an additional $2,491,000,000 that the gentleman estimates in addition to that would make a little over $6,000,000,000 in addition to the taxes we will have to have to take care of the situation on the 1st day of July 1920.
Mr. GOOD. No; the gentleman is mistaken. It will only be necessary to pay the certificates once, and there will be outstanding at the end of the fiscal year only $3,591,273,345.26 of certificates of indebtedness. I do not know how it will be paid——
Mr. GARNER. I say that much money we have got to have. Now, we have given the Treasury Department authority to issue $10,000,000,000 of certificates. If those certificates are still being taken as they are now, it will not be necessary to sell bonds.
Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman permit a question?
Mr. GOOD. A question.
Mr. HICKS. Has the gentleman taken into consideration of the receipts for 1920 the payment of any interest on our foreign debt?
Mr. GOOD. I have not.
Mr. HICKS. Is it not a fair thing to assume that some of that money will be paid in the shape of interest?
Mr. GOOD. I think it is a pertinent inquiry as to whether we will get any money in the way of interest from the foreign governments on the $10,000,000,000 we have loaned. I call attention again to the Secretary's letter to the gentleman from Texas, in which not a single penny is mentioned there as a prospective receipt from that source. I understand that it is not expected we will get anything from that source during the fiscal year. I know nothing about it personally, and that matter was left out, because, as I have said before, these are not my figures; they are the figures of the executive officers of the Government, whose duty it is to pass upon these claims, and the Secretary of the Treasury, who must finally pay them. The Treasury Department does not expect any payments of interest this year.
Mr. GOODYKOONTZ. If the gentleman will permit, I will say, for information, that in the conversation with the governor of the Reserve Board he informed me that it was not expected that these foreign Governments would even pay the interest on these loans at any time within the period of two years, and that interest would be charged up to the principal during that period.
Mr. GOOD. I think that is the fact.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?
Mr. GOOD. Yes.
Mr. FESS. The astonishing thing to me and to all the Members is the tremendous drain, and we want to know whether there is any hope of scaling it down next year in the shape of expenditures?
Mr. GOOD. Well, I am going to read a letter here that might indicate there may be prospects of increasing that greatly. I have a letter——
Mr. FESS. Before the gentleman reads, this last item in the middle of the chart, permanent and indefinite appropriations estimate, all of these items run continuously, like interest on the public debt.
Mr. GOOD. Of course interest on the public debt will be increased if we increase the public debt. The bills carry appropriations for the payment of such interest. That is an indefinite and a permanent appropriation. Congress does not pass on it every year. Each act authorizes the issuance of bonds and provides for the payment of interest.
Mr. FESS. This item alone sums up twice the total of all the expenditures before the war and does not take in those on the first chart.
Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, how much time have I consumed? I do not wish to be impolite, but I have not touched on the bill.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has consumed one hour.
Mr. GOOD. I will ask not to be interrupted until I can conclude.
Mr. OLIVER. One question. In the $10,831,000,000 you have included the oustanding certificates of $2,682,335,173?
Mr. GOOD. Certainly.
Mr. OLIVER. And this same sum of $2,682,335,173 is also included in the estimated deficit.
Mr. GOOD. Certainly. It is not a duplication.
Mr. OLIVER. So if the outstanding certificates are continued, then after you deduct the $1,100,000 which you estimate can be deducted as additional income from miscellaneous sources during 1920, you really would have no deficit other than the present outstanding Treasury certificates?
Mr. GOOD. And if you continue to loan money on certificates of indebtedness.
Mr. OLIVER. If you continue the outstanding certificates of indebtedness you have a balance of accounts?
Mr. GOOD. Yes.
Mr. OLIVER. One other question. You speak of $155,000,000 due from the War Department to the Shipping Board and $80,000,000 due to the Railroad Administration. What use do you contemplate the Shipping Board and Railroad Administration will make of these items when paid by the War Department?
Mr. GOOD. The Railroad Administration will want this money to pay labor and other costs of administering the railroads and pay their rental contracts to the railroad companies. The Shipping Board will use these funds to pay for ships. You will recall we took this into consideration when the sundry civil bill was enacted. It will be necessary for them to have it all.
Mr. OLIVER. Did you take those items into account in making the statement that if the railroads were returned to private control in January, 1920, the Government would lose $750,000,000?
Mr. GOOD. Yes.
Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. GOOD. For a question.
Mr. MONDELL. I wanted to make this suggestion in regard to the gentleman's speech. The House is tremendously interested in what the gentleman has to say. This is perhaps as important a matter as we will have before us this session. The House will be very glad to give the gentleman all the time that he needs, and my suggestion to him is that perhaps it will be well for him to yield to inquiries of gentlemen which are pertinent, because it is very important that we all understand the figures which he is presenting. There will be no question about the gentleman having all the time he desires, I am sure.
Mr. CANNON. I hope that will be settled here and now, because the gentleman has not referred to the pending bill. I am not criticizing, but approving. But I think before he sits down he ought to explain the pending bill.
Mr. GOOD. I want to do that.
Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] shall have such time as he desires to conclude his remarks, in addition to the hour which he has used, which I assume is taken from the general debate.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa may have such time as he needs in which to conclude his remarks.
Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, because the gentleman from Iowa is making a very interesting and valuable statement, I call attention to the fact that a while ago when I asked for about 15 minutes more the gentleman objected to it.
Mr. GOOD. I hope the gentleman from Wyoming will not press that request.
Mr. MONDELL. I shall not insist on it.
Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I shall not insist on my request, but if we should need 15 minutes more, I hope no one will object.
Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] was compelled to decline to yield to anybody because of the brevity of the time.
Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I have not the slightest objection to giving him an hour more, but I want 15 minutes more myself.
Mr. MONDELL. Gentlemen of the House want an opportunity to interrogate the gentleman from Iowa in regard to this matter.
Mr. LONGWORTH. Might I make a request that the gentleman have a half hour additional? The reason I do so is that I agree with the gentleman from Wyoming that the House can not more profitably employ itself in anything than in the discussion of the subject on which the gentleman is talking.
Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Who objected to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming?
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdrew the request.
Mr. MONDELL. I understood there was an objection.
The CHAIRMAN. There was not.
Mr. MONDELL. I do not withdraw it, then.
Mr. GOOD. Is my time running? If so, I wish to proceed.
Mr. MONDELL. Let the request be submitted.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa——
Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, has he received unanimous consent to continue his remarks?
The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] yield; and if so, to whom?
Mr. GOOD. The gentleman from Wyoming is submitting a unanimous-consent request.
Mr. MONDELL. I withdraw my request.
Mr. GOOD. Then I refuse to yield.
Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent——
Mr. LONGWORTH. Do I understand that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] refuses to yield to any further questions?
Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield to me?
Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.
Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa may be allowed to conclude his remarks, not to be taken out of the time agreed upon.
Mr. GARNER. Not to be taken out of the time nor to be more than an hour.
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the time on this bill was fixed by the order of the House. The Chair does not see how the committee, even by unanimous consent, can agree to an extension of time, the time having been fixed in the House. The only way the debate can be extended is by action of the House.
Mr. GOOD. I will endeavor to yield for a few questions, but first I would like to explain the bill. I say that, judging from a letter which I received on yesterday, I am inclined to think that policies may be adopted that may largely swell that deficit. I will not read all of the letter that I received from Henry A. Wise Wood, but I will read a part of it. He says:

> Early last May there called upon me at my office a Mr. J. J. O'Neill, whose engraved card described him as London manager of the Manchester Guardian, of Manchester, England. * * * I asked him bluntly what was the actual purpose of his visit to the United States. He replied that he was here upon a mission connected with the internationalization of the war debt. I asked him if he meant me to understand that he was here upon the business of inducing the United States to guarantee the war debt of the nations recently at war, including that of Great Britain and that of Germany. He said that he was. I told him that he would find little sentiment in this country favorable to such a project. This seemed to surprise him; he said that I was the first American he had met who did not favor it. I then asked him whom he had seen, and he replied that upon the previous day he had seen Mr. J. P. Morgan, and that Mr. Morgan had expressed himself as being in favor of the plan.

Do we realize what this means if such plan should be adopted?

Mr. DAVIS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. No; I can not yield. I want to use just a little time myself now.

Do we realize just what this means? The United Kingdom has a national wealth of $70,000,000,000. She has a national debt of $37,000,000,000. France has a national wealth of $60,000,000,000. She has a national debt of almost $28,000,000,000. Italy has a national wealth of $20,000,000,000. She has a national debt of more than $10,000,000,000. Austria-Hungary has a national wealth of $55,000,000,000 and a national debt of $25,000,000,000. Germany has a national wealth of $85,000,000,000, with a national debt of more than $40,000,000,000, and to the national debts of Germany and Austria-Hungary must be added the indemnities that they must pay. The United States has a national wealth of $230,000,000,000, with a national debt of only $25,000,000,000. But if we are to internationalize the debts of the nations at war, all the figures that I have presented here amount to nothing and give us a very poor conception of what our obligations will be. I anticipate that that proposition, before it can come to a realization, will come before the membership of this House. When it does, I hope that the entire membership of the House will swat it so that it will never raise its head again in the United States. [Applause.]

In this connection, I wish to remind the House that this Congress is young. Before it ends many bills will be enacted calling for drafts upon the Treasury. The figures I have given do not include the $14,184,704.67 carried by the bill which we have under consideration. It takes no account of future deficiencies or of the two bills to which I have referred, the bill increasing the salaries of postal employees and the bill amending the war-risk insurance act, which have passed the House during the past week and will unquestionably become laws in the near future, and which will mean during the year an additional draft on the Treasury of approximately $125,000,000. Other bills on the calendar calling for large expenditures of money will no doubt pass. Still others are pending before committees, which, if enacted into law, will call for large expenditures of money that must in some way be provided for. Certainly future legislation calling for large appropriations of money should provide the ways and means by which the money shall be raised with which to pay the obligations incurred. Additional obligations can not be paid out of the Treasury of the United States, which is already face to face with a deficit on June 30 next of almost $3,600,000,000.

I understand there has been reported to the House a bill requiring the payment of pensions monthly, instead of every quarter. That will take at least $200,000 a year out of the Treasury for clerk hire in Washington. Another bill, to increase the pensions of old soldiers from $30 to $50 a month, would, if enacted, add $50,000,000 more to that item. These items may be meritorious in ordinary times, but they certainly should be deferred now.

I picked up my paper from home the other day and read with great satisfaction the action of that splendid organization in my State—and a similar organization is in your State and in yours—the American Legion. There is no finer body of men anywhere.

The American Legion had a State convention the other day in my State and passed resolutions of which I am proud. Just as they donned the khaki and went into the service in order to carry the flag to imperishable glory, they, now that the war is over, seem to realize a fact that there is a heavy legacy of war debt that is staring the people in the face. [Applause.] They passed a resolution. I do not have the resolution; I tried to get it from the Library. But the papers give it in this form:

Expressing the legion as satisfied with the bonus already granted, but willing to take more if Congress grants it.

Of course, they will take more if Congress grants it. Who would not? But I thank God that those boys showed that same degree of patriotism and good common sense when they said they were satisfied with the bonus that they had already received. [Applause.] I hope we will do justice by these soldiers. We have always done that, and we always will.

Every Member of this Congress, whether he be Republican or Democrat, was elected on a platform of economy. We each agreed to do our full share to help in a financial readjustment, guaranteeing an early reduction in taxes. That was the big issue in the last campaign. And it well becomes us now to pause for a moment and calmly and dispassionately consider how we will redeem that promise. Is it not best that we should meet the problem now, fulfilling our pledges honestly and faithfully, than to be compelled to offer humiliating excuses later? I submit this question to every Member of this House, for both parties made the same pledges and the members of both parties are equally bound to redeem those promises.

These figures that I have presented are not gratifying; but they are cold, stubborn facts that you and I must deal with, and we should deal with them in a broad and patriotic way, not only when we are considering appropriation bills but when we are considering in the committee room and on the floor of the House legislation which will mean an enlarged draft on the Treasury of the United States. Every law that is passed calling for the expenditure of money for this fiscal year, every appropriation that is hereafter made for this fiscal year, will but add to the burden of the taxpayer and swell the deficit that will confront the Treasury on June 30 next.

If, therefore, the cuts made in the pending bill are greater than some of you might have wished for, let me remind you that it was with a full realization of the Nation's obligations and the threatened deficit in the Treasury that led the committee to eliminate or reduce wherever the elimination or reduction could be made without crippling a needed Government service. The subcommittee that considered the estimates for the pending bill gave a most thorough and painstaking examination into every estimate submitted. I feel a personal sense of obligation to every member of that subcommittee, which gave so freely of their time and judgment on all of the estimates submitted. I am especially under obligation to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SLEMP] for so ably assisting me in compiling the figures I have submitted with regard to Government receipts and expenditures.

Let me now briefly analyze the bill before us for consideration. The estimates upon which this bill is based aggregate $47,752,481.94. The bill carries $14,184,704.67, and is a reduction of the estimates considered of $33,567,777.27. The reduction in a broad way falls into a few departments. For example, there is a reduction of $982,041.67 in the Department of State. Of this there was a reduction of $327,000 in the estimate for offices and employees, $437,000 in the estimate for the American mission to negotiate peace, and $130,000 in the estimate to purchase an embassy building at Santiago, Chile. The President requested an appropriation of $825,000 for the American mission to negotiate peace. The State Department was not able at this time to furnish the details of the $1,500,000 allotted by the President out of the national security and defense fund for this purpose up to June 30. The Secretary of State has promised that the details of this expenditure will be forthcoming when the next deficiency bill is under consideration, and the committee therefore followed the suggestion of the Secretary of State by appropriating at this time only the amount which he has alloted for this purpose out of the $700,000 secret fund for the State Department carried in the Diplomatic and Consular appropriation bill.

There was a reduction of $10,019,175.39 in the estimates of the Treasury Department. Included in this amount is $1,986,000, estimated for a national archives site and building, and $7,695,370 for the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. The Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance estimated for $6,275,370 for salaries for employees; the bill carries $4,000,000 for this purpose. It may not be enough, but it was the opinion of the committee that it was nearer right than the amount estimated, and that it may be found to be entirely sufficient for the service. The service is undergoing certain changes, and the amount required will depend somewhat upon the extent to which the soldiers continue their insurance. Hence, being somewhat in the experimental stages, the committee felt that $4,000,000 additional would be sufficient for this bureau at this time. The committee declined to report out an appropriation of $2,595,000 to be used for advertising. It was the desire of Col. Cholmeley-Jones, the director, who is working very hard and, I think, very efficiently, and who is very enthusiastic in his effort to try to bring order out of chaos in that great department, that there should be this appropriation for advertising in the magazines and newspapers of the United States. It seemed to the subcommittee, as it did to the full committee, that that was a departure so radical in its effects, in permitting the Government to spend millions of dollars in advertising, that it did not seem justified. We knew that if we embarked upon this policy it would be enlarged by other departments, and in the end the press of the country would be a subsidized press, subsidized by appropriations out of the National Treasury. [Applause.] The committee thought it was dangerous and expensive, and while we realize that in a commercial way insurance companies do resort to advertising and get results from it, yet we considered that our insurance is a governmental insurance, where the Government is doing something out of the ordinary, and it was not thought to be wise for the Government, even in this case, to appropriate large sums of money for this purpose.

So, too, there was an estimate for $1,800,000 to pay for the money orders purchased by the holders of war-risk insurance when they sent in their premiums. We carry a provision in the bill directing the Postmaster General to prescribe forms and regulations for the postmasters and the carriers to collect the insurance, but we do not appropriate any money for that. We have already increased the salaries of postal employees in this Congress by the action of the House to the extent of $50,000,000, and if we throw upon them a little additional burden to help their brothers who went into the Great War to preserve the honor and integrity of the flag, we think they will gladly and willingly do that little extra service which this bill entails upon them, without an additional appropriation.

There are other items in the bill that I think, perhaps, can be explained under the five-minute rule, except the question of the high cost of living.

There was an estimate of $18,600,000 for the Naval Establishment, $5,000,000 of which was for the maintenance for the Bureau of Yards and Docks, $2,100,000 for maintenance of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, $6,500,000 for the Bureau of Construction and Repair, for construction and repair of vessels, and $5,000,000 for the Bureau of Steam Engineering. The bill does not carry any appropriation for this service. It does, however, carry a legislative provision authorizing the transfer from the "Pay of the Navy" and "Provisions, Navy," of $9,300,000 for the purposes estimated for. It was, indeed, a mooted question whether this authority should be given, but in view of the statement made by Admiral Benson and Assistant Secretary Roosevelt as to the military necessities, the committee was of the opinion that inasmuch as the appropriations for "Pay of the Navy" and "Provisions, Navy," were larger than were necessary, and that the military necessities required additional work to be done in the repair of vessels, we carry the legislative provision referred to, with certain limitations.

The appropriations for this year for these purposes were about four times more than the appropriations for like purposes for 1916. While our Navy is larger and the cost of making the repairs has increased, it seemed to the committee that the Navy ought to have been able to get along with the appropriations already made, and the committee was only moved to take the course agreed upon because of the very urgent request of Admiral Benson and Assistant Secretary Roosevelt. It was their opinion that unless the authority was granted, many of the vessels now needing repair would be tied up for more than two years. The committee believes that the limitations placed upon this legislation will result in securing as much work for $9,300,000 as would otherwise have been obtained by the expenditure of the full amount estimated.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. If I recollect aright, the Secretary of the Navy acquiesced in the $9,000,000 provision.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; he practically acquiesced; and I think, if you will talk with him, you will get the impression perhaps that he thinks that a great saving will be the result of this legislation. The committee had in mind going further than that, and providing that no man should be paid out of that appropriation whose efficiency was below a fair standard.

Mr. GARNER. Why did you not do that?

Mr. GOOD. Well, we have done some things at times which have met with the presidential veto. We were trying to get a bill through that would not meet any serious obstacle along that line; and in these times of considerable trouble we thought perhaps this would accomplish the same result and yet at the outset not be quite so harsh.

Mr. GARNER. Any time that Congress wants to enact legislation looking toward the correcting of inefficiency, if the President wants to veto it, Congress can consider that veto.

Mr. GOOD. It is, indeed, difficult to state accurately to what extent the estimates relate to the high cost of living. Some estimates like those from the Department of Agriculture were only an estimate of the difference between the amount originally estimated for by the department for the year and the amount granted by Congress. They in fact, therefore, had nothing to do with regard to the present emergency, so far as living costs are concerned, for the estimates were made more than a year ago. Practically the same thing is true with regard to the estimates in the Department of Labor.

The bill carries $150,000 for the Federal Trade Commission, which is the amount the commission felt they could expend in giving temporary aid. How much of benefit the Federal Trade Commission will be able to accomplish in reducing the cost of living, no member of the commission was prepared to say. They have no enthusiasm over the job and make no promises as to results. Whether it will accomplish anything along the line of reducing prices is doubtful. I personally do not believe it will. The bill does not carry the appropriation of $502,000 asked for in the Department of Agriculture for this purpose, nor does it carry the appropriation asked for by the Department of Labor. The bill does carry $12,000 for the Bureau of Labor Statistics, to permit that bureau to complete certain investigations now under way, touching the cost of living, and to publish the same.

The Department of Commerce also asked for $485,000 for investigation of this subject, and the Department of Justice asked an appropriation of $200,000 for the enforcement of antitrust laws, $1,000,000 for the detection and prosecution of crime, and $345,000 for special assistants to the Attorney General, and these appropriations have to a greater or less degree special reference to bringing about some reduction in the cost of living. It was pointed out very clearly by the representatives from the Agricultural Department in support of their estimates that the cause of the high cost of living is founded primarily on the increase in our circulating medium, and that but a small per cent of it—5 per cent, as I recall—is due to hoarding and profiteering. The committee felt that it should give to the Department of Justice all the money that is required to enforce the laws to prevent hoarding and profiteering. Some of this appropriation will be required to enforce the prohibition act, but a great deal of it necessarily will be expended in prosecuting profiteers and hoarders of the necessaries of life, if any practical relief is to be given from the present high cost of living. And it is to this department of the Government that the committee feels we must look for practical relief.

Of the estimates submitted by the Department of Commerce for relief from the high cost of living, $75,000 was for the purpose of demonstration of methods of preparing and cooking fish. Congress has had some experience with this department on this very same subject. In the act approved June 21, 1916, the Department of Commerce was given $25,000 to conduct investigations and experiments with regard to dogfish. Out of that appropriation the department did make an investigation and demonstration in the matter of cooking and canning dogfish and gave the results of its investigation to the canners. A great many canners of fish canned dogfish in accordance with the instructions of this department. The result was not satisfactory. After these fish had been canned and disposed of the cans commenced to explode, and last year the Department of Commerce came before Congress with an estimate of $60,000 to reimburse these canners who had canned dogfish in accordance with the methods which had been demonstrated by the Department of Commerce.

A great many of these estimates for reducing the high cost of living are of the dogfish character and if granted would give just about as much relief as did the $25,000 previously appropriated for dogfish demonstrations. The people want relief from high prices, not dogfish demonstrations.

The bill carries a large number of important and necessary appropriations. For example, it carries $1,210,000 for constructing three lighthouse tenders and vessels. We have a large number of lighthouse vessels, and the ordinary requirement is about four new vessels per year, when as a matter of fact we have not constructed a single lighthouse vessel or tender for the Lighthouse Service for the past seven or eight years.

The bill carries $495,000 for the Bureau of Standards. This bureau is practically swamped by the work which has been thrown upon it by the various departments of the Government and the manufacturing public. The War and Navy Departments during the past two years have used this agency as never before, and the need of testing all Government supplies and materials is becoming more and more apparent. For example, the Government tests every pound of cement that it purchases, and it has been found that 10 per cent of all the cement tested is rejected because it does not comply with the standard requirements. It was the opinion of the committee that the money expended in this way was well spent, and that the bureau ought not to be hampered because of the lack of funds.

In a general way the committee feels that the bill carries all that is necessary to appropriate at this time, and, while many of the items carried are not, strictly speaking, deficiencies, the appropriation is necessary to supplement appropriations already made for the respective services.

A word in regard to the high cost of living. Living costs are high. In many of the necessities of life they are oppressively so. Every possible relief from this condition should be granted, but to apply the real remedy might be worse than the disease with which we are suffering. It is generally admitted that the high costs of living are due primarily to four principal causes.

First and foremost, the increase in our circulating medium. Since the outbreak of the war, our circulating medium has practically doubled, and it is a singular fact that at all times and in all countries where the circulating medium is quickly increased the price of commodities rises correspondingly.

Second, increased prices are made necessary to meet increased cost of production, due to (a) increase in wages, (b) decrease in labor efficiency, and (c) an increase in taxes. The increase in the wage scale in many industries is more than 100 per cent, and according to the testimony before the committee labor is only from 50 to 65 per cent efficient. A tax of almost $5,000,000,000 on the American people is in the long run passed on to the consumer, for it is an element in the cost of production and in many cases could not be paid at all unless the amount of the tax was added to the price of the article, for it is computed as a part of the cost of production.

Third, our excess of exports. In 1914 the total of our exports of foodstuffs of all kinds was $430,713,457, while our exports of this same class of products increased in 1919 to $2,504,895,554. Can it be possible that we could export almost six times as much in 1919 as we did in 1914 of this prime necessary of life without feeling some effect so far as an increase in the price is concerned? Especially is this true when we remember that we are furnishing not only the foodstuffs and other necessaries to Europe, but we are furnishing money with which to pay therefor, and as long as Europe can induce us to furnish the foodstuffs and wearing apparel and other necessaries of life and also the money with which to buy them, they are not particularly interested as to the price. And this has had a tendency to fix the high price in the home markets.

Fourth, the world has lost tremendously both in man power and property. This loss has vitally affected world production. While production in the United States was maintained, yet the great world shortage has had a potent influence in increasing prices.

The committee concluded that so far as decreasing the cost of living is concerned we would not accomplish much, if anything, by granting every penny that was asked for for investigations. There never was a time in the country's history when we had more complete detailed information as to the production, stores on hand, exports and imports, and prices than we have to-day. We have had the information during all of the past years, and as the information has accumulated prices have rapidly increased, for with the collecting of the information and the publishing of it prices have gone steadily up. People who are asking for a reduction in the cost of living will not be satisfied with an investigation. They know that prices are high and they want these prices reduced.

The House by almost a unanimous vote directed the War Department to sell its surplus of material. This was the first and by all odds the most important step taken to reduce living costs. Should not the Government set the example in this regard, for if the War and Navy Departments are to become the greatest hoarders in the country, how can the Government complain if individuals or corporations shall also hoard? The price of living may be reduced somewhat by a vigorous enforcement of laws; but no real benefit will be felt until the cost of production is reduced, and it may be necessary to reduce very materially our circulating medium. If these principles are sound, it must be apparent to anyone who thinks that the action of the committee in refusing these large appropriations is wise, for to have granted them would bring additional burdens to the taxpayer, would take men out of the productive vocations of life, and would add to rather than relieve the burdens of our people.

If the Nation is to receive relief from present unrest and from high prices of the necessaries of life our people must practice the strictest economy. It is to be regretted that the estimates submitted for the deficiencies did not more fully recognize this principle. It is to be hoped that the estimates now being compiled for the next fiscal year will fully recognize the fact that the Government is to be administered with strict economy. We have arrived at a time in this country when we must resist the incentive to buy, and to spend money, and we must commence to practice those plain, homely virtues of thrift, saving, and frugality. The Government, through its executive departments, should lead in this crusade; for if we are to receive relief from these high prices we must stop buying things that we can well get along without, and the Government must stop authorizing the doing of those things which are not purely governmental functions, but benefit only a given locality, a certain industry, or a few producers.

The forthcoming estimates should carry not a single dollar in excess of the actual requirements of the Government to function in a healthy and progressive way. The forthcoming estimates should reveal greater economy than they have ever exhibited before. The various departments of the Government should be correlated, duplications in the service should be wiped out, and waste and extravagance that pervade every department should be eliminated. In the British Parliament the Haldane committee has proposed the establishment in each department of the Government of "an officer of high grade especially charged with financial duties, provided with a financial staff sufficiently strong to enable him to maintain a continuous survey of all proposals for expenditures originating within the department, and regularly consulted before any decision on a matter of financial importance is arrived at by the minister." As a temporary expediency the condition of the Treasury warrants the President in taking similar action. He has the authority under the law, and should exercise it to the end that estimates for appropriations may be greatly reduced, and that the Treasury, which is the first line of defense against public extravagance, may reestablish its lines on a policy of efficiency and economy.

In its deliberations the committee has followed those broad principles that should always control the deliberations of Congress, which have been so admirably expressed by President Wilson. In his book on Congressional Government he says:

> It is the proper duty of a representative body to look diligently into every affair of government and to talk much about what it sees. It is meant to be the eyes and the voice, and to embody the wisdom and will of its constituents. Unless Congress have and use every means of acquainting itself with the acts and the disposition of the administrative agents of the Government, the country must be helpless to learn how it is being served; and unless Congress both scrutinize these things and sift them by every form of discussion, the country must remain in embarrassing, crippling ignorance of the very affairs which it is most important that it should understand and direct. The informing function of Congress should be preferred even to its legislative function. The argument is not only that discussed and interrogated administration is the only pure and efficient administration, but, more than that, that the only really self-governing people is that people which discusses and interrogates its administration. The talk on the part of Congress which we sometimes justly condemn is the profitless squabble of words over frivolous bills or selfish party issues. It would be hard to conceive of there being too much talk about the practical concerns and processes of government. Such talk it is which, when earnestly and purposefully conducted, clears the public mind and shapes the demands of public opinion.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HICKS having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution (H. J. Res. 175) to provide for the payment of travel pay upon discharge to men of the Regular Army enlisted prior to April 2, 1917.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution (H. J. Res. 211) tendering the thanks of the American people and the Congress of the United States to Gen. John J. Pershing, and to the officers and men of the American Expeditionary Forces.

FIRST DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL FISCAL YEAR 1920.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] is recognized for one hour and a half.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] has made a very interesting, illuminating, and valuable address to the House on the subject of the expenditures and the revenues of the Government during this fiscal year. It was a very important speech, and I am sure will appeal to every Member of this House, for it shows the very serious problem that confronts the Congress and the country with reference to our finances. It shows that the very closest scrutiny should be given to every appropriation which may be asked of the Congress and that the most rigid economy must be practiced.

It has another valuable aspect to my mind, and that is this: It is a splendid illustration of the necessity of the establishment of some sort of a budget system in this country. This is the first time within my knowledge that in presenting a big appropriation bill to the Congress the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations has made it a point to give to the House a statement of the expenditures that will be made and will be necessary in the present fiscal year and at the same time submit to the Congress a statement as to the estimated revenues. The gentleman from Iowa has ably presented in a limited way—limited because of the fact that he did not have an extended length of time—what might be called a sort of a budget to this House which I hope will be carefully studied and considered.

I regretted that the gentleman departed for a moment from his excellent address to refer to a letter that had been sent out by Mr. Henry A. Wise Wood to every Member of Congress, in which he undertakes to detail a conversation which he had with some man named O'Neill, who he says is a newspaper man from the city of London, and is over here for the purpose of inducing this country to ratify the league of nations. The gentleman from Iowa built up a straw man in his appeal to this House not to indorse the alleged intention of the league of nations to commit this country to the internationalization of the war debts and to guarantee the debts of Europe growing out of this Great War. If the gentleman had read the hearings before the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate he would have known that no such idea has ever been entertained by the administration or by our Government from the very inception of the consideration of the treaty of peace in Paris. If he had read the testimony of Mr. Norman Davis, who was one of the financial experts and the representative of the Treasury in Paris during the consideration of the treaty of peace, he would have found that he was asked that very question by some of the Senators, and that Mr. Davis stated there was absolutely not one scintilla of truth in the intimation that this had been determined upon or that the league of nations was expected to commit this country to the guaranty of the debts of Europe growing out of this war.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. I purposely did not read any part of the letter with regard to the league of nations, so as to keep all politics out of the matter, if politics is involved—and the President says it is not—and I excluded that part of the letter. I read only the part of the letter where the man said that that was the program, that that was what he was in America for, and that he had talked with many Americans and that they were in favor of it, and then said Mr. Morgan was in favor of it. That is the only part of the letter that I read.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I understand the gentleman referred to the letter, and I think every Member of the House has received a copy of the letter which the gentleman held in his hand. The gentleman says that he did not intend to bring politics into the matter, and I accept his disclaimer as to that fact, although the letter was sent out for just that purpose, and I do not exactly understand why the gentleman should have alluded to it, because he knows and we all know that this Government could not be committed to a guaranty of the debts of Europe unless Congress first agreed to such guaranty, and I trust the gentleman has too much confidence in the committees of this House, made up in the majority, as they are, from his own party, to believe that the committees would recommend to the House or that the House would adopt such a recommendation any proposal to guarantee the debts of Europe in this war.

Mr. EAGAN. Does it not seem passing strange that Mr. Henry A. Wise Wood, referring to an interview had with Mr. O'Neill in May, should wait until September to call this very important matter to the attention of the Members of Congress?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Very strange, indeed; and it is also very strange, indeed, to me that some newspaper correspondent from London, of whom we never before heard, should be the man sent over on the important mission of seeing that the Senate of the United States and this country indorse the league of nations.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. What the letter stated and what the gentleman stated was that an "Englishman" by the name of O'Neill wanted this Government to guarantee the war debt of Germany as well as this country—an Englishman named O'Neill!

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Aside from that, Mr. Chairman, I want for a few moments to discuss certain features of this bill. I am not prepared to say that I agree to every item recommended in the bill. There are some items of appropriation in the bill which I thought possibly might have been changed, but I recognize that provision can be made for certain departments of the Government hereafter, if it should be found necessary, and I shall not allude to them. I am as anxious as the gentleman from Iowa to see the appropriations made by this Congress and future Congresses held down to the lowest possible minimum. That has been my record ever since I have been a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and certainly at this time, as was clearly demonstrated by the gentleman from Iowa in his address a few moments ago, there is a special reason for the most rigid economy in the future. There were certain estimates submitted by various departments of the Government having to do with the reduction of the high cost of living, and it is proper for me to say that I am not entirely in accord with the committee in its declination to recommend in some amount some of the estimates submitted by those departments, in addition to the amount recommended for the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission. I am influenced in this respect by the fact that we all recognize that the most serious and vital problem confronting the people to-day is the present high cost of living; that it is fostering Bolshevism, unrest, and dissatisfaction all over the country. In fact, so imperative is it that something shall be done, that this Government shall do what it can do to arrest the high cost of living, that more than five weeks ago the President of the United States sent an earnest request to the House that it reconsider its determination to take a five weeks' recess and remain in session for the purpose of enacting necessary legislation to provide the funds necessary for the Government to conduct its campaign against the high cost of living.

The House readily acceded to that request, and on August 8 the President of the United States delivered a message to a joint session of both Houses of Congress, in which he called attention to specific legislation that was needed and also to the funds which were necessary to be appropriated in order that certain departments of this Government might conduct a campaign to reduce the high cost of living. Unfortunately not one single request submitted by the President of the United States more than five weeks ago has been enacted into a finality. He asked for legislation regulating cold storage, and it has not even been reported from the committee. The President asked for a simple amendment to the food-control bill extending its provisions so as to take in fuel and clothing in addition to food. He asked for a simple amendment to that bill providing a penalty of fine and imprisonment for those who are guilty of hoarding and profiteering under its provisions. It was two weeks to the day before the proper committee of this House reported that simple piece of legislation.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do.

Mr. TINCHER. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the delay of one week of that time was due to the fact that the President's Department of Justice was not sure of how it wanted that bill worded, and that committee, just as quickly as the Department of Justice indicated the way it wanted the bill worded, reported the bill to the House and it was passed?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I was not aware of that. I thank the gentleman for the information; but why the delay of two weeks? I do know that the President of the United States asked that a penalty be attached to the food-control bill, and I do know that it was suggested that that bill be extended so it would include fuel and clothing, and I have never been able to understand why it should have taken two weeks, even considering the week to which the gentleman from Kansas refers, in order to report that bill to the House. It is also true that although it passed the House promptly after it was reported, that bill has not yet become a law. It passed the other end of the Capitol last Friday, and not even so far as I recall has a request been made in this House to take it up and throw it into conference so it can be finally ironed out and agreed upon between the two Houses.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. TINCHER. I hope the gentleman will not hold the Agricultural Committee responsible for the fact it took the Department of Justice two weeks to decide how they wanted the bill worded, and I hope the gentleman will not blame the Agricultural Committee for the fact that the President is now on the western coast and is not here to sign the bill.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. But I will call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that he could not sign it until Congress duly enacted it, and, as a matter of fact, it is now over five weeks—nearly six weeks—since the President delivered his message to the Congress, and if Congress had acted quickly, as it ought to have done, in view of the acute situation confronting the country, that bill would have been passed and enacted into law and signed by the President before he ever left upon his tour in the interest of the treaty of peace. [Applause.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that within a few days the President in a speech in the West recommended that this Government should advance something like $4,000,000,000 to the countries of Europe outside of any existing war expenditures?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. No; I will say to the gentleman from Ohio I am not aware of any such fact.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Well, it is a fact, I will say to the gentleman. Does the gentleman think that would have a tendency to reduce the high cost of living in this country?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio that he is entirely mistaken in his statement that the President of the United States indicated that the Government of the United States should lend an additional amount to the European Governments. He did say something, I think in his St. Louis speech, that it would be necessary to render aid to European countries in order to help get them upon their feet, but I did not understand that the President stated that that aid should come from the United States Treasury. I rather inferred that it was his idea that this aid should come from individuals in this country in the way of financial loans.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Well, I would not care to take issue with the gentleman, because all I know is the newspaper accounts, but my strong impression is that the President heartily indorsed the suggestion made by Mr. Hoover specifically that this Government should advance more than $4,000,000,000 worth of additional credit to foreign countries, and if that is true I would like to know if the gentleman thinks that would have a tendency to reduce the cost of living?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I certainly do not. I will say frankly to the gentleman that I do not think anything that will have a tendency to increase the taxes upon the people of this country will serve to decrease the high cost of living, for we all know that taxes are one of the elements which enter into the cost of living, because they are always passed on to the consumer.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I want to get on this bill particularly. I was led off in my reference to a matter which is really foreign to the bill, because Congress has not proceeded with prompt dispatch to enact some legislation which would give additional authority to the Department of Justice, which I understand has the information now and is simply waiting in order that Congress may provide it with the necessary power to put some of these profiteers and these speculators in the necessaries of life in jail, where they ought to be.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It was merely in relation to that that I wanted to ask the question, and if that is done if he expected to secure that result.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I undoubtedly do, because I am glad to say that we have an Attorney General now who is not only a man of a very high order of ability, but whose heart throbs with sympathy for the consuming public of this country [applause], and I am satisfied that if this Congress will only give him what he and the President ask, and what they asked more than five weeks ago, the power to put these speculators and profiteers in jail, the Attorney General will do it or make them quit their practices.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Tennessee yield to the gentleman from Wyoming?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. For a brief question.

Mr. MONDELL. I was unavoidably out of the Chamber for a moment, but I understand the gentleman criticized the delay in sending the amendment to the food-control bill to conference. The gentleman did make such a criticism, as I understand.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. In passing I criticized the delay of Congress in not enacting that legislation.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is informed, I suppose, that the bill has not gone to conference because a gentleman on his side has served notice that he will object to its going to conference, and it is because of that notice of objection that the bill has not gone to conference?

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I do not know of any gentleman in the House who objected to its going to conference, but I suggest to the gentleman, if that be true, there is a Rules Committee of this House, which I have found has been very frequently appealed to by the gentleman during this session in order to bring legislation before the House, and the House can always do its business when it desires to do so, regardless of the objection of any one Member.

Mr. MONDELL. We will do that; but I desired to give the gentlemen a little time, in the hope that they might change their minds in this obstruction business.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. I am sure there is no Member who will offer any objection if allowed time for discussion. So far I have not heard even a request made for unanimous consent for the purpose of sending that bill to conference, although it passed the Senate, as I have stated, on last Friday.

As to the estimates submitted on the high cost of living, the committee has, I am happy to say, allowed every dollar the Department of Justice has asked in order to conduct its campaign against the high cost of living. We all recognize that it is the one agency of this Government which can most effectively deal with the situation. And as I stated a moment ago, if given the power and authority to put some of these profiteers and speculators in the necessaries of life in jail it will do so; the Attorney General proposes to do so unless they quit their practices of profiteering upon the consuming public of this country. In addition to that, the Federal Trade Commission asked for $500,000; $150,000 of this amount was asked for an immediate and quick investigation of the present causes of the high cost of living.

It was stated by Mr. Colver that the Federal Trade Commission could spend only the sum of $150,000 in a wise and orderly manner for that purpose, and the committee has recommended the $150,000. They asked $350,000 in addition for the purpose of bringing the investigation with reference to fuel from January 1 to the present date and keep it current in anticipation of a possible coal famine this winter, also to print the report on leather and keep that current, and they desired to begin the investigation of certain basic industries bearing on the question of the high cost of living, all of which Mr. Murdock, the chairman of the commission, stated could not be done unless this sum was allowed. I do not say the committee should have recommended the full amount requested, but I regret that some amount was not recommended in addition to $150,000, so that at least those investigations which have been made in reference to fuel and leather could be brought down to date and kept current. In addition, the Department of Agriculture, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] states, asked something like $505,000 for the purpose of investigating the storage of food in certain portions of the country and the retail prices being paid in larger cities. The Bureau of Census asked for $200,000, which it stated would be necessary if the Department of Justice asked for any statistical information from it in reference to present conditions. The Department of Labor asked for $375,000 to investigate living conditions and costs and the reasons therefor in various cities. I do not know whether any of these amounts would have proven particularly advantageous, nor does anyone know. But I do say, gentlemen, that owing to the acute situation which confronts this country Congress can not hold itself blameless unless it is willing to give to every department which has any facilities for making investigation along this line sufficient funds with which to make that investigation where it appears that this investigation may be of value in the effort to reduce the high cost of living.

The President stated that the Department of Justice would not only proceed in the most effective way, but these other departments were in a position to give material aid to the Department of Justice in the prosecutions and other steps it proposes to take, and I regret that the committee did not allow at least a small amount to some of the departments for the purpose of conducting this investigation.

Of course we all know that legislation in itself will not reduce the high cost of living. Legislation can not change the law of supply and demand. Something more is needed. It is necessary for the people of this country to increase production and decrease the demands. It is necessary for the people of this country, every one of them, to become producers so far as they can do it and to cut out the extravagance which has grown up in the last few years, and particularly during the war, on account of the larger wages and profits and the great amount of money that has been floating around through the country. But Congress can do something, and the people have the right to expect that Congress and the Government will promptly take such steps as can be taken in the effort to reduce the high cost of living and relieve the suffering public. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. FORDNEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD two very short petitions and have them referred to the proper committees, which have been presented by soldier boys from Walter Reed Hospital.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing some petitions. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FORDNEY. While there are only four names to the petitions, there are 664 names to the original, which I have in my office.

The following are the petitions:

WALTER REED GENERAL HOSPITAL,
Takoma Park, September 16, 1919.

To the Military Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives.

GENTLEMEN: Attached to this memorandum is a copy of the letter of grievance, the original of which was this day presented to the Finance Committee of the Senate.

We ask that you give this your undivided attention.

We are, very respectfully,

O. C. RIFFLE.
HERMAN L. SHEPPARD, of Illinois.
OLIN I. LEWIS, of New Mexico.
JOHN J. FALLON, of New York.
JOHN T. HOTTEL.
HERMAN L. BUSH, of Massachusetts.

A LETTER OF GRIEVANCE.

Owing to the policy of the War Risk Insurance Bureau in using undue influence upon the soldiers to cause them to subscribe nearly one-fourth their pay for protection in case of disability and the failure of said insurance bureau to live up to the initial agreement, we feel it our duty to write this letter.

The representation made to us in regard to the above-mentioned insurance was as follows:

That all service men so insured who were injured in line of duty would be compensated for any disability so received, whether mental or physical, regardless of former occupation or earning capacity.

We, the undersigned service men and veterans of the World War, do hereby appeal to the people and the Congress of the United States of America to have this grievance righted by causing the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to honor the claims of the seriously, permanently, and partially disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines, who are ignored by said insurance bureau.

Our recommendations are as follows:

1. That all men disabled be paid their insurance in full from time of injury until they are discharged from the hospital.

2. After they are discharged to be paid the amount of insurance as determined by the percentage of disability.

We, the undersigned disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines, do therefore present this letter of grievance with the understanding that every statement is true and every claim just contained therein, and believe that the wrongs we have suffered will be speedily redressed.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN]. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I want to submit some nonpartisan remarks on a subject that is very vital to the masses of America.

Some politicians do not seem to understand how the great heart of the American people is yearning for the ratification of the peace treaty and the establishment of a league of nations. It is true that certain gentlemen who remained at home in their places of safety and who had no sons old enough to go to war, or who did not go, can not understand just how the fathers and mothers and relatives of four millions of boys feel about this horrible thing called war. Gen. Sherman said, and said truly, that "war is hell." And, gentlemen, the war that he spoke of was a mild thing compared to the bloody butchery of the awful war just ended. [Applause.] The rifle, the bayonet, and the cannons that our fathers used in the sixties were mild implements compared to the shrapnel, the machine guns, the big field guns, the airplanes, the liquid fire, and poisonous gases and other deadly implements used in this terrible war of rapine and murder. [Applause.] Gentlemen, modern war is so monstrous and deadly that the world is demanding that it be put down. [Applause.]

Here is an opportunity to put it down. The allied nations that banded themselves together to prevent Germany from conquering the world are determined now to see to it that some international tribunal such as was suggested by Senator LODGE in 1915 and in 1916 be established for the promotion of peace and the prevention of war. [Applause.] Senator LODGE was as thoroughly and completely committed to a league of nations as is the great ex-President, Mr. Taft, a Republican; as much as is the President of the United States, Woodrow Wilson. Just three years ago he committed himself heart and soul to this movement.

The President went away to the peace conference and when he first returned he submitted to the members of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Senate a draft of the league of nations, and these gentlemen, members of that committee, made suggestions as to changes that they desired made in the league of nations plan. The President took them back to the peace conference, submitted them to the delegates, and they agreed to the changes suggested by these gentlemen, Members of the United States Senate, but, strange to say, when the peace treaty came back amended as suggested we find this same Republican leader, Senator LODGE, of Massachusetts, according to newspaper reports, before the Senate convened, wiring to Republican Senators not to commit themselves to the league of nations until they could have a party caucus upon the subject. My! My! What an awful situation! A man who had advocated a league of nations and had made suggestions, which were adopted, as to changes that he desired made in the league plan turns round and puts party success above the welfare of his country and above the welfare of the world.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call the gentleman's attention to the rule that precludes a Member of the House from referring in terms of criticism to a Member of the coordinate body.

Mr. HEFLIN. I do not desire, Mr. Chairman, to violate the rules.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does that apply to a reference to a Member of the other body outside of the forum debate in the Senate?

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman's remarks as a Member of the House reflect upon or criticize a Member of the coordinate branch, it is a breach of the rule.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I hope this will not be taken out of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. No. The gentleman is not now criticizing a statement made by a Member of the coordinate branch, but he is criticizing the attitude of a United States Senator and saying that it is a reflection on the attitude of his country.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not want to take up the time, but would it be legitimate argument on the floor of the House for the present speaker, the gentleman from Alabama, to make observations in criticism of the remarks that the gentleman from California is making?

The CHAIRMAN. There is nothing in the rules of the House against referring to a newspaper statement concerning a Member of the coordinate body if the Member in referring to that statement does not mention the Member by name or speak disrespectfully or in a way to violate the proprieties that are supposed to exist between the two branches.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I will say to the Chairman that according to my understanding of the rule it does not prohibit the characterization of a Senator by name.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry, and it does not affect the ruling of the Chair.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, ex-President Taft, a big American patriot, charges, I understand, that Republican leaders in the Senate in caucus have somehow packed the Committee on Foreign Affairs with men opposed to the league of nations. Now, gentlemen, here is a Republican who has held the highest office in our country indicting Republican leaders for packing this committee with men opposed to an international tribunal to prevent war. Gentlemen, that is a serious indictment of the present-day leadership of the Republican Party, and do not be deceived, gentlemen, the American people are going to hold you responsible for playing such costly politics at the expense of the human race and the peace of the world.

Gentlemen, your party in the Senate, aided and encouraged by some of you over here, may be able now to kill this league of nations. I do not know but that you will. I fear that you will. I say that with a sad heart. But when you kill it you will defeat the desire and incur the displeasure of nearly 100,000,000 of peace-loving loyal Americans. [Applause.] The disloyal Americans will rejoice. Every pro-German in the United States will clap his hands for joy. But I give you notice now that you will have aroused the determined antagonism of Christian civilization in America and you will call down upon your heads the wrath of all civilized nations.

Gentlemen, do not fool yourselves; the battle will not stop when you lay this treaty down in ruins in the Senate. It will have but begun. [Applause.] The fathers and mothers in America, the boys who fought abroad, all of these will be arrayed against you. Pro-German interests here can not save you. The gunmakers and munition makers of the United States, who want the privilege of selling guns and munitions to the nations of the earth as they arm themselves for another war, can not save you. Their contributions to your campaign fund in 1920 can not save you. The blood of our boys will rise above their barter in bullets and the manhood of American men will be exalted above the money-making projects of American munition makers. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, how long have I spoken?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has used 10 minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. I wish the Chair would remind me when I have spoken 10 minutes more.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HEFLIN. I have not time, but I will yield briefly for a question.

Mr. TINCHER. I understood your reference to a pro-German. You mean that anyone who is opposed to the league of nations without reservations or amendments is a pro-German?

Mr. HEFLIN. No. I do not mean that. I never said anything like that.

Mr. TINCHER. You practically said that. You will change it when you put it in the RECORD.

Mr. HEFLIN. No; I will not change it. I stick to what I said. Every pro-German in the United States—and they are here in abundance—and the munition makers and gunmakers in the United States, and they are in Pennsylvania, Connecticut, New Jersey, and Massachusetts, all fighting the league of nations, and my judgment is that they are now buying newspaper space for those who are fighting the league of nations, and I think that they are paying the expenses of some who are speaking around the country in opposition to a league of nations that seeks to prevent war.

I do think that they are defraying the expenses of the propaganda back of the opposition to the league of nations. I should like to see the company that some gentlemen round about kept before they started out to trail the President—trailing and traducing the President as he pleads for the peace of the world.

I am reminded of the two negroes who jostled each other in a narrow path. One of them said, "Who are you tryin' to run over?"

"I ain't tryin' to run over nobody," the other one said.

"But when you see me comin' you must get out o' the way."

"They call me Bad Bill up where I live," said the first one.

"They would call you Sweet William down where I live," the second one replied.

"Well, the' ain't no use multiplyin' words about it. Let's just settle it right now." And doubling up his fist he made ready for action.

The other nigger commenced to look around to see if any witnesses were in sight.

"What are you taking so much time lookin' round for?" said the other.

"Well," came the reply, "After dis difficulty is over and dey gits in de courthouse where dey is holding er inquest over you dey er goin' to ask who was you last seed with." [Laughter.]

That is what I want to know, Mr. Chairman, about some of these speakers and writers who call themselves trailing the President. I would like to know who some of them were last seen with. This applies also to one who spoke down at Atlanta, Ga., and at Birmingham, Ala. They do not speak for the heart of America. I declare that to this Congress and the country. Gentlemen, when they kill the league of nations they take out of the heart the hope of peace, and they leave humanity groping in the gathering gloom with not a ray of light anywhere. [Applause.] Germany will rejoice. She wants to be left to prepare for another war. Ludendorff is filling American papers with a German prepared story of the war. The old military masters of Germany are hopeful. They are encouraged by the action of the leaders of the Republican Party in the United States. Wilson is denounced by some of these papers that are now carrying to every quarter of the country the story of Ludendorff, the bloodthirsty general of Germany. Oh, yes; they are reading about him now in the United States when President Wilson is trying to lay the hand of civilization upon Germany and to make Germany conform to the rules of right and the laws of justice. Senator KNOX is quoted as saying that the terms of the treaty are too hard on Germany. Think of that! In 1918 these same gentlemen were afraid that President Wilson would be too easy in his peace terms on Germany. Oh, consistency, thou art a jewel! Herostratus burned to the ground the great temple of Diana. And here, gentlemen, the leaders of the Republican Party in the Senate of the United States are trying to prevent the building and dedication of the greatest temple ever constructed by the children of men—a temple for the safeguarding of human life and dedicated to the cause of peace. [Applause.] Away with it, say the disappointed old military masters of Germany. Away with it, cry the munition and gun makers of the United States. Mr. Chairman, the treaty was nearly complete, and the President was geting ready to bring the completed treaty home and submit it to the Senate for its consideration. Did Republican leaders wait for the completed copy? No.

It is claimed that a copy was procured from Germany. And this incomplete copy was furnished to Germany by the Allies, so that she would understand it and be ready to sign it. Germany slipped a copy to the Republican leaders of the United States, and that copy of the treaty was printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD when the Chief Executive of the United States, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy in the war against Germany, begged Republican leaders not to do it, and said it would violate his faith with the other Allies, and that it was not a complete copy of the peace treaty and league covenant. But in spite of all the President said they printed that German-procured incomplete copy in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Now, this great American, the President of the United States, is speaking around the country in the interest of peace for America and peace for the world. [Applause.] Ex-President Taft, a Republican, the only ex-President living, and Woodrow Wilson, the present President, are walking arm in arm, thank God, across the country, pleading for the promotion of peace and the prevention of war. [Applause.]

Ex-Attorney General Wickersham, a Republican; Frank Hitchcock, former chairman of the Republican national committee; and your last nominee for President, Mr. Hughes, are all for the league of nations. And who is arrayed against it? These mighty Republican leaders from the great munitions and gun making States of the Union. You know Paul said that environment is a powerful thing, and that is true. You frequently hear the expression that a man has "found himself." Well, it frequently happens that somebody else finds him and appropriates him before he finds himself. [Laughter.] Then when he finds himself he is in the fix that the nigger said Germany was in when she went to war with the United States. Two niggers were talking about the war, and one said, "What did we get into the war about, anyhow?" The other negro said, "Well, this here Government is jes like I is: It don't want to fight if it can help it; but you let a nigger come fussing around me and I will walk away from him and argufy with him back over my shoulder; but don't let him overtake me." [Laughter.] And that's the way it was with our Government. Our Government was out on the high sea, where John Paul Jones said she had a right to be, and Germany comes along in a submarine like a big automobile coming down the road, and says "Honk, honk, honk," to America, "Get off the sea." And America says, "No; I ain't goin' to get off no sea!" And then Germany says, "You is going to get off the sea." And America says, "Germany, let me tell you something: You better get some sense in your head." And America kept walking off, argufying with Germany and looking back over her shoulder. Germany kept following after her until she overtook her, and now she is in a hell of a fix. [Laughter and applause.]

So it is, Mr. Chairman, with the fellow who, it may be, is filled with good intentions, finds himself on the side of greed and avarice and darkness and war. [Applause.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU].

Mr. POU. Mr. Chairman, some days ago I made some comments on the various bills which have been introduced in this House giving to the soldiers and the sailors of the recent Great War additional compensation. I have arisen to-day for the purpose of serving notice on the Committee on Military Affairs that the friends of this legislation expect action. We have all read about the great parades and celebrations in honor of the soldiers and sailors of the World War. That is all very good. It is a fine thing to do honor to these men; they are deserving of all honors that can be bestowed upon them. But they expect, and have the right to expect, something more than praise and cheers and tears.

I saw the other day a picture in a newspaper which made quite an impression. A soldier was standing guard in front of a great establishment in a great city, having taken the place of a policeman who had struck and left his post of duty. And I was reminded that the surest dependence of this Nation is in these men of the Army and Navy who served so well and brought victory in the Great War. A gentleman took me to task some days ago, intimating that I was encouraging a Bolshevistic spirit in the position I took. The finest thing this Nation can do is to so act toward these men that they will feel that there has been a reasonable amount of gratitude bestowed upon them. [Applause.] The greatest security this Nation can have against the growth and spread of Bolshevism is contentment and satisfaction among the men who fought the Great War.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Has the gentleman a specific recommendation to make on that point?

Mr. POU. I certainly have. The suggestion I have made is to pay these men, in addition to the $60 they have received, $180, which would make $240. That will be the identical bonus you have paid to people who never smelled gunpowder, who came to this city and agreed to work for a specified sum, who never saw danger, who made no sacrifice, who have received $240, while the men who went abroad and offered their all only received $60. That is the suggestion I make. It is a far more reasonable proposal than any one of the reclamation bills that have been talked about here. And it is a far more practical suggestion than that which would put the soldier on an abandoned piece of cut-over land and expect him to work out his salvation there.

Mr. PLATT. You propose to give these soldiers $240, which is so much gratitude, why not give them $1,000 and have a thousand dollars' worth of gratitude?

Mr. POU. That is no answer to the suggestion of the several bills that have been introduced. I will ask my friend if he is satisfied to pay people in this city $240 in addition to what they agreed to work for while the soldier receives only $60?

Mr. PLATT. Those men who are receiving the $240 are at work now.

Mr. POU. It is a bonus, and I ask the gentleman if he would be content that these people who came here and agreed to work for a specified sum receive $240 annually in addition, while the soldier must be satisfied with $60? The soldier must be satisfied with cheers, hurrahing, and parades, while these people who sacrificed nothing get $240. Is the gentleman surprised that there is dissatisfaction among the men of the Army and Navy?

Mr. PLATT. It is not a bonus; it is an increase in pay.

Mr. POU. It is equally an increase of pay to the soldier and sailor. I have been particular in the bill I introduced not to call it a bonus. Now, I am going to assume that the Committee on Military Affairs is favorable to this legislation. I know that quite a number of them are. The friends of this legislation on both sides of the aisle have been conducting a canvass, and I am safe in saying to-day that an overwhelming majority of this House on both sides of the aisle are in favor of at least doing as much for the soldiers and sailors as you are now doing for the people who never saw danger. [Applause.] We are going to insist on action by the Committee on Military Affairs, and I hope it will be their pleasure to take action in the near future on some one of these bills.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. It is quite true that there are many in favor of the proposition to give a bonus to the soldiers. Would the gentleman be willing to so amend his bill that every soldier who rendered service to his country shall not be deprived of a vote regardless of his color?

Mr. POU. I do not think that needs any answer.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I think it does.

Mr. POU. I have said what I have intended to say. The friends of this measure have asked for a hearing before the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. QUIN. I would like to say that I am in thorough accord with the statement of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU], and I think the bill the gentleman has before the committee is the best one. He is seeking to be heard, and the chairman of the committee has agreed to give him a hearing on that bill. I think we ought to do that for the soldiers.

Mr. POU. I thank my friend from Mississippi for his help. Permit me to say this in conclusion: I am not playing politics here. I know I am sincere in the position I take, and it gets on my nerves whenever we are discussing this measure for some gentleman to rise up and try to inject politics into it.

Mr. REED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. POU. I would be glad to yield if I had the time.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD].

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I yield those two minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, on May 16, 1917, a little over one month after we had declared war, one of the distinctive features before the Committee of the Whole, when we were discussing the military measure, was to increase the pay of the enlisted man from $25 to $30 a month. I find the vote on that question recorded on page 2396 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of the Sixty-fifth Congress, first session. That vote on that proposition shows—yeas 199, nays 178. Among the nays is recorded the vote of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU], who has just taken his seat. We did our duty at that time by a substantial majority, and raised the pay of the soldier from $25 to $30 a month, and it were better for those who voted against that proposition to have spoken then, when action was on, and to keep still at this time. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I yield six minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. EAGAN].

Mr. EAGAN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I can not hope to add anything to the splendid address of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD], the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in presenting this bill to the House. I think he has performed a very great service in the preparation of the bill and in his presentation of it to the Congress and to the country. I am sure that his admonitions as to the necessity for the practice of rigid economy in all the expenses of the Federal Government will not be lost on the membership of the House. A study of the figures presented here to-day must convince every Member of the House that we are presented with a very difficult situation indeed in the fiscal administration of the Government, and yet I found myself in the subcommittee somewhat at variance with the majority members of the committee with respect to two or three items. One of them is the item for the Federal Trade Commission—that part of the $350,000 estimate providing for the bringing up to date of their investigations and reports on some of the basic industries. I had hoped that the commission might have been given $50,000 additional for that work, but in deference to the sentiments of the majority members of the committee I do not propose to press that item.

There are two other items, however, which I have reserved the right to offer as amendments at the proper time and place. One of these is the item of $125,000 for what is known as the retail food price information.

I probably should not urge that particular item but for the fact that this is an activity that we have already provided for to some extent in the past, but which we ceased providing for on the 30th of June of this year. It is for the purpose of furnishing to "consumers, newspapers, producers, and dealers accurate information regarding supplies of fruits, vegetables, dairy and poultry products, meats, fish, and other food products received on farmers', municipal, and other city markets, and prices for which such products are sold; and information regarding such products when in abundance or oversupply," and to that extent, at least, to help to reduce the mounting cost of living. As to that particular item, I believe, if we grant it this year we will be relieved of the necessity of appropriating for it hereafter, because I think it is properly a municipal function. Detroit is already providing for that sort of work, and the State of Connecticut has made an appropriation for the furnishing of this information in three or four of her cities.

There is another item that I propose to offer as an amendment at the proper place in the bill, under the five-minute rule, and that is for the control of the insect pest known as the Japanese beetle. The Japanese beetle at the present time threatens to become a national menace. We hope to be able to control it with this appropriation in an area of about 15,000 acres in Burlington County, N. J. I believe if the matter had been presented with a little greater insistence at the time it was brought before the subcommittee, the subcommittee would have recommended the appropriation.

I think it should be said with regard to the appropriation for the Department of Justice that while we grant practically all that the department asked for, the activities of the department, so far as enforcement of the food-control act is concerned, are largely confined to investigating charges of profiteering and hoarding and to the prosecution of the profiteer and hoarder of foodstuffs. While we all agree that profiteering and hoarding should be punished to the limit, and while profiteering is undoubtedly an element in the increase of the cost of living, it was brought out repeatedly in the hearings that it is perhaps relatively a small item. It has had a very prominent place—and properly so—in all discussions of the high cost of living; but inflation of the currency, lack or lowering of production, high taxes, enormous exports of foodstuffs to Europe, and waste are all very important factors contributing to the increase in the cost of living. I believe with this money the department will do all it can do so far as profiteering and hoarding are concerned.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New Jersey has expired.

By unanimous consent, Mr. EAGAN was granted leave to extend and revise his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent also to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I have a statement I wish to read from ex-President Taft, and that got misplaced, and which I wanted to be in this speech.

On September 11, after the Committee on Foreign Relations in the Senate had reported and made several amendments and reservations to the peace treaty, Mr. Taft gave out a statement, published in the Washington Post on September 11, in which he said:

> Senator LODGE is reported to have said that the second reservation framed by the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in respect to article 10 only differs in phraseology and not in substance from the reservations in respect to the same article of the mild reservationists. Such a statement can not be supported. This reservation goes far beyond Mr. Hughes's reservations, Mr. Root's reservations, or any of the reservations suggested by Mr. MCCUMBER, Mr. KELLOGG, or Mr. MCNARY. Those of the Senators last named only qualify and explain the undertakings of article 10.

Now, Mr. Chairman, here, as I said before, is a great American who has been honored with the office of President, and he is a Republican. In spite of the deplorable fact that partisan politics is raging all around him, he says deliberately that when this peace treaty, garbled and butchered as it has been, is submitted back to the Senate the amendments and reservations destroy it. Here in another place in that article he says:

> The reservation of the Foreign Relations Committee in effect is a declination on the part of the United States to become bound in any way by the obligations of the league so far as it provides a union with other nations to secure the peace of the world. It is a notice to the world that we are willing to enjoy the benefits of the league for ourselves, but that we are not willing to obligate ourselves in any way to aid the rest of the world in securing those benefits. It is a reservation that no one of the other nations could accept with any sense of self-respect.

Now, gentlemen, what is the purpose of these reservations and amendments? As I said before, my judgment is they were and are intended to kill the plan for arbitration of disputes between nations. And it looks now like your shortsighted leaders are going to kill it. And kill it for what? Mr. Taft is quoted as saying that certain Republicans are fighting it because it was submitted by a Democratic President. When the incomplete copy of the treaty was procured from Germany and submitted to the Senate for publication in the RECORD, Senator MCCUMBER, a great Republican, stood upon that floor and said that he would not vote to print the copy thus secured in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. He said that he had made it a rule for 20 years to vote against publishing any treaty until it was submitted by the President himself to the Senate, and that he could not change his attitude now because there was a change in administration. There was another patriot that Republican leaders could not whip into line.

Is the attempt to play politics about to destroy the hope of peace? Why should there be any politics in the league of nations plan? Is there any fear about the league of nations getting us into trouble? No; no well-founded fear. We can withdraw from it in two years. In two years' time this Government can say to the league, if conditions justify it, "You have perverted it from the ends of its institution, and we serve notice on you now that we are going to withdraw."

Gentlemen, are we not justified in joining, and are we not in duty bound to join, with the peace-loving forces who fought with us to end this murderous war in an effort to prevent another such war? [Applause.]

Think of all that it promises, and remember that we can get out of it in two years' time if we desire to do so. Are we not justified, I repeat, in going into a league that promises permanent peace, and when it is the only plan and hope that we have?

They do not offer a thing to take its place, not one single thing. You leave humanity here and abroad in the grasp of the bloody old system that has produced all of the bloody wars of the past. That cruel old system will produce more war in the future. We all know that. Here is an opportunity to turn away from that murderous old system and to set up a tribunal that gives us hope that we can prevent the recurrence of wars in the future. [Applause.]

I recall an incident that took place in this city. It is said that Bob Ingersoll, the great Republican infidel, lectured in this city, and Senator Joe Blackburn, of Kentucky, was in the audience, and after the lecture was over Col. Ingersoll went back to the old Riggs House and saw Senator Blackburn in the lobby, and he went over to him and said:

Senator, I felt honored to see you in my audience. I would like to know what you thought of my lecture.

And Senator Joe Blackburn said:

Suppose you should see a one-legged man in the street out there—a poor cripple—hobbling along with only one crutch on the slippery streets, and a great crowd was surging about the moving street cars, and somebody should go up and take that crutch away from the poor cripple. What would you think of him?

Bob Ingersoll said:

I would call him a brute.

And Senator Joe Blackburn said:

You have expressed my opinion of your lecture. I heard you for an hour and a half to-night trying to take away from poor, struggling mortals the only crutch they had on which to lean, the crutch of Christianity.

[Applause.]

I saw humanity, with its shortcomings and its grief, leaning upon that blessed crutch, groping along and finding comfort on its way through life, and I saw you for one hour and a half to-night pervert your masterful intellect and mighty eloquence in an effort to take that crutch away. You left nothing on which to lean. You gave not a word of comfort. You left no word of hope behind.

[Applause.]

Gentlemen, the peace conference in Paris sat within 50 miles of the graves of 4,000,000 dead. Every day the President and the other delegates when they went upon the streets saw men hobbling along with one leg gone, with one arm gone, some blind, others bent over with chests drawn, their lungs burned and injured with poisonous gases, some with eyes burned out with tear gas. These great men in the peace conference, with an army of cripples moving all about them, sat there and heard all of the gruesome stories of rapine and murder, and they said, "By the help of God we will set up a tribunal that will hereafter treat war as a crime." [Applause on the Democratic side.] We will set up this international tribunal and say to the outlaw nation, as Mr. LODGE, in 1915, suggested we should say, "You shall not go to war." [Applause.]

The league of nations is the only crutch on which our Nation and all the other peace-loving nations will have to lean. No substitute has been provided. It is the hope offered in the crutch and agency of the new dispensation for peace in the league of nations or it is the hopelessness and black despair of the old system, which means war—monstrous, murderous, modern war. Will these Republican leaders take away from us the only hope on which humanity has to lean? Let us say to the outlaw nations that we intend to lead as God intended we should in establishing law and order in the world and peace on earth and good will to men. [Prolonged applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION.

For temporary employees for the Civil Service Commission, $50,000: Provided, That not more than two persons shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,400 per annum and no person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 per annum.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, in arranging the time I had promised to yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] 10 minutes, but I consumed all the time I had at my disposal. I ask, therefore, that he may be permitted to proceed for 10 minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] be allowed to proceed for 10 minutes out of order. Is there objection?

Mr. QUIN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, of course I want the gentleman to have his time, but I myself applied for time and could not get it. I would like to have the same privilege for seven minutes.

Mr. TINCHER. I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, those who do not fully agree with the President on the league of nations have been pronounced pro-German by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN] in this House at least four times within the last three months.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kansas yield to the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. TINCHER. No; I do not yield.

Mr. HEFLIN. I beg the gentleman's pardon. The gentleman is misrepresenting the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. TINCHER. At first I paid little attention to the insinuation; but considering the fact that the President stayed in this city a few days at his post of duty before starting the 1920 campaign and did not see any Democratic Congressmen that I know of except the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], and that the President has gone West on his political trip for 1920 proclaiming practically the same thing, I think this attitude toward those who can not fully agree with him may fairly be considered the definite policy of the administration toward all people who do not fully agree with his policies. I desire, at the risk of being considered presumptuous, to characterize that attitude and expression as being political profiteering, prompted entirely by one of three things, namely, ignorance, arrogance, or an immoral great mind.

I say that to characterize those who do not agree with him as pro-German and other names, simply because they do not agree with his policy, is a sign of a weak cause.

Just think of the absurdity of the President, who stood around for three years writing notes to the "Imperial German Government, praising the virtue, tolerance, and progress of Germany," now calling men like Senators LODGE, BORAH, and JOHNSON "pro-German"; but worse, think of soldiers that actually participated in the war, men you are acquainted with, who are men of learning and who absolutely differ with the President—think of either President Wilson or the gentleman from Alabama calling them pro-German.

I have some friends in town, men of affairs, who gave up their business and went to the war—are here for the Pershing parade—who do not agree with the President. Do you suppose that dubbing them pro-German, either by the President or by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], will make you or me or anyone else think any the less of them?

Your opponent may be pig-headed, wrong, ignorant, or even dishonest, but it is cowardly and unfair to try to gain your point by saying he is pro-German; that is a deliberate effort to use patriotism as camouflage for political profiteering.

Suppose these soldier boys, who differ with the President and are classed as pro-German by the President and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], were to say that they accounted for the lack of air protection in the Argonne as pro-Germanism—of course, men who fought for their country have too much manhood for such charges. Suppose a Republican Congressman should attempt to account for our blunder in not accepting the French and English offer of the right to manufacture their planes during the war instead of spending billions in an effort to invent one and finally not having any as pro-Germanism.

Suppose I should attempt to account for the President's unwarranted expense of $150,000 to Barney Baruch, as shown by his recent report, as pro-Germanism. I have a right to say and do say that that item of expense was wasteful, unwarranted, and an outrageous way to handle the public funds; but I know nothing that would warrant me in saying it was pro-German.

Suppose I should say concerning the $30,000 item in that report, which the report shows was used for entertaining royalty, was pro-German. I have a right to say and do say that it was an outrage to use this Government money in that way in these times, but I have no right to say it is pro-German.

Suppose I should say that the President and Secretary Baker's permanent army bill, now pending in both the House and Senate, calling for compulsory military training and service are pro-Germanism. I have a right to say and do say they are wrong—that we do not want that kind of an Army policy—that the President should not have all the boys in the country between the ages of 19 and 21 at his beck and call to police Europe, guard railroads in Russia, look after elections in Silesia, during peace time, but I have a right to say and do say that the Prussian system of compulsory training of all boys at 19, so as to destroy their individuality and break their souls and make machines instead of men of them is wrong, but I have no right to say that because the President wants that army policy as a part of his league of nations he is pro-German.

Suppose I should say that because the White House has truck load after truck load of presents from royalty to the President and his family in it right now, that the President is pro-German. I have a right to say and do say that the framers of our Constitution were right and that those presents should not have been accepted, but I have no right to call the President a pro-German for accepting them.

Suppose I should say that the President, on issuing his now famous letter demanding the election of a Democratic Congress, but in which letter he says he will abide by the verdict of the voters, then after the voters had agreed upon that verdict and the appropriations for the fiscal year had failed to pass—and he did not abide by their verdict and convene Congress and say you were chosen by the people for this work, but on the other hand he waited until such time as he thought that in order to get those bills through he and his departments could say to the new Congress, Here is your medicine; you take it. Suppose I should say this conduct was pro-German. I have a right to say and do say that he broke his word and attempted to evade the people's verdict, but that would not warrant me in classing any man as pro-German.

I am not worried about the President, or even the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN], making any headway with this attempt to attract public attention to their claim on a monopoly of patriotism; their mehods are ridiculous, the people know it and it is time we get up and say so. [Applause.]

Mr. HEFLIN, by unanimous consent, was given leave to revise and extend his remarks.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I rise merely to call the attention of the committee to the figures revealing the financial state of this country submitted this morning by the distinguished chairman of this committee. At a later date I hope to have something to say on this subject and elaborate it to some extent, because I think the gentleman from Iowa this morning has presented the most essential and vital question that faces this Congress. It appears from the estimates submitted by the Treasury Department to the Committee on Appropriations that the amount of money which this Congress will be called upon to raise to pay expenses for the fiscal year of 1920 will amount to the huge sum of $10,900,000,000. To finance that we have, according to this statement, available at the outside from all known or expected sources not to exceed seven and one-half billion dollars. In other words, the necessary expenses we are called upon to finance exceeds the total amount that is now in sight by the appalling sum of three and one-half billion dollars, three and one-half times as much, gentlemen, as it ever cost to maintain this Government in all its departments in any one year before the war. This is the sort of thing that ought to make thoughtful Members of Congress stop and think, because bound up in this question is some of the most vital legislation we will be called upon to consider.

I have no doubt that the mail of every Member here, just as does my mail, consists by at least half of requests, on the one hand, for reducing taxation, and requests, on the other hand, for increased appropriations for some purpose or other.

How, at the very best, with taxes as high as they are now and appropriations no greater, can taxation be reduced when we see a deficit facing us of three and a half billion dollars? What do you propose to do about it? The last Congress made one serious mistake. We accepted the statement of the late Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, that $4,000,000,000 of taxation would be sufficient to finance this Government next year. Now we find that $4,000,000,000 of taxation will not come within nearly $7,000,000,000 of meeting the present estimate of our actual expenses.

We ought never to have proceeded in the dark in the reduction of taxation, but the Secretary came to us shortly before he resigned his office and asked that we reduce for the next year our taxation by 25 per cent. In other words, that instead of raising $6,000,000,000 a year by taxation we should not raise to exceed $4,000,000,000. Congress accepted that statement, and automatically the taxes for the calendar year of 1919 are reduced 25 per cent from the taxes of the calendar year of 1918. Why, instead of reducing them it seems probable that we might well have increased them. Now, the fact is that there are many of these taxes that ought to be eliminated. There are some very obnoxious taxes in the present revenue law that ought not to be continued permanently, and yet you can not afford, now that this situation faces us of a deficit of three and a half billion dollars, which can not be raised any way except by a bond issue, to consider for a moment the reduction of taxes, no matter how obnoxious they may be.

Mr. PLATT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. If we should increase the taxes, it would increase the bond issue and the cost of living?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Unquestionably. Every bond that this Government issues will increase the cost of living, at least to the extent of the taxes it involves necessary to raise the revenue, which taxes will be passed on to the consumer. And how about these appropriations which we are called upon to make—tremendous increases involving billions of dollars? In the face of the statement submitted to us by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, can we seriously consider at this time very greatly increasing the expenses of the Treasury? Many gentlemen come to me on the floor and ask if I think the Ways and Means Committee will consider reducing the tax on automobiles, on jewels, or on furs or things of that sort. How can we do it? You are flying in the face of Providence if you undertake substantial reductions in taxation at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Would any gentleman here view with great pleasure the thought of going out over this country and advocating an additional bond issue when Liberty bonds are standing in the market to-day somewhere about 92 or 93, if I am correctly informed?

I rose to-day only to call to the attention of gentlemen present the vital seriousness of this situation that confronts us, and to urge them to think carefully before they advocate on the one hand very large increases in appropriations, and on the other hand a reduction of taxes which are necessary to pay our bills. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

For all expenses necessary in connection with the collection of information as may be directed by the President of the United States, or within the scope of its powers, regarding the production, ownership, manufacture, storage, and distribution of foodstuffs, or other necessaries, and the products or by-products arising from or in connection with the preparation and manufacture thereof, together with figures of cost and wholesale and retail prices, $150,000.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN] may be allowed to proceed for seven minutes out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Chairman, the discussion of this matter has gone far afield this afternoon. I do not want to indulge in any partisan or political discussion. The question of three and a half billion dollars of deficit staring us in the face is indeed a grave and serious one, but notwithstanding that I rise to champion the cause of the private soldiers, marines, and sailors and noncommissioned officers of this country and to plead for Congress to pay each of them a bonus of six months' pay in addition to the $60 already allowed them. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] stated that little had been done, and he is right; but in justification of this Congress and the committee of which I have the honor to be a member, I want to say that the Congress gave the soldiers, sailors, and marines their entire uniform, their underclothing, overcoat, hat, shoes, and all, and in addition to that $60 bonus for every soldier, marine, and sailor when he was discharged from the service. That was deliberately done by the committee for the purpose of having in the pockets of these poor boys when they went back home the sum of $60 with which to buy civilian clothes, to get into their every-day occupations. Our committee knew that the time would soon come when the Congress should do more for the soldiers, sailors, and marines, and the question of what was to be done, of the amount, was based upon what the Treasury of this Nation could stand. We do not propose to commercialize the services of the soldiers. They are not mercenaries, but the Government owes them some consideration. Many of them went back home to find their live stock sold and with nothing to begin farming with. I think the Government pursued a wise policy in not giving them the entire bonus at once, for if we had given them the entire bonus at the time of discharge many of the men might have wasted the money before going back to work. All men engaged in farming and in industrial pursuits were called immediately to their jobs, but after they have gone back home and have engaged in work, the Congress of the United States should give them, in my judgment, $180 each in addition to the $60 already received. It is true that this would cost this Government about $1,000,000,000, but as Congress has been spending much money to protect the contractors to keep them from losing money, surely the great Government of this Nation owes this to these brave soldiers who went out ready to make the supreme sacrifice upon the field of battle. Many of them actually faced death in foreign fields, and many of them stood in front of gas, shelled as they were by the enemy, with the bullets whistling all around them, bogged up waist deep in mud. Would the American people question this Congress giving to these men six months' more pay? Would the constituency of any man in this House be against this Government giving to the soldiers that bonus, doing so because we represent the hearthstones of the people back home?

The soldier does not demand anything of this Congress, but we, as the Representatives of the people, should give that to them which is their just due. In my judgment, the man who bared his breast to the bullets of the enemy is the man who must protect this country against inward trouble. Right here in the city of Boston, out next-door neighbor, the police went out on a strike, and who was it that came to the rescue of the city and kept the thieves and thugs from robbing stores and running through the households of that beautiful city?

It was the soldier, the man who had worn the uniform in camp and on the field of battle and on the high seas. So it must be in every section of this Republic when the disloyal elements, when the Bolshevist would overturn society, disrupt business, it must be the heart of the man who went into the service, combined with the conservative civilian citizenship back in every community of this Republic, to safeguard the liberties of the people and life and property. The soldier then should have the encouragement from his Government. The boys who have gone through the hardships and the struggle, with this encouragment from their Government, would feel in the future like placing themselves in the breach against the enemies within as well as they did against the enemies without. The American people are an appreciative people, and notwithstanding that a large deficit of three and a half billion dollars stares us in the face, $1,000,000,000 more must be added, in my judgment, to do the proper and the right thing for those patriotic men who wore the uniform of their country and defended this Nation at all times during the war against Germany, in the camps, on the battle fields, and on the high seas. [Applause.] Gentlemen, I thank you.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and I will apologize to the committee if I hold myself to the subject under discussion. Now, here is an appropriation of $150,000 for the purpose of enabling the Federal Trade Commission to gain information concerning the production, ownership, manufacture, storage, and distribution of foodstuffs. As I understand it, we have a Department of Agriculture spending several million dollars trying to get this information; we have the Attorney General spending incidentally millions of dollars in getting information. The food-control bill has been on the statute books for two years, and that gives ample powers to enable the Department of Agriculture and the Attorney General to get this very information. Now, can the chairman of the committee give me any reason why we should appropriate an additional $150,000 for this purpose?

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I realize that the inquiry is a very pertinent one. The Federal Trade Commission had one million in addition to the appropriation of $55,000 for salaries of the commission. Last year they expended, as I recall it, all of their appropriation but $200,000. The Federal Trade Commission did not want to take this work. They said they could not expend more than that amount. The gentleman will recall that the Department of Agriculture asked for $502,000 to investigate the high cost of living. The Department of Commerce asked for $485,000; the Department of Labor asked for $475,000; and it seemed to me that there was a duplication of work that they proposed to do out of these appropriations; and now the committee did not grant anything to the Department of Agriculture for that purpose, it did not grant anything to the Department of Commerce, and nothing but $12,000 to print some reports for the Department of Labor.

The President in his message had said that this was one of the agencies that he wanted to make some investigations. The Federal Trade Commission is making investigations along this line. It is doubtful if the million dollars which was appropriated would be sufficient to permit them to make their investigations and publish them, and also to do this work which the President has indicated. Now, if this commission can do something to give relief, why, the expenditure of $150,000 is a mere bagatelle; and while I do not expect that the entire appropriation carried in this bill will reduce as much as one-tenth of 1 per cent the high cost of living, I am sure the gentleman would not want to take the responsibility nor the Congress would want to take the responsibility of not appropriating anything when the President was asking for the appropriation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I ask for an additional one minute to ask the gentleman a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the time of the gentleman being extended one minute? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is this $150,000 a deficiency or is it to be spent in addition to the $1,000,000 which the Federal Trade Commission has now?

Mr. GOOD. It is to be expended; it is not a deficiency.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I press my motion.

Mr. GOOD. What is the motion?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. To strike out the last word—"$150,000."

Mr. GOOD. The last word is "per annum"—I was looking at the wrong paragraph. The gentleman wants to strike out the paragraph?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. If we are going to economize, let us start now and cut out this appropriation. The Federal Trade Commission has a million dollars to spend, and I feel that they can carry on the work without this additional appropriation.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say only a word in regard to this item. I have said practically all I desire to say. I do not believe it is going to result in decreasing the cost of living, but I do think, in view of the fact that the President has asked for some money for some of these departments to use in order to get this information, that at least this department that has been obtaining such information ought to have some money to bring that report down to date and to continue. Give them a chance and see what, if anything, can be accomplished.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. This agency has now a million dollars.

Mr. GOOD. Unquestionably, and it is all allotted for work other than this work here, and they say they will not be able to do any work along this line unless an additional appropriation is made.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What did the Federal Trade Commission do with this million dollars?

Mr. GOOD. If the gentleman will take the hearings, he will find, on page 77, a large list of items of investigations that this department is carrying on.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is it doing any constructive good?

Mr. GOOD. So far as reducing the prices of living is concerned, I do not think they accomplish much along that line.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Is it doing any good to stimulate trade and industry?

Mr. GOOD. I believe a great many people think it is. I do not care to pass on that proposition, as it is not at issue at all.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Will the gentleman yield? I want to ask the gentleman if it is not a fact that the Federal Trade Commission in many instances is conducting an investigation as the result of a resolution passed by the Senate, which they have to comply with, and they have no discretion in the matter at all?

Mr. GOOD. There are several of those resolutions, and investigations are being made under them.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Well, they have a million dollars.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. And that is well spent.

Mr. HAUGEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HAUGEN. This work is being done by the Department of Agriculture—the collection of data.

Mr. GOOD. Oh, no. If the Department of Agriculture is investigating the price of coal or shoes and things of that kind, it is doing something it was never created to do. The Department of Agriculture is not doing all the things that is intended to be done by this department. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] it was not intended to spend any money out of the $150,000 carried here for investigating with regard to cold storage.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, let me call the gentleman's attention to the language of "production, ownership, manufacture, storage, and distribution of foodstuffs."

Mr. GOOD. It also says, "as may be directed by the President of the United States." If the gentleman will read the language in full he will find that the matter is left to the President. This is the language of the estimate. Under the food act the President has such broad powers that he can ask them to do almost anything, and the President has in the past designated this commission, as a rule, to investigate these matters.

Now, we did not appropriate a dollar for the Department of Agriculture, we did not appropriate a dollar for the Department of Commerce for this purpose, and only $12,000 for the Department of Labor. The only other agency was the Department of Justice. It did seem the President might well complain and the country might complain, because the country is not going to get relief from the high cost of living, as is anticipated by some, and they might complain, and complain bitterly, if we refused to give any appropriation at all for any investigation.

Mr. HAUGEN. Just one minute.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Chairman, I am not particularly interested whether one department or the other is to do this work, but I protest against the Federal Trade Commission and the Department of Agriculture and the Bureau of Census all continuing the same line of activities. If so, you will have duplication of work carried on by three branches of this Government. If the Federal Trade Commission can do better, very well. I trust it may. However, I do protest against three departments carrying on and doing the very same work, and in that way doubling up the expense.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Certainly.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. The committee of which the gentleman is chairman is now considering a bill called the "cold-storage bill," and if the bill becomes a law the Secretary of Agriculture will have more or less authority over cold-storage plants, and it will be directly in line with that work for him to investigate the supply of foods, and so forth, and the amount in storage, the production and the ownership of foods stored in this country—the very thing that this appropriation would authorize the Federal Trade Commission to perform. Of course, there is no desire to duplicate the work.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. In a moment. But some of this work, if necessary, is work which the Department of Agriculture can well do in carrying out the purposes of the cold-storage act, and there would have to be some duplication. It would necessarily result if the provision carried in the Agricultural bill is carried out and the provision in the deficiency bill is enacted into law.

Mr. HAUGEN. We recently appropriated $2,600,000 for the Bureau of Markets, much of it for the very purpose presented here. I believe we should at least provide that this work should be done in cooperation with the Department of Agriculture, so as not to have two agencies following on the same trail and gathering the same information.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. This is just what the Federal Trade Commission calls a quick investigation—an investigation for the purpose of procuring information quickly for the benefit of the Department of Justice; information as to clothing and canned goods and other food supplies, and other things and elements that enter into the high cost of living. This is a quick investigation that they propose to make now.

Mr. HAUGEN. If that is the understanding, and it is not intended to duplicate the work of the Department of Agriculture, I have no objection. I have no quarrel with the Federal Trade Commission.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. The representative of that department that came before us said that this was to be a quick investigation, and this amount is what could be wisely expended in that connection.

Mr. HAUGEN. We get a bushel basket of reports and bulletins containing reports called for here every morning and get but little value from them. Now you propose to add $150,000 to be expended by another branch of the Government in the same activity. Let one branch of the Government carry on the activity.

Mr. BYRNS of Tennessee. It is only for the purpose of giving aid to the Department of Justice in its activities.

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes. The Department of Agriculture in cooperating with the Department of Justice in its attempt to reduce the cost of living. I am not particular as to who does it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. All time has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. Page 2, line 10, after the word "powers," insert "and in cooperation with the Department of Agriculture."

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order on that.
